OPEN your mind to an entirely new idea of floor beauty and comfort. Then examine with a critical eye this newest floor creation of Armstrong's designers. It has the beauty of a cut-stone floor. It has the lifetime wear of a built-in floor. Yet it is warm, quiet, comfortable to walk on—and can be quickly laid right over any old, shabby floor.

Rich, rugged ashlar—finished, square-edged stone—is the motif for the artistry in this new design. The design units vary in size from small blocks to large flagstone effects. The colors, though not repeated regularly, freely blend in pleasing harmony.

Furthermore, the natural mortar lines are actually pressed below the surface, embossed, to give this Armstrong Floor the "texture" that makes for true floor beauty.

This Embossed Inlaid effect is an exclusive Armstrong feature (patents pending). It is now available in many different designs. All are beautiful. All make comfortable, foot-easy floors. All cost surprisingly little when cemented in place—nothing at all as the years roll by.

These new Armstrong Floors, as well as a host of others, are on display at good department, furniture, and linoleum stores. The merchant will explain how quickly the floor you select can be built in right over your old floor. And your new Armstrong Floor never needs expensive refinishing.

any man in the world, and yet, with all that factory land sale still hanging fire, I didn't feel absolutely sure he'd want to go out of his way to antagonize Mr. Porter.

"We ought to get some man to suggest it," said Dulcie shrewdly. "If one of us did, the boys would be sure to say that it was because we were jealous of Mrs. Sam Porter's looks. You know how funny men are."

Didn't we all know! Dulcie's remark was like kerosene on fire.

"Let's not ask any help from any of them," said Mrs. Frank Kirsted suddenly. "Let's put this over ourselves. They're always saying women never stick by each other—let's show 'em we can!"

The idea just tickled us all.

"But what man is there that we could be dead sure Mr. Porter might not have some influence with?"

There was a long pause while we thought. It was Rosie who had the inspiration.

"Why do we have to have a man at all?" she asked. "Why don't we nominate a woman? There's a woman on the Verblen board."

And almost before the words were out of her mouth, we all said in chorus, "Miss Prescott!"

It was an idea straight from the heavens. Miss Prescott is a middle-aged, unmarried woman—you'd never think of anybody calling her an old maid; she is well-to-do, and we knew she had plenty of time. She was active in every club matter in Montrose, especially interested in young people, very progressive and public-spirited. She was simply perfect.

I was instantly appointed to go and ask her if she would accept if she were elected. It was very exciting. I'd heard of secret political meetings held in the back of saloons in which great deals had been put over, and here we were, just a half-dozen of us girls, planning the same sort of thing. In the excitement of the occasion we ordered another round of maple-nut sundaes, and laid our plans.

FIRST, our idea was to get the town all stirred up, have torchlight processions and meetings and speeches and everything. But Mrs. Harriman, who is really a very smart woman, had a much better idea.

"Mr. Harriman always used to say, 'Don't go hunting ducks with a brass band!' If we start up a lot of excitement, that will give Sam Porter a chance to bring up all his guns. And we don't know how much influence he could bring to bear if he got excited. Let's have a secret campaign. Nobody pays much attention to the board election. Let's make use of that fact. Let's spring it on them unawares."

Well, we could all see that that was a good plan, though Dulcie, who adores excitement, hated to give up the torchlight parade. Still, the idea of secret diplomacy was almost as exciting. We had another round of sundaes, and sat there till ten minutes of six, working out our plans.

And we made a solemn promise not to tell a single man, not even our own husbands. Any married woman knows what a hard promise that would be to keep; and if the boys hadn't kidded us so about being jealous of Mrs. Sam, it would probably have been impossible.

"Think we can't keep a secret, think we can't stick together!" we all said. "We'll show 'em."

This was just the frosting on the cake, though, we knew. The real thing was Mrs. Beth. We were going to see that she got her rights. We had one last round of chocolate marshmallow sundaes while we polished off our plans.

I HAD a frightful bilious headache the next morning, from the excitement, but I dressed the twins and went up to call on Miss Prescott the first thing, just the same. She was enthusiastic over the idea. She hadn't known Mrs. Beth personally, but she said that if Mr. Curley recommended her, she would promise to vote for having her back.

What she was really interested in, though, was getting on the school board. She said the board needed new blood terribly. She'd heard they'd never bothered with anything but the money business of the schools, never tried to keep abreast of the educational movements, and so on. Oh, being on the school board would be just her meat!

She agreed with us that the quietest sort of campaign would be our wisest bet. So secretly we went to work.

We had just two weeks, so there was no time to lose. In the common cause, even Dulcie and Mrs. Frank Kirsted stopped their constant bickering and worked together like a pair of scissors. Sam Porter may have understood how to handle the men, but we began pulling wires that Sam Porter had never even heard of.

Mrs. Harriman canvassed all of Mrs. Beth's old friends, middle-aged women who would no more have thought of going to a school-board election than of setting up to run for United States Congress.

Corinne and Dulcie got hold of all the old girls who had used to go to school to Mrs. Beth. Miss Prescott quietly lined up a few of the more progressive of the club women, who were sold on the idea of having a woman on the board.

I went down into the district on the other side of the tracks, and talked to the women there. Miss Prescott had got four of their boys off from being railroaded into the reform school once for a bit of boy mischief, and all I had to do was to mention her name.

Mrs. Rapatowski said she would see Mrs. Paliachi and Mrs. Vendeeza, who were out washing the day I went down, and any other mothers that I might miss. They were a little scared at the idea of butting into a school-board election, but they all promised to come and vote.

Mrs. Frank Kirsted took their gorgeous new car, and Rosie piled all her four babies in and they drove way out past the Ridge, the truck-garden district that had just been taken into the town limits. Mrs. Beth had taught the district school out there before she was married. Plenty of the women remembered her.

When they heard the dirty deal that was being handed her, they all said they'd drive in to the meeting and not mention it to their husbands, who—many of them—owed Sam Porter money for machinery.

How we worked! And how we kept still! Sometimes I wanted to tell Will about all the excitement so bad that I was actually afraid I might lose control of my mouth. But I didn't!

I would think of the superior way our husbands always kidded us girls about not sticking together, and I managed to resist temptation. Everybody else was evidently keeping her mouth shut, too, for nobody seemed to have the least idea there was anything going on at all.

And then, after all our work, when the day of the school-board election actually came, there was a blizzard!

It was a terrific one, the kind we sometimes get in March. An icy, sleety blizzard; the kind that would keep any woman, who doesn't absolutely have to, from sticking her nose outdoors. The men plowed out to business, but as I sat at our front window, watching the bitter blowing snow, my heart sank lower and lower. Our beautiful scheme was undone for us by nature. It seemed just too cruel. I got to thinking about poor Mrs. Beth, and I could hardly keep from crying.

After supper, Will looked out into the bitter night.

"Wish to heavens I didn't have to get out!" he said. "But I told Sam Porter I'd try to get over to the school-board election. He wants to be sure Frank MacReady gets returned on the board. I'll be back by nine o'clock, though."

"I'm going with you," I said. It was the least I could do.

Will looked positively amazed.

"What do you want to go there for, for the love of Mike?" he demanded. "And what about the kids?"

"I've arranged all about leaving them," I said. "And I think it's my duty to vote. You made a lot of fun of me for forgetting to register, last year."

"Oh, this is nothing but a school-board election," said Will.

"I'm going, just the same," I said firmly.

"Oh, sure," said Will. "Go if you want to. Women are certainly nuts, though. To have your civic conscience start working, for the first time since you've been twenty-one, on a night like this!"

I bundled up to my neck and we started. I knew of course, that every vote would count and that living so near the high school it was my plain bounden duty to go. Most of the other women couldn't be expected to get out in such a storm.

It was a lost cause, but at least I'd know I'd done my best. It would help a little whenever I'd have to think later of poor Mrs. Beth, away off alone in Chicago.

THERE was just one room lighted in the high school, the assembly-room, when we got there. Mr. Porter was there already, and three or four other men. Miss Prescott was there too—looking trim and dignified in spite of all the wraps she was taking off. Before we got unwound, a couple of other men came in. Miss Prescott and I exchanged hopeless glances over their heads.

It wasn't quite eight yet; but Mr. Manning said we might as well get to voting and get back home, there probably wouldn't be anybody else out, such a night. Just then, there were voices in the dark entrance hall, and in came the Lanes and the Mertons, Rosie and Dulcie looking hopeless but determined. Their husbands looked puzzled and resigned, as though they'd just found that they'd married idiots.

Anxiously I looked around the room: nine men, most of them business associates of Sam Porter's. And just us four women! I could have cried.

As Mr. Manning again suggested getting down to business, not waiting till eight o'clock—everybody seemed to feel the whole thing was a mere matter of form, anyway—we saw two limousines plowing up through the drive. And in a minute in came six women. Club women, friends of Miss Prescott's, swathed in furs. My heart leaped; but two minutes later, in came two more men.

AND then, suddenly, Mrs. Beth Porter's old friends began to arrive. Two came, and then three together, and then two more. And then Mrs. Harriman alone, then three more.

They'd had no heated limousines. They'd plowed over on foot from the street-car track, and they took off their hats and shook them, and stamped the snow off their galoshes. I was sitting where I could see Mr. Manning's face, and he looked perfectly amazed.

At two minutes of eight, the most awful hubbub I ever heard in my life broke out in the entrance hall. Laughing, queer throaty gabbling. I could have screamed with joy. It was the women from the district across the tracks. In they came, in their funny old willow plumes and shabby old coats. Some of them had on men's caps, and two or three had great shawls over their heads.

I counted them as they came gabbling in. Seventeen, eighteen—twenty! No street cars run over to their district. They had come, the whole twenty of them together, through the blizzard, on foot.

And before they had got seated, all in one corner, we heard the grating of brakes on the drive outside. I hurried over to the window. Five flivvers—open cars they were, too. By the light from our window I could see women climbing out. Red-faced with the cold, stamping their feet, clapping their cold arms together, covering up their radiators with blankets.

The country women from out beyond the Ridge!

Every car had a snow shovel sticking out of the back seat, like a funny life preserver. It must have been a frightful drive in, and would be a worse one back. And yet they had come, twenty-two of them. To see that a square deal was given to a country school-teacher some of them hadn't seen for twenty years. And they say that women can't stick together!

The meeting was one of the biggest jokes I have ever seen in my life. The men didn't know what to make of it: they just stared at each other and at the crowd of women.

The meeting was called to order, and Mr. Sam Porter nominated Frank MacReady to succeed himself on the school board.

"I suggest that we vote at once," he said, "and get this minor matter settled as quickly as possible."

Up jumped Mrs. Harriman.

"I nominate Miss Elizabeth Prescott!" she said.

Sam Porter's face was a study. But there wasn't a living thing he could do. There were no other nominations, and the little white slips were passed out. The votes were collected and counted. Eleven votes for Frank MacReady.

There were seventy-six women in the assembly hall, and there were seventy-six votes for Miss Elizabeth Prescott.

The real joke of it is that, to this day, not a man in town has really understood just what it was that happened. Everybody says that Miss Prescott is doing perfectly splendid work on the school board, and Mrs. Beth Porter is coming in September to start in as principal of the Whittier School. They're going to give a big party to welcome her home.

And nobody'll have to worry about whether or not to ask the second Mrs. Porter. She and Sam have moved to Chicago; he comes back a day a week to oversee the business. He says his wife can't stand the dullness of a little town.

Whenever Mrs. Sam's name is mentioned, the men all try to look mysterious and masculine and wicked.

"My, aren't you girls glad to have that little siren off your beat, though!" Then they'll wink at each other and laugh. "Funny how women never can seem to get along together. How they do love to claw each other!"

They do this, of course, just to try to get a rise out of us. But they don't succeed. We don't even bother to get mad, we just look at each other and laugh. It's the first time in our entire lives we've ever had a really worth-while private joke!

anything but ride a horse and fire a gun, and that would not be much help, she thought, in learning how to get along with a group of girls in a New England college. She wanted to know everything.

"That sounded like a large order; but there was only one thing the matter with this girl. She was scared. To be sure, there were certain points she needed to know, such as ringing the bell for the porter to make up her berth on the train, tipping him when she arrived at her destination, giving her baggage to a bell boy, and following him up to her room, feeing him when he left. I told her to find out at what hours the hotel served meals, whether there was an à la carte or a table d'hôte dining-room, and explained that à la carte means a dining-room in which you could choose what you liked from a menu card with a number of items on it, and that table d'hôte meant one in which the waiters brought you your meals without giving you a choice, except perhaps on the meat or the dessert. As for the rest, I told her that any intelligent girl with her eyes open, and not afraid to ask questions, would have little trouble in adapting herto make his meals tempting

Her cooking lacked flavor. Sauces were flat. Variety was a daily problem. Meal-time was never an enjoyable affair.

Her neighbor, whose cooking her own husband praised so highly, suggested Savita. A marvelous meat flavoring, that is purely vegetable! Her problem was solved.

Now she uses Savita every day. Her soups are delicious. Piquant and distinctive. And such sauces, salads and gravies. She has a wealth of appetizing dishes to choose from.

Savita is the remarkable vegetable extract used at the Battle Creek Sanitarium. It abounds in vitamin B and food salts. Wonderfully healthful for invalids, and children. Good for frazzled nerves. Sold at all authorized agency stores. Try it today.

"I shall never forget a letter that came from a New York girl who had moved to a small town. I want you to read it."

I am in a town of three thousand souls, most of whom have lived here all their lives. My husband has a small store, which keeps him away from home from morning until night. This leaves me alone a great deal of the time. My husband knows a number of business men, and I have met their wives as opportunity presented itself. We have gone to their dances and church socials and other parties, and they have been very nice; but yet there is a feeling which annoys me.

Recently I went to a large reception, where I was left to chat with people I had never seen before. All they talked about was the other people they knew, and since I did not know any of them, I had no way of entering into the conversation. It is always like this. Can you suggest any way in which I can overcome the monotony of it? They seem interested only in the personal affairs of one another. Now I don't like gossip; but I don't like to be left alone. What can I do?

"Of course," Miss Eichler resumed, "the people in this little town are probably not nearly so bad as they seem to the girl from New York. The interest they have in one another's affairs undoubtedly is a kindly one. Naturally, after living in New York, small-town life might appear rather too personal and intimate. But I should not be at all surprised if, on the other hand, the 'small-towners' felt that the New York girl was trying to 'high-hat' them."

"WHAT advice did you give her?" I asked.

"I told her to make a friend of one of the older women. Older women usually have a broader and more tolerant outlook than some of the younger ones. I suggested that she try to interest herself in the people and their affairs. If she could show them that she cared about their everyday doings, she could perhaps interest them in the things she liked. I warned her, however, that she must proceed gently and with tact. You cannot discuss psychoanalysis with a mother whose baby has just achieved a tooth, but if you listen to her story she may listen to yours when your turn comes. In short, it was up to her to make the best of the situation in which she found herself. And that, by the way, is another of the fundamental principles of good manners: Make the best of it.

"The most wonderful letters I get are from people trying to rise above their surroundings. For three or four years I have been carrying on a correspondence with a boy in the Ohio State Prison. The only school he ever knew was the school of hard knocks, and the only manners he ever learned were those of the gang. And yet he wants to be a gentleman. He is guilty of the crime of which he is accused, but in three more years he will be free, and he wants to begin life again with a clean slate. He knows so little about the ways of gentlefolk that he does not even know what questions to ask. I have sent him copies of my books, and have tried to lay especial emphasis on the importance of character.

"I wish people would ask more questions about table manners," Miss Eichler went on; "at the table, more than anywhere else, your training shows; and yet

I get comparatively few letters asking about table conduct, probably because people are so accustomed to doing things the wrong way that it never occurs to them that there is a right way. The man who leaves his spoon in his cup of coffee or his glass of tea does not realize that he is committing a solecism of which no one with good table manners would be guilty. The man who reaches over his neighbor for a biscuit and forks it out of the plate does not know that he is wrong, any more than he does when he takes that same biscuit and sops up his plate with it.

"I cannot say too much about table manners. Other points come up only now and then; but table manners are with us three times a day, and it is most important every time we sit down to eat to do it as graciously as we can.

"I am sorry that so many of the letters I get are from women who want to know how to serve elaborate dinners. Many times I can tell, from the way they write, that they do not know how to serve simple ones. It is much more important to know how to manage a knife, fork, and spoon than it is to know what to do with a finger bowl, or how to serve a four- or five-course dinner.

"A man who comes to the table without a collar and eats with his knife has much to learn before he puts on a tuxedo and sits down to a plate with three forks on one side and an assortment of knives and spoons on the other. He may be able to get himself into shape for special occasions, but he will not be happy. He need not put on a tuxedo every day; but he should dress for dinner every day, even if it means only putting on a fresh collar. Especially should he do this if his work is of the kind where it is not possible for him to keep clean while he is at it. A man should never stay untidy after he comes home in the evening. He owes it to his family as well as to himself to be neat.

"THE question that comes in most frequently about table manners concerns the proper way to sit. In a restaurant, a lady sits opposite her escort, and if there are two couples the men sit facing each other, not as at a bridge table. At a larger table, in a home, for instance, the honor place is at the right of the host. The lady whom he escorts into the dining-room does not take his arm but walks beside him. He pulls out her chair, and places it for her while she seats herself, all of the other gentlemen doing the same for the ladies whom they have escorted. No one sits until everyone is ready.

"It is better to have the table bare, except for the soup plates, when the guests enter the dining-room and then have the maid bring in the courses, removing plates from the right and serving from the left. If there is only one maid, and the group is too large for her to serve with ease, it is best to let the host and hostess help. The roast should be placed in front of the host, the vegetables in front of the hostess, and the plates passed from him to her before they are passed on to the persons for whom they are intended. This leaves the maid free to pass the bread and see that everyone has water. Where there is no maid, all these duties must be looked after by the hostess.

"Who should begin eating first? In general, the one first served. If the party

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

s small, they all begin at practically the same time, the hostess slightly in the lead. But if the hostess is serving, and the hot courses are in danger of getting cold, the person first served begins eating as soon as those in her immediate neighborhood are served. Dishes are passed clockwise at the table, whether by a maid or not. If the hostess is serving, the lady at the host's right is looked after first; if the maid is serving, either this lady or the hostess is served first, usually the hostess.

"As for the manner of eating, the only general rules are, eat quietly and stay where you belong. Don't reach across your neighbor, and don't jog him with your elbow. Accidents should be passed over as quietly as possible.

"'GIVE me a sample of what to order from a complicated menu card when I am out to dinner with a man and the size of the check makes no difference,' a girl asks.

"In the first place, she should not give the order. That is her escort's duty. All she should do is express a preference when he consults her. Whether she knows how to manage a menu card or not, it is not good form to order too extravagant a dinner. A fruit cocktail, oysters, or soup, followed by the pièce de résistance, consisting of a roast of fowl with vegetables, and then a salad, and after that dessert and coffee is as much dinner as one needs or wants under ordinary circumstances. For a really elaborate dinner, of course, one usually orders a cocktail of fruit or oysters and soup; also an entrée to precede the main course.

"A married man asks if he should pay special attention to his wife at dinners and dances and other parties. A husband and wife should never go in to dinner together; but otherwise his status is exactly that of any other escort. The first and last dance belong to her. After that he is free, except that it is his duty to see that she is not neglected, just as if he were merely her escort. It is not good form for a man to be conspicuously attentive to his wife in public. A part of his time should be devoted to her friends, especially to the hostess.

"I get a good many hurry calls asking how to answer an invitation. An invitation is always answered, whether it is received by mail or telephone, within a week after its arrival, and it is, with one exception, always answered in kind. The exception is a telephonic invitation which is not given personally to the invited guest, and who, in turn, experiences difficulty in ringing up the sender of the invitation. In this case it is permissible to reply with a note. Formal or informal, the acceptance of an invitation should always repeat the date, the day of the week and the hour, so that there be no misunderstanding. An answer to an invitation should always be a definite 'Yes' or 'No.' 'I may come,' or 'I will come if so and so happens' are discourteous.

"A good many times the answer to a question is 'Nothing.' What else could I tell the young man who asked what he should do when he arrived at a dance, and found that he was the only person present in a tuxedo? He did, however, go on to ask how he could avoid such a situation in the future. There is no certain way, except to ask the hostess, which is entirely permissible, unless the affair is a large one and you are only slightly acquainted with her. In this case, ask someone else who is invited. If you are still in doubt, wear a business suit instead of a tuxedo. It is better to be under-dressed than over-dressed.

Bobbed Hair affords NO Concealment—

The hair's worst faults are revealed, but, happily, so are its best features. It is so easy to brighten a well worn suit with a vivid hat, a clever scarf, or a string of colorful beads. And if it was well cut in the beginning, it still has a charm of distinction which a newer suit of cheaper cut might never hold. But hair—that's quite another problem, in these days of sleek heads, unadorned. One must leave nothing undone to keep one's hair alive and shining, for in the pitiless light of day or under the evening lights, its condition is glaringly revealed. After a Golden Glint shampoo, there will be just a gleam of bronze on the smooth surface, just a hint o' gold as the light plays upon it. And you won't be disappointed at the result. 25¢ a package at drug or toilet goods counters, or direct. J. W. Kobi Co., 600C Rainier Avenue, Seattle, Washington.

"As a rule, among people who are careful of dress, the tuxedo or dinner coat is used for informal evening affairs, the full dress suit and the high silk hat for formal weddings, and other formal affairs where ladies are present."

IT MAKES no difference whether the question is broad or narrow, whether it is about the proper way to eat an egg or the proper way to christen a child, Miss Eichler has an answer for it, and the way she has learned the answers is a story in itself.

To begin with, she knows people. She has traveled over Europe and America, mingling with various types and classes. She has consulted other etiquette authorities when knotty problems have presented themselves, and she has made a special study of social life in New York, Washington, and other big centers.

The most interesting thing she has done is to trace manners back to their beginnings through toilsome hours in museums and libraries. She has read all the books on etiquette that have ever been written, and she has followed man through from the days when the proper way to propose to a lady was to hit her over the head with a club and carry her home, to his present state.

But she is not hampered by tradition. She endorses the use of the typewriter for social correspondence, and whenever a new habit is established which seems good to her, she says as much, and thousands of people follow her.

"It is fascinating to see where we get our manners," she says. "We still shake hands, because in the days when everybody carried weapons it was customary for a man to hold out his empty hand as a sign of friendship. Chaperons are a survival of the time when young girls needed guardians to keep them from being stolen.

"It is good manners to-day for the hostess to partake first of a dish, because in ancient times it was necessary for the host (they did not have so many hostesses then, for the women had to eat in the kitchen) to taste a dish first to prove to his guests that there was no poison in it.

"But these things come and go. Only the fundamental principles of good manners remain the same. They have not changed in six thousand years, and probably will not change in six thousand more. They are:

"(1) Be natural
(2) Use your common sense
(3) Take your time
(4) Don't get rattled
(5) Forget yourself
(6) Make the best of it
(7) Ask anybody"

The Adventures of an Amateur Musician

The thing I like about xylophones is their name. I never owned one. But once I sold eighteen subscriptions to a farm journal, hoping to reach twenty-five and get a xylophone free. The journal went into bankruptcy. So I not only didn't get my prize but also had to refund the money I had collected.

I might play a saxophone now, had I not got into financial difficulties with the company that made them.

The salesman came around to our house one morning, and convinced me that the saxophone was one of the easiest musical instruments to play. He pointed out the great variety of music one could make with it, and the ease with which the character of that music could be altered to suit one's mood.

I paid ten dollars down and signed a contract to pay five dollars a month until I owned the instrument.

I began to practice that night. For three days I practiced steadily, and made enough progress to impress several of the neighbors. Then the World Series came along. After that I had bronchitis. As a result I left off saxophoning for a couple of weeks. Then we moved.

As a result, I forgot my saxophone until one day a man came to the door and said he was a bill collector, and wanted the five dollars I owed on my instrument. He was pretty disagreeable because I didn't happen to have five dollars that day. With this reminder I took the saxophone out of my trunk. But I kept on thinking about the fellow who was so nasty over that paltry five dollars. I ran over "Home, Sweet Home," which I had learned to play, but found no satisfaction in the music. I laid the saxophone away.

Another month passed. The bill collector came around again and wanted five dollars more. This time he made himself such a pest that I offered to give him back the saxophone, and call it square. He refused.

WHEN I tried the saxophone again, I found my whole attention was focused on the memory of that confounded bill collector. Though not a true artist, I was normally temperamental. So I gave up the saxophone, though I still owed about seventy dollars on the one I had.

I had a lawyer friend to whom I explained my predicament. He wrote a letter for me to sign, and we shipped back the saxophone to the company. The letter claimed that I had been very ill, and would probably never be able to play the saxophone or any other instrument as long as I lived, and pointed out that the saxophone company would be ahead by accepting the saxophone. The truth was I was ill as far as saxophones went. They always make me think of bill collectors, even now.

The Great War brought me into intimate contact with the bagpipe. I was on an American ship with the British Grand

How Does Your English Impress Others?

You are sized up every day by the words you use, how you use them, your spelling, grammar, pronunciation.

Others think you are lacking in culture if you say "between you and I" instead of "between you and me;" if you use "who" for "whom" and "shall" for "will;" if you say "hosPITable" when you mean "HOSpitable," or if you make similar mistakes. Fairly or unfairly, you are judged by your English.

At last there is a way to improve your English quickly and surely. Sherwin Cody has perfected a remarkable device, which will quickly find and correct the mistakes you unconsciously make.

Already over 50,000 individuals in every walk of life have used this invention. It is so remarkably successful, because it concentrates on the formation of correct habits. There is no hard study. Only fifteen minutes a day is required, over a short period, and the instruction is guaranteed to improve your English to your satisfaction, or it costs you nothing.

Fleet. We were afraid to go on leave. Some people had been away when the Germans came out and fought at Jutland. They missed the big party, and never forgave themselves.

One day I got so disgusted with the war that I had to go down to London and enjoy myself.

In the course of the evening I fell in with a Scotchman whom I had known in Coronation days, when the American Squadron went over. Being half Scotch, I spoke the same language. Being all Scotch, he agreed that we should go ahead with the evening, each paying his own way.

Along about midnight his money gave out. By one o'clock he was in debt to me several pounds. By two o'clock my own finances began to get low. I brought the matter to his attention. I remember that we attracted some public notice by our argument. Presently he said:

"I have a bagpipe in my hotel room. We'll go and get it. I will give it to you for all I owe you, and one-half that you've got left."

I borrowed a pencil and tried to figure out where I would stand after this transaction.

The crowd somehow caught the spirit of the occasion, and insisted that we all go up and get the bagpipe. I closed the deal by shaking hands with the Scotchman. From that moment until four-thirty A. M. I owned a bagpipe.

I regret to say that I never had a chance to play on it. What happened was we all went to the hotel for the bagpipe, and then got the Scotchman to play it when we returned to the night club where we were having our party. As there were special war laws against riotous life after midnight, the management objected when the Scotchman began to tune up.

This offended me and several other Americans, so we formed a cordon about him while he kept on playing. As he was very patriotic he marched back and forth, bumping into us as he skirled.

This situation continued more or less acutely until four-thirty A. M. when the manager enlisted reinforcements, who rushed us and took away the Scotchman with my bagpipe. This is the nearest I ever came to playing on the bagpipe.

RIGHT next to the station in the country where I commute is a music store. About two years ago they had a sale of Hawaiian guitars. While waiting for the train one morning, the dealer explained to me how simple it was to master one of these instruments. "You see," he said, "you pick the string and then run this little jigger up and down until the sound is what you want."

I laid one of them on my knee and at his direction picked the string. Sure enough as I moved the jigger up and down with my left hand the most gratifyingly doleful whine emerged from inside the instrument.

That night when I returned, I stopped in and fiddled with the Hawaiian guitar some more. It certainly looked as though my quest were ended. Here was an instrument easy to play, satisfying to the soul and within reach of my purse. Finally I bought one and took it home. Stationing my wife across the room, with her eyes averted, I sat and stroked my new treasure.

After a bit she said, "Why did you do that?"

I said, "Because I am happy."

She said, "I prefer divorce to that agony. I think the children will want to come with me."

I tried for several days to win her over, but without success.

Thus I reached a crisis in my life. I had to choose between my wife and the Hawaiian guitar. It seemed tough.

I don't know how I would have chosen had not a more serious factor entered the scene at that moment. The cook came and gave notice.

"I don't like them noises your husband makes," she told my wife. This time there was no choice. Next day I traded the guitar to a friend of mine for a patent tire-tester.

IN MY early thirties through a curious freak of fortune I became the proud possessor of a piano. It was like this: The wife had gone to visit her mother. She took the babies with her, and left me alone to hold the fort.

The first few days everything was fine and dandy. I threw ashes on the carpets and smoked before breakfast, and had a good time generally. Then, bang, all the fun went out of it.

About the fourth night I called up a good scout named Ed Halligan, and explained my troubles.

"All slept out and smoked out, Ed," I said. "What do you suggest?"

"Give a party," he said.

I figured for a moment. "It's got to be soon, Ed. The family will be back Sunday."

"Leave it to me," he commanded.

Well, as stag parties go, that one wasn't anything to be ashamed of. We had a caterer and lots of food. Afterward everybody made speeches. Also, Ed hired an orchestra. It was this orchestra that caused trouble.

"Where's the piano?" asked the leader.

Ed turned to me. "Yes, where is it?"

"We haven't any," I said, feeling my face get red. "We are poor people who have to decide between a piano and a car."

"I'll get mine," said Ed. "Leave it to me."

I won't go into the details. I don't know them all, anyway. I was host and had to attend to the rest of the party. At any rate, when the gang finally got Ed's piano into the front room they had trampled down the wife's favorite flower garden, knocked a pillar off the front porch, taken the front door off and put it back upside down with the glass out of it. (We had to nail a rug over the place to keep the wind out.)

But the orchestra leader seemed satisfied, and we had a lot of music. We had planned to ask the wives in to dance during the evening. But on second thought, most of the crowd decided the ladies had better not see the wreckage.

Ed promised to send a couple of repair men over first thing in the morning.

When the bell rang at eight I went down to give orders.

Imagine my dismay to find myself facing the wife.

"Hurricane or riot?" she asked tersely. "Or did a fire truck try to drive in our front door?"

"None of them," I replied, with not a little dignity.

"What's Andy Blair Doing Now?"

Bill*—"Haven't you heard? He's the new sales-manager for Hess & Schoble and they say his salary is $7500 a year."

Tom*—"He certainly has come up fast. He wasn't getting over $50 a week the last time I saw him. How'd he do it?"

Bill*—"Took up a course with the I. C. S. and studied at night. That's why the old crowd hasn't seen so much of him in the last few years. I wish I'd had the sense to do it too. I'd be making more money right now if I had."

Why don't you study and get ready for promotion too? We'll be glad to help you if you will only make the start. And the way to do that is easy.

Why let your feet dictate to you ~?

THERE is no reason why foot discomfort or weakness should limit your activities even though you want to wear the smartest shoes.

THE ARCH PRESERVER SHOE

is always in the very forefront of the current mode — its styles are designed by New York and Paris artists — but, in addition, it provides a correct and natural walking base.

Your attractively shod feet are not abused in the Arch Preserver Shoe. The concealed, built-in arch bridge gives a natural support to the delicate foot structure, and the flat inner sole, crosswise, permits the nerves and blood-vessels to function freely. Your feet and your children's feet deserve this shoe.

"What then?"

"Oh, just a little party, dear. Come in, and I'll explain everything."

For reply she turned and hailed the taxi man, who was unloading her bags on the sidewalk:

"Put them back, driver," she said. To me she added, "You can reach me at Mother's," and left.

I called up Ed Halligan right away, and blamed him for the whole thing.

"Never mind, old man," he finally said. "You keep the piano, and we'll call it square."

Well, I did keep the piano, and the wife came back. She didn't go home. (They don't, you know.)

I STARTED right in to learn to play. But after a week I gave up. It was too much of a strain. Then, one day in the public library, I saw a blind man reading Braille. That gave me an idea. I went home and began to work on the piano's black notes. They are raised, just like Braille. To my joy, I discovered they are so spaced that you can pick out any tune easily on them. Moreover, they aren't all stuck together like the white ones, which makes it so hard to hit one white note without smearing two or three others.

I did most of my experimenting while the wife was out. I wanted to surprise her. I did surprise her all right, when I gave a demonstration; but not in the way I had expected.

But before I played for her I looked through the hymn book, which has very simple music in it, and picked out some bass chords to go with my top notes. To my delight I found some that were all on the black notes. Thus I had a complete system that not only sounded splendidly to me, but enabled me to play practically any tune with one hand and rattle off an accompaniment with the other.

I felt I was on the verge of realizing my lifelong dream. I could see again more vividly than ever that untarnished picture in my mind's desire:

"Oh, do play!" The eager silence, etc.

But I couldn't forget that the piano represented a stain on my otherwise lily-white reputation with my wife. I had to prove first to her that it was worth while our having got it.

That night I said, "I can play on the piano."

She looked at me for a moment. She took me over by the light and looked hard at me. Then she said quietly, "All right, let's hear you."

I sat down and did wonders on the black keys. I played "Old Black Joe" and "Sweet Genevieve" and "Boola Boola." Then I launched into "The End of a Perfect Day." I put all I had on the ball. Honestly, tears came to my eyes as I played. I thought back to the days when I asked the little woman to marry me, how she backed and filled until I nearly died of heart failure; and then said "Yes" one sweet May afternoon.

My eyes blurred so I couldn't see the keys. I stopped and turned to the "little woman." I thought her arms might be about my neck ere now.

She was sitting quietly where I had left her. She said, "What's the joke?"

"What?" I almost sobbed.

"I said, 'What's the joke?'" she repeated.

Takes all Weariness Out of Your Feet

IF your feet are naturally tender, any unusual stress, such as golfing, dancing, shopping, long hours of standing, or a lengthy walk, tires them and makes them ache, swell and burn.

Use Dr. Scholl's Foot Balm and you can start out fresh again immediately. It stimulates the circulation, relieves congestion, takes the soreness out of the muscles and joints, and gives the feet a cool and restful feeling.

That is why Dr. Scholl's Foot Balm is so effective and used by many people for stiffened joints, muscular soreness, sprains, neuralgic-like pains, etc. The pores welcome its soothing, healing properties. It is powerfully penetrating and analgesic, and reaches deeply into the tissues.

I turned back to the piano, laid my arms on the keys and buried my face.

After that blow, I went into a sort of decline. I gave up music altogether. I couldn't bear the sight of any musical instrument. It was kind of neurosis, or psychosis, or whatever you call it.

When someone gave me an oboe for Christmas as a joke, I put it away and didn't even try it. (A couple of days later I took it out, but it was pretty awful. So I gave it to the boy.)

I GOT all run down. I lost weight. My friends told me I was looking bad. The wife said I was working too hard and ought to take a vacation. None of them knew the real secret:

It was my soul aching away inside of me, as it always had.

The family medico gave me a tonic. I ate eggs and drank milk, and took deep breathing exercises by radio before breakfast. But they didn't help. Eggs and milk and fresh air aren't soul food.

The climax came when the gang at the club persuaded me to go and have a complete physical examination, X-ray, chemical, biological, meteorological, and all the rest of it.

The ordeal took five specialists and cost sixty dollars, not counting subway fare and lost time. It scared me out of ten years of my life. But the total answer was only: "You are normal. You just need exercise and diversion."

They didn't even mention my soul. I guess the X-ray failed to show I had one.

"Exercise and diversion." I remember the words kept strumming through my poor head as I wandered up the street. The traffic stopped me near a crowded corner. It was a lovely spring day, just the day to bring one's soul out and air it.

Suddenly there smote upon my ear the strains of the "Marseillaise." I felt a thrill prickle up my tired back muscles. Gay strains of "I Love a Lassie" followed.

Stirred, I turned to seek the source of this wonderful music.

I soon found it: an Italian with rings in his ears, seated on a box and pumping away on a big accordion.

Exercise and diversion!

There they both were! And music!

It looked so easy—and sounded so beautiful!

I rushed to the nearest music store. I laid my cards on the table: three ten dollar bills. "Give me the biggest and best accordion this money will buy!" I told the clerk.

That was six months ago. Now I am leading a new life. My color has come back. I have gained fourteen pounds. I can play twelve tunes on my accordion. It is even easier to play than I expected. And my soul fairly revels in it.

My dream come true?

To all purposes, yes. But not exactly. For my conservatory is the rear attic, and the main audience my four children, the youngest of whom is most insistent that I play.

She doesn't say, "Oh, do play!" as I dreamed; but phrases it with her own childish grace, "Please make that 'cordion noise, Da-da!"

Tired... before the day's tasks begin!

Auto-Intoxication, self-poisoning, keeps thousands of men from doing their best work.

THE American business man is a good provider. He wants his family to have the best—and he works long and late to get it for them.

But the day is all too short for the insistent demands that crowd upon him. He eats hastily, takes his exercise in spurts and rests himself badly. In the rush, rush, rush of these quick-step times, he neglects the simple a-b-c's of health. And so, often in the morning, he feels tired even before the day's tasks begin.

The most common result of these ill-adjusted habits is stoppage of waste products in the intestines. This is the start of a host of ills. For when the food we eat is not promptly and thoroughly eliminated it starts to ferment and to set up poisons which are spread through the body by the blood. This is a form of self-poisoning popularly called Auto-Intoxication.

Auto-Intoxication is usually the real cause of dull headaches, depressing fatigue, indigestion, biliousness and many, many other ills of life.

To guard against Auto-Intoxication stoppage must be prevented. The approved way to do this is the use of Sal Hepatica, the standard, effervescent saline.

Sal Hepatica promptly clears the intestines of the products of waste and helps keep the blood pure. Dissolved in a tumblerful of water it makes a sparkling, palatable drink.

You may take Sal Hepatica on arising, or if you prefer, half an hour before any meal.

Send for our new booklet that tells more about Auto-Intoxication and its relation to the common ills of life.

Fate Handed Him a Lot of Lemons—during the week and all day Sunday.

"But one day the manager nearly bowled me over by telling me he was going to give me a week off. He was going to put on 'East Lynne,' which, as you know, is a serious drama without any comedy in it. So my services weren't needed.

"Well, I was all excited over the prospect of a week with nothing to do. I figured and figured, trying to make up my mind as to what would be the ideal way of spending my wonderful vacation. Finally, I hit on the idea of going down the Potomac River on a fishing trip. So I bought a rod and tackle and all the fixings —I was bent on doing the thing right. Sunday morning I got dressed up in my fishing togs and was all ready to start, when the manager came to my boarding-house in a panic. It seemed that the man who was to act the part of the villain had got sick. I was informed that I would have to cancel my fishing trip and play his rôle.

"Naturally, I was terribly disappointed at losing my vacation; but at the same time I was tickled to death at the opportunity of showing what I could do with a really serious part. Well, they hustled me to the theatre, and I rehearsed all Sunday and Sunday night, and all Monday, so as to be ready to go on Monday evening. They brought in a tailor and a wigmaker to make me over. The shoemaker put high heels on my shoes to give me height. The tailor padded my shoulders. The wigmaker put extra hair on my head to make me tall. And the stage manager, assisted by the rest of the troupe, kept hammering the lines into my head.

"ON Monday night I was the first person in the theatre—on hand early, so as to get a good make-up. I admired myself in the glass and had to admit I was an ideal villain. My hair was a little gray at the temples; I had heavy eyebrows and a waxed mustache—everything that goes to make up a perfect villain. Also, I was letter perfect in the part. I felt that at last I was coming into my own.

"But the manager, in an unguarded moment, went out front and told the audience that the gentleman who regularly played the villain had been taken suddenly ill, and that the part would be played by 'your favorite comedian, Mr. Billy B. Van.' The audience immediately thought the part was to be funny, and started to laugh.

"My first speech, as I entered the center door at the home of Lady Isabel and removed my high hat, was 'Good evening, Lady Isabel.' Instantly the audience started to scream. From then on, every dramatic line I spoke, they laughed at. I got sore, because I was doing my best to play the part seriously, and the actors had told me at the last rehearsal that I was good. But the audience howled their heads off at me all the way through the show.

"That was my one and only attempt at playing a serious part. Finding that the public would accept me only as a clown, I made up my mind to make my audiences forget their troubles by acting as if I didn't know what troubles were.

"Well, I did just that, and twelve years later, as I've already told you, I broke down with tuberculosis and found myself stranded in Boston. Maybe you also recall my good luck in stopping at a hotel whose owner shooed me off to the New Hampshire woods.

"My long rest in the New Hampshire air made a new man of me in more ways than one. Lying there, month after month, with nothing to do but think, had sort of given me a line on myself. I got wise to the fact that the only way to get a good future is to pick one ahead of time. But, being undersized and therefore extra-ambitious, I picked two futures: I wanted to be a good comedian, and I wanted to make soap.

"SUCCESS in my profession began to come my way in proportion to the seriousness with which I took my work. Because, as every experienced comedian has discovered, the secret of comedy is seriousness. An actor may get a moderate number of laughs by being silly; but if he expects to hold his audience he's got to win their sympathy. And a sure way of doing this is to pretend to be in a terrible fix. If he's scared to death, it's perfect.

"A jumpy little man who gets bawled out by a big policeman has the audience on his side instantly. That's why in so many musical shows I've had a great big 'straight' man to dominate me. More times than I could ever count, my friend Jim Corbett has handed me the audience's affection by simply threatening to rid the earth of me with his little finger.

"But, no matter how good an actor may be, and no matter how big a reputation he may build up, the moment he takes off his make-up and walks out of the stage door, he's through. Once he quits the footlights, his popularity is worth about as much as last year's straw hat.

"The other day, I saw, walking up Broadway in the rain, with her heels run down and the lower part of her dress all wet, an actress who used to be famous. When I was a property boy, it took me half an hour to carry in her flowers.

"You can see why I wanted to create something dependable outside the theatre, something that would be permanent. And it seemed to me that my soap idea was It —if I could ever put it across.

"The first thing to do was to study chemistry. As I had very little spare time and no laboratory, I thought I'd begin by reading up on the subject. When I was familiar enough with the chemical elements to call them by their initials, and had some notion of how they behaved, I decided to meet some of them personally. So I bought a little brass kettle and an alcohol lamp and started experimenting. Even when I was on tour in shows I had my 'apparatus' with me. Sometimes the air in my dressing-room was thick with fumes from the stuff I was brewing.

"On and off, for about fifteen years, I experimented with that little old kettle,

"How Can I Ever Thank You!"

TWO months ago Myra's pretty dress would have been an impossibility, the flowers she so loves an unthinkable extravagance. Myra earned a good salary—an unusually good salary for a girl so young—but there were always more places to put the money than money to put in the places. The rent, a food allowance to her mother, clothes and spending money for the sister in high school, more clothes and spending money for little brother—and how he did go through his stockings! Figure it as she would, there was never anything left at the end of the month for Myra's own clothes, for theaters or amusements of any kind. Myra worried and figured, looked tired and older than her years. And then one night she picked up the Woman's Home Companion and it opened at a page she had never seen before. The next day's mail brought me her letter asking about the work of the Pin Money Club.

That was two months ago. Yesterday I had another letter from her and this is what she said:

> Thank you for the beautiful ring! It came yesterday and I am wearing it so proudly. The stone just matches the new dress I bought with last week's earnings and I shall think of you always when I wear them. Your work has meant so much to me. Pretty dresses, jewelry, parties—oh, how can I ever thank you enough!

MYRA is only one of the thousands of girls and women who have found in the Pin Money Club the magic road to happiness. P. M. C. dollars are furnishing many charming homes. They are putting boys and girls through colleges and universities. They are bringing back health to tired little bodies.

There is something you want—something you have long wanted! Write me today. I will tell you all about our Club, the Companion's money-making department that makes dreams come true for everyone.

but I never seemed to get any nearer to finding a formula for a cake of soap. I gave up animal fats and tried milder-smelling vegetable oils, and still I couldn't arrive at anything that would solidify. The trouble was that the pine oil, which was my Star Performer, acted temperamentally and ruined the whole show. The vegetable oils couldn't solidify when it was around.

"If I had been a professional chemist, I probably would have been convinced that the thing was impossible. I guess 'most any sensible man would have given it up. But as I was a comedian fiddling with a kettle in my spare moments—well, I kept on fiddling.

"It seems as though the few times in my life that I've been sick have been good-luck times for me. When I was playing in Kansas City with a musical comedy called 'The Rainbow Girl,' I wasn't feeling very well, and I asked the manager of my hotel to get me a good doctor. He spoke to Dr. Samuel C. James, dean of the Kansas City medical college, who chanced to be in the hotel, and asked him to recommend someone. Doctor James very kindly offered to attend me himself, although he had retired from general practice. And I'm certainly glad he made an exception in my favor, because my getting acquainted with him in that way was the beginning of a friendship of years.

"Noticing him eying my array of bottles and my old brass kettle, I confessed that I was an amateur chemist, and I asked him some technical questions. It was the first chance I'd ever had to talk to a real authority. I guess he must have been surprised at a 'funny man' asking him about chemical reactions. But he wasn't the least bit patronizing, and as soon as I was feeling all right again, he introduced me to the head of the department of chemistry in the college. Then I had the thrill of seeing the inside of a real laboratory. What a collection of bottles, test tubes and retorts! I wished my little brass kettle could have seen it too!

"Talking with these two brilliant men made me realize that my knowledge of chemistry was a joke. I asked them what could be done to cure an acute case of ignorance, and they prescribed a list of books, which I took in regular doses during the balance of the tour of 'The Rainbow Girl.' And at the end of my season, I went back to Kansas City and spent two months and a half working in the college laboratory under the instruction of Doctor James. It was as enjoyable a summer as I ever put in.

"WHEN autumn came, and I stepped back into the baggy pants, I kidded myself that these unimpressive garments contained a chemist. But my tea-kettle experiments produced no better results than before. The pine oil still dissolved every soap mixture I tried it on. Besides, I knew now that better and taller men than I had been bitten with the same notion about incorporating pine essence in a cake of soap, and they had all given it up as hopeless.

"But one day, while I was riding in a friend's automobile, I got Idea No. 2. We were going along at a pretty good clip, when suddenly a car shot out from a hidden driveway and we almost had a collision. What saved us was the brakes.

Born tired

I CAN'T seem to get things done. Sometimes I think I was born tired."

He looks it—this man who used to set the pace for the others. Now he is slumped in his chair, talking defeat.

He wasn't born tired. He was born rather exceptionally lively. He brought to manhood a hard, well-muscled, active body, developed through years of training for school boy games. Then, on the eve of the biggest game—the game of earning a living and winning success—he went out of training.

The stored-up energy of school and college days carried him along for years, while he ate indiscriminately, let regular exercise go by the board, and cut in on his sleep with work or pleasure. Then he came to depend, more and more, on caffein to combat "that tired feeling."

Caffein excites the nerves, and repels sleep. It seems to give new energy, but this "new" energy is withdrawn from the body's reserve store.

Bit by bit the reserve may be lowered. A depleted reserve leaves a man on the ragged edge. He is born tired.

It is so unwise—so needless. All the benefits of a hot drink can be enjoyed—the social qualities, the invigorating warmth, the fine flavor—with none of the penalties of caffein. Hundreds of thousands of men have found that this is true. They use Postum. A drink made of whole wheat and bran, roasted—wholesome as the grain itself.

The best way to judge what it will do for you is to make a thirty-day test. Experience the relief from drug stimulation long enough to see results. Then decide.

Carrie Blanchard, food demonstrator, makes this offer to help you start the test:

Carrie Blanchard's Offer

"Let me send you one week's supply of Postum, free, and my personal directions for preparing it, as a start on the 30-day test.

"Or if you would rather begin the test today, get Postum at your grocer's. It costs much less than most other mealtime drinks—only one-half cent a cup.

"Please indicate on the coupon whether you prefer Instant Postum, made instantly in the cup, or Postum Cereal, the kind you boil."

Postum is one of the Post Health Products, which include also Grape-Nuts, Post Toasties, Post's Bran Flakes and Post's Bran Chocolate. Your grocer sells Postum in two forms. Instant Postum made in the cup by adding boiling water, is one of the easiest drinks in the world to prepare. Postum Cereal is also easy to make, but should be boiled 20 minutes.

My friend just put his foot on a pedal, and the car slowed down from about thirty-five miles an hour to a dead stop. That gave me my idea. I saw that what I needed was a 'brake' for pine oil.

"So I set about finding what's known in the books as a retarding agent. I tried dozens of them. And then one night, when I was stopping at a hotel where the rooms had three kinds of running water—hot, cold, and ice water—I poured out the contents of my kettle into a bowlful of ice water and the stuff solidified!

"I had my formula, and I had my cake of soap!

"I took my discovery to a large chemical concern in Cincinnati. They were as astonished as if the tattooed man in a circus had come to them with a method for making diamonds. The president of the company, Mr. A. G. Schwartz, and the head chemist, Professor Dock, were wonderfully kind to me.

"To prove to them that my soap wasn't phony, I handed them the formula, and invited them to have their own men make a few cakes 'on me.' And they found that it worked. But the experts came back at me with some very valuable suggestions, as to how it might be improved. So we spent a number of days doing to the formula what you have to do to a show after the out-of-town opening before it's ready to come in to Broadway. I mean, we kept tinkering with it till it seemed as right as it could be made.

"ONE day, after I had the thing perfected, I asked Mr. Schwartz if he would advise me to go into the soap business. He answered me by asking if I had any money.

"'No,' I replied.

"'Well,' he said, 'the reason I asked you is this: If you had a million dollars, I would advise you to stay out; but as you have nothing, I advise you to go into it.'

"Solomon himself never handed out any truer wisdom than this old gentleman's advice to me. For if I had had a million dollars I would have wasted it. As it was, I put the thing over practically without capital.

"In place of cash, I had something just as valuable—good will. The public and I had been on friendly terms for fifty years. The audiences I had played to in that long period of time totaled about fifteen million people, and at every performance I was getting acquainted with over a thousand more.

"Figuring that folks who had seen me on the stage might get a grin or two if they heard my voice on the radio, I got up a contest that was broadcast first from Station WNAC in Boston. Every day I'd ask four questions, such as 'What would you do if you were living in the middle of the ocean and somebody presented you with an automobile?' and, 'What would you do if someone presented you with a hundred thousand green bananas?'

"The contestants would have to answer in verse, mentioning either Billy B. Van, or my soap, or both. They sent in verses by the thousands, and some of them were mighty clever. Every day I'd pick out a daily dozen of the best answers and read them to my radio audience, and I'd send each of the twelve authors a box of soap with my compliments.

"Every letter that came was filed and numbered, and at the end of the contest, all numbers were put into a hat and a child drew out the prize-winning ones. The prizes were radio sets, loud speakers, and so forth. To console the many thousands of people who had taken part but hadn't drawn prizes, I sent each a cake of soap and a letter of thanks.

"During this first contest, a touching thing happened: I got a letter from a little crippled boy named Joey Arnstein, who was in the Children's Hospital. Joey's letter told what it was like to lie strapped on a board, and what a treat it was to be able to listen to the radio.

"I read the letter to my unseen audience, and I said, 'You folks who have nothing to do, go out and see him.' Next day people went to the hospital in droves, and the place was a mass of flowers.

"Six months later, when I was playing in Chicago, the stage-door man tapped at my dressing-room and said there was a boy asking to see me. It was Joey! He'd been strapped to the board for ten years, and now he was cured and back in his home town. To-day Joey is one of my star assistants.

"By the end of my first year in business, I'd sold a million cakes of soap and my product was being carried by more than ten thousand stores."

I ASKED Mr. Van if he had had time to do any acting during that strenuous year.

"I played forty-four weeks, and spent seven weeks rehearsing," he told me. "While I was on tour I regarded every city I played in as territory to be conquered for my soap. My mornings and afternoons were free, except when I had matinées, or was speaking on the radio, and I spent them calling at stores and offices.

"I found I was a pretty good salesman. My name would generally get me into the office of the man I wanted to see. But when I'd spring my story, he'd tighten up. Usually, however, before I left I'd get an order from him."

"Are you going to keep on with your stage stuff?" I asked Mr. Van.

"Sure! I get too much fun out of cheering folks up with foolishness to give it up. Maybe I ought to be more dignified, now that I'm half a business man," he said with a chuckle; "but I'm not made that way. I take my work seriously, but not myself. I once knew an actor who had a fur coat. He took it so seriously it bit him. I don't want ever to be like that.

"If I ever get too old to caper around on the stage," Mr. Van went on, "I'll live up at my headquarters in Newport, New Hampshire. I have a sort of model farm up there and a herd of pedigreed cows. I claim they're the only laughing cows in the world. With their kind assistance, I furnish certified milk for all the youngsters in town—including my own two.

"I have a weakness for Newport, anyway. That's the place I went to when I thought I was done for. Aside from its being a delightful spot, I like it because it represents bad luck that became good luck. It was there I learned my pet rule of life, which is this:

"'Accept the lemons that Fate gives you and use them to open up a lemonade stand.'"

The Most Remarkable Coincidence I Ever Heard Of

FIRST PRIZE

After Eighteen Years We Met Again

WHEN I was twelve years old, I lived on a farm bordering on the Arkansas River. On Sunday afternoons, during the summer months, all the neighborhood boys used to meet to go swimming.

One day, a bunch of us were boasting about our strokes, strength, and endurance, and my voice was the loudest and most confident of all when Andrew, a boy about eighteen years old, proposed a swim to the opposite shore.

Andrew advised me to stick to words and safe waters; but when four of the older boys struck out I followed, and I kept up with them until I was in midstream. Then I was caught by the current and made no headway. I lost my head and went down. I came up yelling and choking. I went down again. The next thing I remember I was being rolled and pommeled, and I opened my eyes to see Andrew's white face bending over me. When he saw I was out of danger, boy-fashion, he snapped out, "Next time, I guess you won't bite off more'n you can chew."

The next year I moved with my parents to Colorado.

In 1925 my wife and I were spending our honeymoon in California. One Sunday afternoon we were lolling on the beach at Ocean Park, and I was watching a swimmer quite far out. Suddenly I realized he was in trouble. I plunged in to go to the stranger's aid. He fortunately did not lose his head, so I had little trouble in bringing him to shore.

As he lay on the sand, panting to gain his lost wind, he gasped, "That's one time I bit off more'n I could chew."

At my feet lay Andrew. I had saved him, just as he had saved me eighteen years before. C. N. C.

SECOND PRIZE

We Surprised Each Other but Not as We Expected

MY SISTER and I had not seen each other for fifteen years, as she was living in New York and I in California. We had often planned a visit, but money was pretty scarce in both our homes, so our plans had never materialized.

And then, last spring, a stroke of luck made the long-delayed visit possible. I decided to make it a surprise, so I arrived unannounced in New York City after five days of travel, spent in joyful anticipation of our long-deferred meeting. It is well that I got some joy out of it beforehand, for there was to be no meeting. My sister's landlady informed me my sister had gone nearly a week before on her three-weeks vacation, and had left no address. I knew I could not wait for her return. Sadder but wiser, I made the return journey.

And, in the meantime, as the comics say, my sister had a bit of luck of her own. She decided to use the fruits of this luck to visit me. And she, too, believed that a surprise would give spice to the affair. So on the very day, almost in the same hour that I was sorrowfully receiving the news of her absence, she was ringing my door bell. Of course no one answered. My neighbor, who could have told her, and perhaps straightened out the tangle, had gone to Long Beach for the week. So there was nowhere to go but home. She went.

Somewhere along their way the great engines that were hurrying us back to our humdrum lives and work passed each other, just as they had passed a week before, hurrying us to what each supposed would be such a happy reunion.

We have not yet renewed our acquaintance, but we have both sworn off surprises for life. G. L. P.

THIRD PRIZE

I Had an Appointment with a Stranger in a Strange City, and Ran Right into Him!

THE most "striking," coincidence o- which I have personal knowledge, involved the writer some years ago.

In 1917 I was traveling for the M. I. T. Co., of Meriden, Connecticut, and one Monday in May of that year was instructed to meet a Mr. David Stanley, who represented a large Waterbury concern, at eleven A. M., at the Hotel Taft, New Haven, on the following Thursday.

On Thursday I was in Hartford, and made the trip to New Haven in my car. Although late in leaving, I managed to pass about everything on the road, and arriving at State Street, in New Haven, at ten-forty A. M., was just congratulating myself on being in time for the appointment, when it happened. A large red touring car shot out of a cross street on my right. It came out plumb in front of me and, there being no possible way to avoid it, I didn't. We piled into each other like a couple of war tanks.

By some miracle, neither of us was injured, just shaken up enough to stage the inevitable "blahing" contest that follows every motor accident.

Finally, after cooling down a trifle, I admitted that he was my right-hand traffic, and, to that extent at least, the fault was mine.

I then flourished an M. I. T. Co. card carrying my name, Edward P. Johnson, in the lower left-hand corner. My adversary drew out a telegram and passed it over to me.

This is what I read:

WATERBURY, CONN., 5-9-17

MR. DAVID STANLEY, HOTEL GREEN, BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

Don't fail meet Johnson M. I. T. Co. Taft New Haven Thursday 11 A. M.

Then we both laughed. E. P. J.

Four Heroes and a Heroine of Whom You Have Never Heard

said Doctor Holmes, "that I had Grandmother tell me that story a hundred times. I could actually see the old preacher with his glass. I could feel what he went through, and if ever boy worshiped a hero I worshiped that one.

"I asked myself: 'If he could do that with half an eye, what can't I do with both eyes?'

"Many a time in later life, as I faltered and fought back the impulse to drift, I thought of that preacher and his big glass. I didn't dare to quit. If I had, that old fellow with his half an eye would have haunted me."

The second hero was of a different stripe. He was six feet in height, handsome of face and form, with the physique of a college athlete. In fact, he had been to college for two years; and at Mt. Airy he taught the three-room village school. His name was John C. Eversull. A well-read man, simple in his tastes, a kindly and a humble man. For some reason he had never married. By summer he farmed; by winter he taught. An odd figure in the village, this learned farmer and teacher. Folks said he was cut out for big things, that the world some day would hear of him. Yet he never left the village, nor quit his self-allotted tasks. He died, at fifty-eight, still a farmer and village schoolmaster.

"The satisfaction in living right," he would say, "is far greater than the pleasure of living in luxury.

"Some day, you'll learn," he told young Holmes once, "that even the influence of the greatest man is small when put side by side with the combined influences of many who make no pretense at greatness."

He meant that the good started on its way by a hundred little men weighs heavier in the balance of time than the good of one great man, because the little men's good takes a hundred and then ten hundred different directions. He preferred to be one of the hundred.

"A GOOD many years passed," said Doctor Holmes, "before I began to see the grain of truth in this philosophy. I had a notion, when I entered the ministry, that I would be able to move men to big things by the power of a single big speech, or sermon. I strove for that big sermon. At a stroke, it was to turn a thousand sinners into a thousand saints.

"Then, slowly, in the light of actual results, a new view dawned on me: In practice, among the hundreds who listened, I found my sermon was worth its effort if it reached the heart of but one. The others listened and, maybe, I hoped, they had been helped a little. There was no way of measuring, no way of determining the result.

"It is so in life. Each day you work,

Why physicians advise Nujol

1 A lubricant is better than a laxative
2 Nujol is not habit-forming
3 It's a more natural method
4 Does not cause distress
5 It is non-irritating
6 Nujol gives lasting relief

BY an overwhelming verdict, doctors all over the United States have endorsed the use of the Nujol type of treatment for constipation, in preference to dangerous drug-containing laxatives.

Among thousands interviewed, seven doctors out of ten condemned the continued use of laxatives and cathartics as injurious, habit-forming, irritating, and inflaming to the intestinal tract, weakening its natural functions.

Eight doctors out of ten advised the Nujol type of treatment. Why? For the six convincing reasons mentioned above. The source of this warning is authoritative.

Won't you act on it at once?

Nujol acts entirely differently from irritating laxatives and cathartics. For it contains no drugs, no medicine. Its action is mechanical. It merely softens the dried waste matter in the intestines and lubricates the passage so that elimination is regular, natural, and thorough.

Nujol appeals to the medical men because it is a simple, scientific and safe remedy for constipation, no matter how severe the case may be. It is gentle in its action and pleasant to take. Children love it!

Get Nujol from your druggist today. Doctors advise it for constipation whether chronic or temporary.

"For SEVEN ways to benefit our menfolks Handiest thing in the house"
Said 2000 women

A TREMENDOUS number of men are regular users of "Vaseline" Petroleum Jelly for:

Dandruff—Massage the scalp thoroughly twice a week with "Vaseline" Jelly. Leave on over night and shampoo.

First-Aid—Apply locally to cuts, wounds, sores, burns, bites, stings, blisters, etc.

Colds—Snuff up nostrils and if you have a tickling cough, take internally.

Hair slicking—To keep the hair in place, looking shiny and well groomed, slightly dampen the hair, spread a bit of "Vaseline" Jelly over the palms of the hands, apply to the hair and then brush briskly.

Softening Hands—Hands roughened from outdoor life, golf, etc., can be made soft and smooth by massaging gently with "Vaseline" Jelly before washing.

Sporting equipment—To prevent rust on guns, golf clubs, skates, etc., cover with a layer of "Vaseline" Jelly before putting them away. Rub down leather goods such as saddles, boots, harness with "Vaseline" Jelly to dress the leather.

Shoes—Men's golf shoes are always getting wet. Apply "Vaseline" Jelly liberally and rub well into the leather. Dancing shoes of patent leather should be polished with "Vaseline" Jelly before each wearing.

"Vaseline" Jelly is a splendid emollient. There is no other product exactly like it. It can be bought absolutely everywhere in jars or tubes. Men like the handy tube. And remember when you buy that the trademark "Vaseline" on the package gives you the assurance that you are getting the genuine product of the Chesebrough Manufacturing Company, Cons'd.

striving for an ideal. At first, you are impatient. You expect to attain your goal in a single brilliant rush; the rush is made and yet the goal remains distant, for you have gained but a single step. Eventually, chastened by experience, you begin to realize that it will take many rushes, many days, before the objective is reached.

"Then perhaps you come to see that, in the grand total, the hundred days of a hundred little victories will far overbalance the one big day with its big victory."

The village teacher saw all this, and he lived by it.

"I lay awake at night," Doctor Holmes confessed, "admiring that teacher. I said to myself, 'If only I could be like him!' I even wanted the neighbors to say when I passed, as they did when the teacher passed, 'How big and strong he is!'"

The boy, his teeth set, began to emulate the teacher. You will remember that in the summers the teacher worked on a farm. There was a potato patch on the little farm Josephine Holmes rented, and it was worked by a neighbor on shares. Young Holmes got work in that potato patch. He was cautioned not to overdo himself, reminded that he wasn't strong.

"I'll do as much as any other boy could," he retorted.

It was planting time. He had to tug hard to carry a full bucket of potatoes, which had to be dropped into the hills and covered. The bail of the bucket cut into his arm until the flesh was raw. With a wad of rags he covered the spot and, unwhimpering, toted his bucket until sundown. He did this until the patch was planted.

He sought more farm work. He stowed away wheat sheaves in a hot, dusty barn loft until he was ready to drop; but he shut his teeth and didn't drop. He bedded down the horses; he learned to milk, to swing an ax and a brush scythe. He was as good as any boy, he told himself. He stopped his ears against the neighborhood whisperings. When there was a ball game, he was in it.

FOUR years of this, and Arthur Holmes weighed one hundred and sixty pounds. He was the pitcher for the local ball team. Any farmer within walking distance was ready to give him work for the asking, and gladly. He was big for his age, husky as the best of 'em. The schoolmaster, content with his mite of good, looked on and smiled.

"My boy," he said, "you, too, should be a teacher. You have something in you that should be passed along."

"A teacher!" ejaculated young Holmes, and burst into laughter. "There's only one job worse than a teacher's, and that's a preacher's. I'm going to be a machinist."

It hurt a little, that remark. Yet the teacher wasn't one to give up readily. "Anyway," he urged, "don't quit school. You'll be a better machinist in the end if you stay on here a while longer."

The school janitorship, which paid eight dollars and fifty cents a month, was open. Holmes took the job and remained in school, the only boy of his age who did. He stayed, he told me, solely because of that teacher.

But at home, tinkering in odd moments over a rude workbench, he fretted. He always had wanted to be a machinist. Since five years of age he had loved the feel of tools. Some of his father's old carpenter tools were about, and he appropriated these as his own. He would rather have been a machinist than President.

He was eighteen now, and with the notion of eighteen that school is all nonsense, anyway. In sudden decision he turned his back on it all. He went to Cincinnati, found work at three dollars a week, as a 'prentice machinist, and a room with board at an aunt's. Then in two months his pay was raised to four dollars a week. Four big silver dollars, a fortune, and his financial worries were over! He was happier than he ever had been in his life; and a year passed.

BUT one day while at work he noticed a man pass through the shop. It wasn't the first time he had seen this man; but never before this day had he given him such careful scrutiny. He was thirty, or thereabouts. His shirt was white, and he wore a white collar. About him was an air of prosperity, of confidence, of complete assurance. In that place of overalls and grime, he was like a creature from another world.

"Who is he?" Holmes asked the foreman.

"The head designer," the foreman answered. "He makes thirty-five dollars a week!"

Holmes's jaw dropped at mention of the astounding salary. Why, the best machinist in the shop made only twenty dollars a week! Some day, Holmes hoped, he might have the job of that best machinist.

Now he looked from the designer, erect and confident and immaculate—the designer who wasn't more than thirty—over to the shop's best machinist. The latter's head was gray; his seamed countenance showed every one of his fifty-odd years. There was a smear of grease over his forehead. Fifty-odd years, the shop's finest, and twenty dollars a week!

That contrast would not go out of his mind. Why was there that difference? As sweat was measured, the machinist gave most. Suddenly it came to young Holmes as if a curtain had been raised: The designer knew more! The difference was in his head.

And that night, lying awake in his bed, a new hero was born in the apprentice machinist's mind, and two old heroes were restored to their former glory, the country parson, and the country schoolmaster.

"The designer knows more!" he repeated. "He is paid for his greater knowledge!"

"Even then, I saw the money paid him only as a measure of value," Doctor Holmes said quietly. "It was evidence that to the employer, and to the world at large, the skill of head was placed above the skill of hands. I began to see, and to see truly for the first time, that perhaps the almost blind old preacher had driven himself to gain the most valuable thing he could have possessed. That schoolmaster who dealt out knowledge for a song took on the light of a great philanthropist.

"I gained a new conception of men's worth. The richest man, I saw, was not the man with the most dollars in his pockets. Instead, the richest man was the man who had the most stored in his brain!

Do You Know Why Farmers Spend $1,000 A DAY At this Store?

THERE'S a hardware store up in the Northeastern corner of Pennsylvania that's doing a retail business of $360,000 a year —and 90 per cent, or $1,000 a day, comes from farm trade!

When the big 4-deck store was built a few years ago people laughed at the idea. The store was miles too big, they said—out of proportion to the size of the community. The town had less than 2,500 people in it.

But those who laughed hadn't reckoned on the merchandising genius which was guiding the destiny of this store!

What Happened—

Today this hardware store has its 4 floors crammed full of carefully selected merchandise. And back of the store, just across the railroad tracks, they've since built a 3-story warehouse — 200 feet long—and this, too, is now filled to the roof with everything from a carload lot of oil in pint cans, to rows of plows and furnaces.

And today, the regular trading area of this progressive store takes in the surrounding country over a 50-mile radius. Farmers drive in to it from the nearby counties of three states — New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

That's a whale of a retail business for any store to do—even in a city. It required some mighty sound and up-to-date methods to build it up. Yet when you look into these methods, you find they're largely a matter of common sense and good business judgment —and easily applied to practically any retail business anywhere.

If you are a retail merchant in a town up to 25,000 population, you can probably use them to build up your own profits—just as this store did. The question is, do you want to do it?

DEALERS: Send the Coupon!

Get the Details of this Store's Big Success

Progressive retail merchants who are interested in increasing business, can get from Farm & Fireside the detailed description of the methods this Pennsylvania store has used to carry its sales up to $360,000 a year. The whole story is presented in folder form. You can obtain a copy FREE—simply by sending the attached coupon to Farm & Fireside. Send it at once—these folders are bound to go fast.

Part of Farm & Fireside's 1927 Service to Retailers

This is the first chapter in Farm & Fireside's 1927 service to the retailers of the United States. And it's a rounding out of the service which retailers who sell the farmer expect from this magazine — for three basic reasons:

1. Over a period of years merchants have come to look on Farm & Fireside as the farm magazine of national authority and influence. They know that its circulation now reaches 1,250,000 farm homes—an average of one for about every 2 farms of a hundred acres and over throughout the country. And this means it is read by the cream of every rural retailer's local trade.
2. Retailers know that Farm & Fireside has a highly personal character—and is read with warmer interest than probably any other farm magazine.
3. And finally because of these facts, they know that the advertising pages of Farm & Fireside are working every minute, to build more sales for them. And they have demonstrated this over and over by holding local exhibitions of the goods advertised in Farm & Fireside—to show how Farm & Fireside readers BUY.

The proof of these three fundamental values is the growth of manufacturers' advertising in Farm & Fireside—a faster growth than that of any other magazine in the field.

So in meeting the obligation to retail merchants and advertisers, which such leadership confers — Farm & Fireside in 1927 will make available the business methods which successful retailers have used in building farm trade—as in the case of this Pennsylvania store.

Calm Thinking

A LOVED one passes on. The anguish of soul is almost unbearable. It is unthinkable that one with such a burden should consider practical matters and yet what may transpire in future years justifies calm study in those dark hours.

The funeral approaches. Is it to be merely an occasion of respect? A display of emotion?

Or is it to be the laying away of all that is mortal of that loved one in a resting place amply protected against the ruthless elements?

That people are today thinking seriously of such matters is proved by the remarkably growing demand for the protection afforded by the Clark Grave Vault.

Merely by asking for the Clark Grave Vault you may be certain you are providing positive and permanent protection.

This vault is designed according to an immutable law of Nature. It has never failed. Being made of 12 gauge Keystone copper steel, or Armco Iron, with a plating of pure cadmium (applied by the Udylite Process, exclusive to this vault) it offers the greatest resistance to rust that is known to science.

Also, because it is made of metal, it is not porous.

Leading funeral directors will gladly supply the Clark Grave Vault because they know it is absolutely dependable.

Less than Clark complete protection is no protection at all!

He was richest because he was worth most to the world."

Holmes's whole outlook suddenly underwent a complete change. The average man of twenty envisions success as money. "I don't want money for its own sake," he apologizes, "but for what it will get me." Holmes envisioned success as the possession of knowledge. "I want knowledge," he said, "because I will be more useful with knowledge."

The village teacher was big in his thoughts. That man had gained knowledge in order to give it away! Likewise, the old parson had scaled his mountain to become a philanthropist in knowledge! These heroes had not thought of money.

The young machinist was all at sea with his new view when one evening he met on the street another young man. Back in the days when Holmes had pitched for the village ball team, this young man had come to Mt. Airy as a member of a visiting nine. There were friendly greetings.

"Say," said the young man eagerly, "you're a stranger here in Cincinnati. Why not join our Sunday-school class, and get acquainted with some of the fellows? We've a fine bunch in the class."

THAT Sunday Holmes joined the class. He never had attended a Sunday-school before, for there had been no church in Mt. Airy. Nor did he look upon this church so much as a church, in the sense that a church is a place of worship. Rather he saw it as a school. The term Sunday "school" was what drew him, and the "fine bunch" in the class. It was a chance to learn.

In short, the boy didn't go to worship, but to study. The Bible happened to be the master textbook of the school.

But the Bible is no ordinary textbook. As Holmes, thirsting for knowledge, studied its pages, he became filled with perplexities. What did this mean? How did that apply practically to this job of living and earning bread?

Holmes went to the minister of the church, the Rev. W. C. Payne. He was bursting with questions, afire with the desire to learn. The minister's eyes lighted at such eagerness, for he too was afire—with the all-impelling desire to teach and to save. That winter the two went into the problem together. And thereupon Holmes's fifth hero took up the work begun unknowingly by the designer.

He was a scholar, this hero, a Yale graduate, a man of books. He talked of college to the machinist, of degrees, and of reaching men's souls. He painted in words the canvas of a new world, in which men lived and toiled for learning's sake and for the uplift of others.

"You've set out on a task," he said, "that well may engage you a lifetime, and beyond. Learn, and then preach! You were made for it. It's your duty!"

And this time young Holmes did not laugh. Now in the teacher's and the preacher's once despised vocations he saw something big, noble, glorious. He was ready, eager to go on.

"But how?" he asked. "I'm twenty. All I know is a trade."

The minister had been assigned to a new church, in Philadelphia. Already he was making his preparations to leave.

"Come with me," he said. "There's a way; we'll find it together."

The two went to Philadelphia.

At twelve dollars a week Holmes obtained work in a little machine shop on the water front. His job was repairing and overhauling marine engines on ships. He boarded with his preacher-friend, blocks away from his work. To reach the shop by seven, he had to arise at five-thirty, eat his breakfast, and ride on a horse car across the city. It was after dark when he got home at night; that is, providing he did get home.

"Much of the work," he told me, "had to be done in a ship's hold while the vessel lay at anchor in the river. An idle ship was costly to its owners, so it was a rule that, once machinists started a job, they had to finish it, without rest. Our meals were eaten in the hold; but nobody slept unless it was at his machine. Two days at a stretch was the rule."

You will wonder, as I did, how he found time to study. The minister had assigned to him two of the most difficult languages in the world to master—Hebrew and Greek. And Holmes had never gone beyond the country school.

There was that long ride to work on the street cars, and the long ride home from work. The street cars became his schoolroom, and at odd times the minister heard him recite his lessons. Too, at work down in the ship's hold, he propped his open book up on his machines, ready for chance looks.

"There were times," Holmes confessed to me, "when I actually caught myself asleep, and yet my hands still went through the motions necessary in operating the machine! I've heard men claim that bodily fatigue doesn't affect mental vigor. I don't believe they've ever subjected that claim to experiment. Many a time, after thirty or more hours of work, I tested myself. I wasn't sure that two plus two made four. I wasn't sure of my name, or of my address. I was only sure that I wanted to sleep, to rest."

But there was before his eyes that vision of college. Ten hours of work by daylight was worth two dollars. Work from five o'clock in the afternoon until midnight was worth three dollars. Midnight until the day began again at seven paid double-time, four dollars.

TWO years of this, and the machinist student of Hebrew and Greek had five hundred dollars saved. He owed not a penny in the world. His body was as tough as pig-iron. That next fall he enrolled as a divinity student at Bethany College, in West Virginia, an alma mater of his preacher hero. The next year he went to Hiram College, in Ohio, nearer to his mother.

Remember, he hadn't been even to a high school. This meant that six years' work had to be accomplished in four years. He roomed alone. Eggs were to be had from farmers for nine cents a dozen, butter for fifteen cents a pound, milk for five cents a quart; so, on a tiny oil stove, he cooked his own meals, which consisted mainly of oatmeal, boiled eggs, and milk. You can guess how closely he lived from the fact that his yearly expenses, including tuition, clothes, railroad fare, and a vacation at home each Christmas, were never in excess of two hundred and fifty

What my firm's ADVERTISING means to me

M. H. Coleman, of Marietta, Ga., who has prospered by many years of steady, constructive business building for Lehn & Fink in the South. He is on intimate terms with the druggists and department store buyers in the Carolinas, Georgia, Alabama, Florida and Mississippi, and sells them the house of Lehn & Fink and its advertising as well as its products

A Salesman's Viewpoint
By M. H. Coleman
Lehn & Fink Products Company

The thing that is most important to me about my firm's advertising is this:

HOW CAN I USE IT TO GET ORDERS?

What can I tell the dealers in my territory about it?

Can I show them how it is going to pep up the consumption of Pebeco, "Lysol" and Hinds Honey & Almond Cream in their localities?

Can I demonstrate with facts and figures that it is going to bring customers into their stores?

If I can do this my battle is more than half won. If I can sell my firm's advertising I can sell its products.

And, since my firm advertises regularly in The American Magazine, I have no difficulty there.

I might add that the little book called The Vest Pocket Sales Maker has made the job doubly easy. It was named rightly. No salesman will make a mistake in writing for it and using it.

M. H. Coleman

WHAT are the facts and figures about your firm's advertising necessary to convince dealers of its local value to them?

First, as every salesman knows, you must be able to show your dealers that their localities are getting enough of this advertising to make a strong local impression—a real "dent."

The American Magazine's circulation of 2,200,000 readers insures this.

Next, you will want to show dealers that your firm's advertising stays in the homes in their neighborhoods long enough to insure its being seen and read.

In The American Magazine, for example, each advertisement is ALIVE in the home a full 30 "working days."

We all know, further, that all members of the family influence practically all home purchases today—furniture, automobiles, and many articles of personal use like those of the Lehn & Fink Products Company. You should be able to show dealers that your firm's advertising is reaching everybody in the home.

In The American Magazine it is. Many independent check-ups have shown that The American, more than any other magazine, is read by ALL MEMBERS OF THE FAMILY.

Finally, you want to make it clear that your firm's advertising is getting to the kind of people who are every dealer's best customers; that is, people with ambition and an active desire to improve their way of living.

From your personal acquaintance with The American Magazine, you know that it is read by just such people. Editorially it is planned for such people. Its articles and stories stimulate its readers to do more, have more, want more—and therefore BUY more.

These are some of the reasons why your product, if it is advertised in The American Magazine, has back of it the greatest single force for increasing merchandise consumption in America.

The Vest Pocket Sales Maker will enable you to get this over to dealers with local figures.

It will help you to use your firm's advertising to get orders.

Send now for the new edition, with data for all towns of 1,000 and over, and for all counties. Please give your firm's name. Address The Crowell Publishing Company, 250 Park Avenue, New York.

dollars! Summers he worked as a machinist.

He was older than his fellow students, and he was conscious of his delayed start. There was no time to be wasted. Yet at the end of his third year he had to quit college for a year in order to go back to a Philadelphia machine shop, at fifteen dollars a week, to earn money to go on with his studies during his senior year. Even with this, he had to borrow some from the college loan fund, and find outside work during that last year in order to finish. He was twenty-seven when he was graduated with a bachelor of arts degree.

He was now a minister, and was assigned to the Sixth Christian Church, a congregation in West Philadelphia. The members of the church were working folks and numbered only about forty all told. An incident will give you an idea of the kind of a minister he was:

The church board was discussing the matter of the minister's salary. They couldn't afford to pay much; but even a little would necessitate a struggle.

"Let's forget salary," said Holmes. "I've an idea of my own how to solve this."

With his own hands he fashioned a little white wooden box with a coin slot in the lid, and nailed the box up in the vestibule of the church. And that next Sunday he announced:

"We're not going to take up collections. We're not going to ask you to make pledges of money. If this church is worth anything to you, if the services do you any good, drop something in the box at the door as you leave. If you get nothing here, give nothing. I'm going to leave it to you. What's left after expenses are paid will be my salary."

Four years he preached there. The congregation grew to number one hundred and fifty. The expenses were paid from the white box, and between four hundred and five hundred dollars was left over yearly for the pastor.

Nor did Holmes cease his studies. Besides discharging his duties to the church, he became a graduate student in Semitics and Hebrew Antiquities at the University of Pennsylvania. A scholarship granted him by the university made this possible, and later he was awarded a fellowship which enabled him to go on with philosophy, psychology, and ethics.

"HE WAS a natural student," you will say. "Learning was easy for him."

The odd fact is that he wasn't a natural student!

His memory was bad. Never did he realize this so keenly as when he undertook those difficult university subjects. To imprint a fact on his memory he had to plug, plug, plug, and then often he forgot. He tried to better his memory, but for the life of him, he assured me, he could not. Furthermore, he had difficulty in grasping things.

"I had to take a page paragraph by paragraph, and each paragraph sentence by sentence, and then translate the sentences into my own words before I could get the meaning," he explained. "I never understood a definition until I could find for it some practical application in life with which I had had experience."

His faulty memory, his tedious habit of translation, made him sweat blood over his books. But he was gaining knowledge now; he applied his psychology to himself.

"If I didn't have to take up so much time in trying to remember," he finally concluded, "I could give more time to thinking of the meaning of things, and thus learn more rapidly."

The remedy came to him all at once. He would make himself a mechanical memory—a memory of indexes and cards and filing cabinets, such as they had in the office of the machine shop! The cards would be his memory! That settled, he decided on one more policy: to attempt only to learn the important things, the facts that really counted. "I can detect which are the important things," he decided, "by paying close attention to the teacher. He will emphasize what really counts."

To-day, former students under Holmes will tell you of his remarkable memory. They will tell you that, as a teacher, he goes right to the heart of his subject, to its biggest phase.

FROM the Philadelphia church he went to a larger, richer congregation in Ann Arbor, Michigan. The University of Michigan was now right at his door. He continued to study as an auditor in philosophy there. By this time he was earning eighteen hundred dollars a year as a minister. He was being spoken of as one of the coming great preachers of his denomination. But he wasn't satisfied.

He resigned his pastorate paying eighteen hundred dollars a year. He took a position, back in Philadelphia, as educational director of the Pennsylvania Railroad Y. M. C. A. at sixteen hundred dollars a year. Here he became preacher, educator, and physical instructor in one.

Simultaneously, he went on at the University of Pennsylvania to win the degrees of Master of Arts, and Doctor of Philosophy. He wrote his first book, became an instructor in psychology at Pennsylvania, and went on the lecture platform to talk before teachers' institutes, lyceums, clubs, and business associations. A three-man job was this; but he had learned to handle a three-man job as a machinist working in a ship's hold day and night. The work wasn't as hard as it had been back in those earlier days.

In 1910 the University of Pennsylvania made him assistant professor of psychology and assistant director of its psychological clinic. A book followed, "The Conservation of the Child," which had a popular ring and gained notice. Pennsylvania State College then commanded his services to be dean of its faculty, the post second to the presidency, and Drake followed with its presidency. At Drake he raised five hundred thousand dollars in a popular campaign of a few days and, during his four years there, he was a leader in putting that university back on its feet financially.

But a college president is an administrator. Holmes's object was to teach and to preach. His heroes had all been teachers and preachers. So he is a preacher and a teacher to-day as well as writer and dean. Translated, dean means—as Holmes practically applies this dean of men post at Pennsylvania—adviser and counselor to students, especially to students who have their way to earn.

Dog Crosses Alaskan Range to Save Men

"LITTLE SQUAW, Alaska, Dec. 25th, 1926 (AP). Carrying a scribbled note from two miners crippled by an explosion, one of them blinded, a malamute dog crossed a 3000-foot pass in the Brooks mountain range at night with the mercury 40° below zero, to his master's cabin."

Just another paragraph in the great story of dog heroism—a narrative that reaches back into the shadows of time.

All dogs have worms. Puppies particularly should be wormed. Reasons are given on Page 15 of the Polk Miller Dog Book. Use Sergeant's Sure Shot Capsules.

Save Your Dog

Your dog is a faithful friend. He deserves all the care you can give him. Every year, lives of thousands of valuable and beloved dogs are sacrificed unnecessarily. Their owners did not know how to care for them. Every dog owner can, without cost, find out how to treat dog diseases. There are now tried and true remedies for every dog ailment. It is only necessary to know what to use.

This is the time of year your dog needs a tonic. Guard against sickness and general weakness with Sergeant's Condition Pills. See Page 20 in the Dog Book.

Famous Dog Book Is Free

With more than 50 years of experience to guide them, expert veterinarians have compiled a book that tells how to treat dog diseases. It is clear and explicit. It is revised yearly and kept up-to-date. It tells the symptoms of dog ailments. It explains fully the best treatments and proper methods of feeding and breeding. It contains a unique symptom chart that makes it easy to tell what's the matter with your dog. A copy will be sent free to those who care enough for their dogs to write for it.

In the Spring, dogs need a blood tonic. Sergeant's Arsenic and Iron Pills are splendid for this purpose. For glossy, healthy coats, use Sergeant's Mange Medicine. Pp. 27, 28, 29 in the Dog Book.

Expert Advice, Free

Our skilled veterinarian and his staff will answer personally all questions not covered in this famous dog book. helped them with their lessons. And so we were very close to each other in more ways than one. If I had let myself be shut off up-stairs, I couldn't have kept the helm. The children might have drifted away from the course I wanted them to follow.

"In February, our youngest child was born; and this made the oldest one more indispensable than ever. Belle was my right hand in running the household; and she loyally stayed where right hands are always found—close at my side.

"Meanwhile, Ted was going through high school. He was named after my brother Theodore, who had become president of South Western State Normal School, California, Pennsylvania; and Theodore had promised his namesake a present of a good suit of clothes when he graduated.

"This promise meant everything to us, for the other graduation expenses took every cent we could rake and scrape. But as Commencement Day came nearer and nearer, no suit arrived, nor any word from my brother about it.

"The afternoon of Commencement Day Ted went to the principal of the high school and begged to be excused from giving his oration. He felt that he couldn't stand up before the audience, wearing his patched and shabby clothes. I didn't blame him, for they really were not fit to wear.

"While I was trying to comfort him, I suddenly realized how tall he had grown. And then, just as suddenly, another thought came to me.

"Going up to the attic, I began pulling things out of a box where I had put some clothing which a relative had sent me to make over for ourselves. With the sudden realization that my boy had grown to man's size had come the recollection of this box.

"Sure enough, in it I found a black broadcloth suit. Out of another box I resurrected the white vest my husband had worn at our wedding! I washed and ironed the vest, brushed and pressed the suit, and so that crisis was safely passed.

"WE HAVE had dozens of other crises, but somehow we have always managed to come through them. Once, I remember, we just had to have money for school expenses, and yet there didn't seem a ghost of a chance of our getting it. But inside of a few days I sold thirty dollars' worth of sweet corn from our garden! And so that crisis was met.

"Well, to return to Ted. When he finished grammar school, he wanted to go to work and support himself. I respected him for feeling as he did, and I knew what a help his earnings would be. Times were pretty bad with us. I thought of the burden my husband was carrying. I thought of the other children, and of my duty to them. And I was almost worried sick, trying to decide what was best to do.

"But one night, as I was lying awake, thinking it over and over, I made up my mind: If it was humanly possible, the children were going to college! I mustn't wait to see how it was to be done. I must just go ahead and do it.

"The next morning I said to Ted, 'You have worked hard in school and you have made a fine record. In other words, you have laid a good foundation. But suppose that, instead of building walls on that foundation, you put a roof right on top of it. Tell me, my son, where, then, are you going to live?'

"He looked at me for a moment. Then he drew a long breath, and said, 'I see what you're driving at. All right! I'll keep on building.'

"That summer he worked in a planing mill, saved his money, and in the fall he bought a new suit and had one hundred dollars besides. A good many boys would have spent this money foolishly. Perhaps some parents," she smiled, "would have taken it for their own use; especially if they needed it as much as we did. But to Ted, and to us, that money was almost sacred.

"When Ted entered Bucknell a friend said to me, 'Why do you start that boy on a four-year college course? You know you can't afford to let him finish it.'

"'I'm not sending him for four years,' I said. 'I'm sending him for this one year! Mountains are not climbed at a bound, but step by step. To send seven children to college may seem like an unscalable mountain. But we're going just as high as we can, one step at a time.'

"YOU said you wanted to know how in the world we did it. For one thing, I was told that perhaps I might get a scholarship for Ted. I went to President Harris, at Bucknell, and explained the situation. The result was that Ted had a fifty-dollar scholarship, not only for his first year but for all four. Later, each of the children had these scholarships.

"Then came another windfall: About this time my father's estate was settled. It was small—and the surviving heirs were many! So there were only a few hundred dollars apiece for them. Moreover, the three hundred and fifty dollars I had borrowed for my education had to be taken out of my portion. The result was that I received only two hundred dollars as my share.

"Even that was a small fortune to us. For that matter, I doubt if a real fortune could accomplish much more than this two hundred dollars did in the next twenty years.

"First, Ted borrowed part of it for his college expenses. The next summer he worked in the planing mill, and repaid his loan. But he borrowed it again the following winter; and with this help he managed to get through his sophomore year. Then Mr. Park's father died and when his estate was settled we had one hundred and thirty dollars a year income of interest money from which he gave to the one who happened to need it most.

"By that time, Jesse and Amy were ready for Bucknell and expenses were piling up. The two hundred dollars legacy was split between the two, but it couldn't be stretched for three. So Ted taught a year to get the money to complete his course.

"You can't know what a sense of triumph I had when he was graduated. We were at least one seventh of the way up the mountain! And if we had gone that far, what could prevent us from going all the way?

"THERE were times, of course, when one or more of us would get pretty discouraged. That happened to Jesse, for instance. He wasn't very strong physically; and that eight-mile tramp every day, often in snow, or rain, or sleet, attending lectures and classes, and doing all the studying required—well, you can imagine that it was enough to wear out even a Park!

"Finally, Jesse quit. He said he was through! I thought he really was, for he went to Milton and got a job in a drug store.

"But," she went on, her eyes kindling with pride, "he couldn't stick it out! After he had been at Milton two years he came home one night, bringing all his things with him."

"'What's the matter?' I asked. 'Have you lost your job?'

"'No,' he said; 'the job has lost me. I'm going back to college next week!'

"And he did; although it meant entering a class that had been two years behind him.

"Meanwhile, Amy had left college for a year to teach school and earn part of the money she needed to go on and graduate. So she and Jesse received their degrees at the same time.

"We were rather proud to have two children in the same class; but we beat that record six years later, when three Parks were graduated together.

"At the exercises, the president spoke of this as unique in the history of the college. He asked the three students to stand. And when Martha and Louis and Olive, in their caps and gowns, rose while the audience applauded, I felt that it was worth all the years of work and of sacrifice it had cost.

"Another six years went by before Mary, the youngest, was graduated. That was in 1922; and it had been in 1902 that Ted entered Bucknell as a freshman. We had taken twenty years to climb our mountain—but we did it!

"During all those years, that two hundred dollars legacy of mine and Mr. Park's interest money were in constant service. At different times, every one of the children borrowed the two hundred dollars or a part of it, but they always repaid it. We have laughed many a time over the way it went back and forth, first to one, then to another; but invariably turning up again to help out in the next emergency.

"It came through the years intact, and has settled down now to a quiet existence, invested in two Liberty bonds. Those bonds have a lot of printing on them; but the real story of that two hundred dollars would fill a book.

"The children themselves earned much of the money their education cost. They all taught school occasionally. The boys worked during the summers. When the older ones graduated, they began to earn money; and they always loaned what they could spare to the younger ones.

"I speak of our 'loaning' money to one another. We never said it was only loaned. The repayment was not demanded. No conditions were imposed. But the money always was repaid, just as a matter of honor and of mutual helpfulness.

"If I claim any credit at all," Mrs. Park went on thoughtfully, "it is because I tried to have my children feel that an education was a sort of necessity, like food or shelter. Even when they were very young, I would talk about their going to college as if it were a matter of course.

"I didn't say to them, 'Oh dear! I wish I could send you to college!' I said, 'Now, when you go to college you will do so-and-so!'

"When the time came, they expected to go; and they faced the necessary hardships, because they thought an education was something they had to have.

"MY HUSBAND and I believe in tithing: giving one tenth of our income to God's service. We brought up the children to practice the same custom. When Mary, the youngest, entered college, her sister Olive was teaching school. Of course Olive knew that Mary needed money for her expenses, so one day she handed over her tithe money with the remark: 'I think I'd just as soon give my money to you as to any other little heathen!'

"'All right!' said Mary. 'I'll take it! And some day I'll help your little heathens to pay their college bills!'

"She can make good that promise," declared Mrs. Park; "for she has a fine position in one of the largest high schools in the state."

Every one of the graduates entered the teaching profession. With the exception of the youngest, all the daughters are now married; but I am sure they get more out of life and contribute more to it because they have had a good education.

"Ted has taught in important high schools," Mrs. Park continued, "a few years ago, for personal reasons, he decided to come back to Pennsylvania, and is now professor of Physics and Physical Chemistry in Susquehanna University.

"Jesse teaches in a school for boys at Hazelton. A few years ago, in talking with me, he seemed dissatisfied with his work, because, as he said, there was no future in it.

"'That depends,' I told him, 'on the kind of future you want. Other people may be making money. But you are making men!'

"Not long ago, the state superintendent of schools gave the so-called 'intelligence tests' to a group of teachers which included Jesse.

"'No one,' the superintendent said, 'is supposed to be able to answer all these questions; but answer as many of them as you can in four minutes.'

"Well," said Mrs. Park, "my boy answered all of them in two and one-half minutes! I believe they rated him as a genius. So I don't think we were wasting time and effort when we sent him to college.

"Louis, the youngest son, taught for several years after his graduation. He had good positions too. But he wanted to get into business; and now he is with an advertising agency in Detroit.

"When I asked him if he thought he could sell advertising, he said, 'Why not? I've been "selling education" to my pupils. If I could sell knowledge to boys who thought they didn't want it, I think I can sell advertising to business men who know that they've got to have it.'

"I guess he's right," Mrs. Park admitted. "My point is this: I insisted that the children should have an education—not to fit them for any special kind of work, but to fit them for life! A man without knowledge is almost a blind man. Education opens our eyes to everything that is interesting and wonderful. There isn't a detail of our daily lives that isn't affected by education.

"I didn't want my children to go through life, blindly groping their way, and stumbling at every turn because of ignorance. My husband and I, poor as we were, endowed our children with what I feel is true riches when we gave them an education."

ON THE train that evening, riding from Montandon to Harrisburg, I found myself still repeating the question: "How in the world did they do it?"

The two-hundred-dollar legacy, passing on from one crisis to the next, did not answer the question. The fifty-dollar scholarships did not answer it. Neither did the summer wages in the planing mill; nor the salaries from intermittent school-teaching; nor the fact that Olive preferred her young sister to "any other little heathen."

No! I decided that the only real answers to my question had sat with me at the dinner table. They were the indomitable spirit that burned in the blue eyes of the little woman opposite me, and the light of generous self-sacrifice which shone in the dark eyes of the man beside her.

If this quiet couple, in a little country town, had given their sons and daughters only an education, it would have been an achievement to be proud of. But the real achievement was in the unconscious "education" of their children's hearts, through years of sacrifice and devotion. That kind of education cannot be bought with money. Only one kind of rich folks—millionaires in courage and high ideals—can have it.

DON MARQUIS is more than a humorist. He's a philosopher, a portrayer of life, which he looks at through the kindly eyes of one who understands humanity. You will agree to this when, next month, you read his sketch about a character that is common to every community—and almost to every home. "Your Uncle Ed," he calls the sketch, and the chances are nine to one that you have met the prototype of this amusing character in real life. "Your Uncle Ed" is a delightful piece, and you will be glad to know that it is the first of a series of portraits from human nature by this remarkable writer. Others will appear from time to time in The American Magazine.

THE FAMILY'S PROBLEMS

We Never Solve To-day a Problem That Can Wait a Week

IN EVERY family there are likely to be some dissensions. A collection of individuals living in the intimacy of family life naturally come in for clashes of personality, not to mention worries both financial and personal.

I think we have worked out the problem of a tranquil existence in a practical manner. Our family consists of my husband; a daughter, seventeen; sons, sixteen and twelve; a little daughter, ten, and myself.

The rule of the household is to enjoy yourself in your own way so long as you don't infringe on the rights of others; and to save all arguments, difficulties of finance, or personal grievances, to be discussed at a family conference Saturday evening.

As the children grew from babyhood, they accepted the family routine naturally, and took their places in the group. The result was that they learned to recognize the difference between irritating incidents of no concern and essential problems.

From the first, they were encouraged to be perfectly frank in conference. Matters brought up for discussion have never been regarded as a basis for punishment, so there has been no fear on their part.

When a quarrel or a personal grievance has to be put in cold storage a week, it is likely to die a natural death. I have often heard snatches of conversation like this: "You mean thing, I'll tell Father and Mother at conference!" But somehow conference is seldom burdened with tattling tales. If a grievance is real enough to last a week, or the better part of a week, it is worth discussing.

THE children have their own allowances and I have mine. On Saturday night, the family budget is reviewed, and I make up my accounts.

When children are permitted to talk over difficulties on an equal footing with their elders, they learn to discuss matters calmly, and generally with a good deal of self-control and a sense of justice.

Generally Saturday afternoon is a free time for all the family. My husband and I usually go to the Country Club for golf, or some other diversion, and of course the children have their own interests. They feel free to bring friends home for Saturday night dinner. And when the fun is over, everyone is in a relaxed and happy mood to straighten out the weekly tangles.

Conference begins with all the family present. After the children have had their say, they leave Father and me in the library, and we go over bills, or any question of policy we wish to discuss.

A session may sound something like this:

"How goes it, Elizabeth?"

"I'm terribly short of money, Mother and Dad. I just had to have a new pair of slippers for the dance Thursday. I charged them, and I want to ask if I may pay for one shoe this week, and the other one next?

I know Elizabeth is conscientious about money, so I say, "As the slippers are charged, leave them until the first of the month, dear. That will be easier for you."

"And, Dad," Elizabeth goes on. "I've decided I want to be a nurse. If I take chemistry now I can begin training when I'm eighteen."

"No college, Sis?" Father says. "Let's talk it over from start to finish, you and Mother and I. Say, Monday night. That all right for you?"

"Yes, Dad." And Elizabeth leans back in her chair.

"Well, Don?"

"I smashed one light on the flivver, Dad. I charged it at the garage."

"Your fault, Don?" asks Father.

"No sir, not on your life. A girl was coming 'round a corner. I guess she hadn't been driving long and she lost her head."

"All right; the bill stands, then. Anything else?"

Don hesitates. "Dad, I wish I could have more allowance. Honestly, it just flies. I hate to ask, but only until summer. Bill and I want to go off together, and get a job."

"Do you know what you want to do?" Father asks.

"Not definitely," Don says; "but we have several schemes."

"Get all the facts and decide just what you want to do, and then we'll see. Personally, I think it's a good plan. Do you, Mother?"

Of course I foresee what it all means. Don going off on his own, soon college, then business. But I don't say what I think. I only say, "It is natural for you to want to earn some money. About more allowance now. What do you say, Father?"

"If Don has more, I ought to!" bursts in Elizabeth.

"And if you both do, the kiddies will have to have their pay raised." And Father grins. "Leave it until we've been over the budget, and we'll give you the verdict next week. All right?"

Don nods, and he is through for the week.

"Sonny?"

"Rotten report," Sonny sighs. "Honestly, I don't know how it got that way. But it will be better next month, truly."

"Anything on your mind, Lou?"

"Not this week," Louise says gleefully, and everyone laughs.

WHEN the children leave us, we go over the budget for the week, decide that the children should have a little more all 'round, although we may not do as much housecleaning and painting as we hoped.

"Even if they do have more allowance," I say, "there has never been a time when we had to economize that the children weren't willing to do their share, has there?"

"Never," John agrees. "Great firm, this family, nice junior partners."

Buy Your Oil with Your Eyes Open

See the golden color as it pours

Many motorists do no more when buying oil than drive up and say "two quarts." Some go a step further and buy their oil by name. But the motorist who wants Texaco, and knows why he wants it, goes still further and proves that the oil he gets is the oil he pays for. He identifies it by the clean, clear, golden color of Texaco Motor Oil which is as distinctive and easily recognizable as the trade-mark on a sealed can.

See the golden color in the Texaco Comparoscope. Watch the golden stream as it pours. From then on—so long as you continue to buy golden Texaco—your engine will be free from carbon troubles and excessive wear. Consult the Texaco Lubrication Chart for the right grade to use.

McCormack is truly McCormack on the New Orthophonic Victrola

"The Orthophonic Victrola is indeed a great musical instrument."
—JOHN McCORMACK.

WHETHER an exacting operatic air or one of those simple, haunting melodies for which the popular tenor of Old Athlone is better known, it is vividly McCormack on the new Orthophonic Victrola. Just as truly as though you sat in the fourth row at a McCormack recital!

For the Orthophonic Victrola reproduces everything and misses nothing. The mannerisms . . . the very personality of the artist . . . these are re-created perfectly by Victor's new and exclusive principle of "matched impedance." Only in the living presence of the singer can you hear such music as the Orthophonic Victrola brings to your fireside.

An unlimited source of home entertainment

Without regard to hour, day, or season, the new Orthophonic Victrola is ready to entertain you and your friends with music of your own choosing. No matter what the type of music—operatic, symphonic, popular song or spirited dance—it will be sung or played by the world's foremost artists.

If you have not yet heard the new Orthophonic Victrola play the new Orthophonic Victor Records, you cannot conceive of the tremendous strides that have been made in the science of sound-reproduction. Critics, musicians and music-lovers have been amazed that any instrument could achieve such realism.

The new Orthophonic Victor Records rival in importance the invention of the Orthophonic Victrola itself, as a contribution to better music in the home. They reproduce tones that are neither too soft nor too loud, but full, round, mellow, natural. These new records play on any instrument . . . and greatly improve its playing quality!

The Orthophonic Victrola furnishes the finest music for the home. The Four-forty (above) is $165, list price.

Let your ears tell you what words cannot. Go to your nearest dealer and ask for a demonstration of the new Orthophonic Victrola. There are many beautiful models, from $95 to $300, list price. Silent electric motor ($35 extra) eliminates winding. You play . . . and enjoy.

How far will your car go before the miles begin to tell?

If you buy a new car every 10,000 miles or so, almost any car will give you satisfactory results.

But if you want the same fine service on through the second, third and many following tens of thousands of miles, buy a Buick!

Accurate tests at the great Proving Ground of General Motors, where all cars are driven and examined, show Buick's sturdy structure and powerful Valve-in-Head Engine still gaining in efficiency at the point in miles where other cars are distinctly on the down grade.

The unremitting care in Buick design—the constant tests at the Proving Ground—the unceasing quest for better performance—these are responsible for Buick's superior efficiency.

Savings resulting from enormous volume make possible both this extensive research and Buick's superior construction.

Buick cars are built for big mileage on their speedometers—for greater satisfaction to their owners.

Buy a Buick for years of exceptional service.

Was Beauty's ransom ever so modest?

WE know two cousins, whose names might be Joan and Elsie.

Their incomes are equal. Both have long been accustomed to the best that life affords. But Joan's hats, which cost all the way from nothing to five dollars apiece, are always as smart as Elsie's at twenty-five dollars. Joan's complexion, smooth and pink as peach blossoms, happens to cost her only a few cents a week, whereas Elsie positively refuses to tell how many dollars she spends on beauty-treatments, lotions, creams and imported soaps.

Joan's soap, for instance, is just as fine, just as pure, just as gentle as Elsie's costly treasures. White, too—Joan considers a white soap daintier.

Yet this smartly turned-out soap of hers—as distinctive as her quite sophisticated five-dollar hats — costs the enormous sum of five cents!

Its name? Guest Ivory. White, pure, gentle, honest, as Ivory has been for nearly half a century.

And—with its delicate modeling, its smoothly-rounded edges, its rich cleansing lather—fit for a princess.

Joan always buys three cakes of Guest Ivory at a time, so as to have a fresh cake on hand whenever a princess arrives unexpectedly.

"Scotch Valley"

A story you will never forget

By Mildred Cram

ILLUSTRATED BY W. H. D. KOERNER

And the Sons of Mary smile and are blessèd—they know the angels are on their side.
They know in them is the Grace confessèd, and for them are the Mercies multiplied.
They sit at the Feet—they hear the Word—they see how truly the Promise runs;
They have cast their burden upon the Lord, and—the Lord He lays it on Martha's Sons. —RUDYARD KIPLING.

THIS was not the sort of country James Gladden liked. He was accustomed to the black soil, the rich, hardy vegetation of New England, the spread of elms, the dusty freshness of clover fields, the cleansing sweep of thunder showers and gray northeasters driving in from the sea.

This soil was baked and cracked, the color of dried mud. There was no "give" to it. The road crossed wide fields of parched grain and, climbing a treeless hill, dipped down, out of sight.

No shade, anywhere. A row of giant eucalyptus with ragged, fluttering vegetation offered no more than a faint tracery of shadow. Fallen brown leaves pulverized beneath Gladden's feet, turned into peppery dust, and sent up a faint aromatic odor.

He trudged ahead, shifting his heavy suit case from one hand to the other. The white glare of sky hurt his eyes. He was homesick. No, not homesick. He had no home. Perhaps he was scared. A hollow feeling at the pit of his stomach reminded him that he was already embarked upon the strangest adventure of his life.

It was known as Scotch Valley. Ten miles long, perhaps a mile and a half wide, it lay between low, yellow hills—an uneven floor broken by the dry bed of what once may have been a river, but was now a bone heap of bleached stones, presenting the mockery of concrete bridges wherever the highroad crossed from the township side to the farms on Mount Soledad's dry slopes.

The driver of the big gray bus that had brought Gladden from Los Angeles sensed his disappointment.

"In winter, after the hard rains," he said, "this country is green. Then it don't look unlike Scotland. At least, the first settlers thought so. They named it."

"Do you like it out here?"

"Sure. So will you, after a year or two. Couldn't see it, myself, at first. The sunshine got on my nerves. 'Gosh,' I said to myself, 'I wish it would rain.' Back in Kansas, it rains in summer, off and on. But here! Gosh! It rains once a year. And then it rains four months, steady!" He brought the bus to a halt.

"Here's your road. Scotch Valley. Good Luck—Californian!"

He grinned, and the big gray monster, flat, wide, like a beetle with hips, purred smoothly away.

"Scotch Valley," Gladden said aloud. He put the suit case down and mopped his face. "Good lord!"

He didn't know exactly what he had expected. Cowboys, perhaps. A don on a silver-trapped pinto. The jingle of dreams. Well, this was reality. Sun. Hills like melons. Heat. And dust. And the promise he had made to Fred Smith, over in France, driving him on to do a foolish thing.

A small car careened toward him in a cloud of dust. Gladden waved both arms.

"Hey! Stop a minute!"

The driver leaned sideways out of a window.

"Wantta lift?"

"No, thanks. Where's Smith's farm?"

"Which Smith?"

"Fred."

"They're both Fred."

"Both?"

"There are two Fred Smiths in the Valley. At least, there was. Both of 'em's dead. Died over in France."

"My Fred Smith had a lot of kids. And no money at all."

"Then you mean the bunch at the ford. One mile from here, and across the river bed. You'll see planks laid down. Say, did you know? Mrs. Smith's dead."

"I didn't know."

"Yep. Died about six months ago, of some sort of fever. Now, I hear, the Mexican's sick."

"The Mexican?"

"The old man who works for 'em. If he goes, I guess they'll send the kids to the County Home."

GLADDEN had a sudden, profound sensation of panic, a sickness of the spirit that was like nausea, only that it was worse. He wanted to run. Sprint down that road in a cloud of dust of his own, forever away from Scotch Valley and reality. He was the sort of man who would like to be weak, but can get no fun out of it, after all. So he said:

"Thanks. I guess I can find them."

"Those kids will be glad to see someone. I'd take you back myself, only I'm on my way to 'Frisco."

Gladden picked up the heavy suit case and went forward. His shoes were already white, and sweat rolled down his face, streaking little paths in the dust. He wondered what had become of his collar. But then he wouldn't have any use for collars after to-day. A collar in a place like Scotch Valley would be carrying a love of finery too far.

"I'd better think this over," he said to himself. "It isn't too late to turn back. No one expects me. I mustn't be a fool. What was it I promised? And why? Now, put it very quietly and plainly, and see whether it means anything. Or am I just a fool, the victim of hereditary honor? Am I getting sentimental? Am I growing old?"

HE SAT down on a bank in the quivering shadow of a tree that had shed most of its bark. The bank was covered with stickers. Burrs fastened themselves to his clothes. Foxtails, quilled like minute porcupines, pierced his silk socks and pricked his ankles.

In New England, this would have been a lush, green bank overgrown with ferns,

Again Gladden heard that thin, wheezing sound, close at hand, behind a Queen Anne's lace, a profusion of small flowers. The stream, here a tantalizing reminiscence of water, would have slipped smoothly over the white stones with a voice full of laughter and promise. The insistent whispering of such streams! Gossip, gossip. And an overtone of silver bells, now here, now there. Why, in heaven's name, should all California rivers be dry in summer?

He stared off at the smooth, bare hills, beyond to a farther, fainter blue in a haze of heat. His mind went back.

The beginning: Armistice eve. But no one knew, then. That hell of noise, that featureless confusion, that effort, sweat, pain, fear, death, the same to-day as yesterday. As if war were a universal madness. As if the world had elected chaos as a state. Let's kill and be killed. Yet perhaps there had been rumors—arrows of hope, pinging through the lines. Here and there, men paused to wonder. Along the front, lapses—a dot and a dash. Held breath. "Have you heard anything?" Or a muttered, "Lord, no. It's worse than ever!"

WHERE Gladden was—the Meuse—there had been no time for speculation that day.

Two bridges, the lower and the upper, for use that night, reached across forty yards of stream, joint by joint. Trucks, coming fast from Beaumont through the ravine, brought the sections. Men worked under fire. Fire sputtering and drumming from machine-gun nests across the river. Fire arching overhead. Frantic figures running, bending, grabbing and pulling, making identical gestures. Joint by joint, section by section.

A great, purposeless confusion of shells arched over them. White puffs, yellow smudges, black blurs, high, high, beyond reckoning, in the apex, hanging there, painted there. And the whir of invisible wings, the drum-drum of darting steel bodies.

One of those bridges was Gladden's mission, his job.

He may have had the flu. Or it may have been nerves; hunger; cold; fatigue. He worked all day through a confusing haze of fever: dry lips, dry palms, dry eyelids, and a pain at the base of his skull. He did not think of himself. The bridge had to go over. Troops had to cross. They were waiting in the rear. They thrust, invisible thousands, against the limitations of such flesh as his, and their impatience spit like viper tongues: "Let us over! Let us over!"

door that opened at last upon the strangest scene he had ever witnessed

GLADDEN drove his men. He lashed at them with irony, vituperation, humor, for an hour and thirty-five minutes that seemed like a lifetime. He saw them die. He saw the units swing uselessly to the current. The whole span jointed itself sideways, back to the bank. He saw his men wounded. He saw them laugh or shout or keep silently at the business as if the completion of this pontoon were the end and aim of all mankind.

"There had to be Smith," Gladden thought.

He pulled a brittle shaft of California grass and set it viciously between his teeth. "There's always a Smith," he mused. "The human element in the obscure reason for things. Man, the wrench in the machine. Or the blind god!"

Now, at dusk of that frantic last day of war, Smith had appeared at his elbow. A small, wiry, rough-haired man, with a habit of jerking his shoulders.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

"Helluvaday, sir."

He saw that Gladden was weaving like a spent top. The heave and spin of pain and fever had made him groggy, unsteady. "Sick, sir? Better get back a while."

"Not yet."

"Things are fine. They say—"

He never imparted what it was they were saying. The word "peace" never passed his lips. "Damn the machine-guns!" he said bitterly.

Gladden looked. A hit. A big shell, this time. One of the units broke loose and drifted down-stream. And where a cloud of smoke and wreckage lifted, men struggled, writhed, fell.

Gladden started forward.

Confound the dizziness. He could hardly walk. His legs were light. His shoes seemed full of air. His head was as heavy as a flatiron. He tried to run, with Smith jogging at his elbow.

"Better wait, sir!"

Gladden hesitated, and the man darted ahead. Gladden sat down where he was, and for a horrible, concentrated moment surrendered to his own misery. He was sick at his stomach.

Night rolled out of the river like the cold fog. Six o'clock. Already dark. Night swallowed the running figure of Smith, going so light-heartedly toward fate. He seemed to run headlong into another flash, another detonation, another geyser of water and wreckage.

GLADDEN threw away the tasteless stalk of California grass, and pulled another to set between his teeth.

"I went after him too late," he thought. "That was it. I should have gone in the first place. It was my job."

He trusted Smith. Perhaps that was his excuse. He had seen a lot of him, first and last, at Saint-Mihiel, at Soissons, and again in Champagne. A little, skinny fellow, weatherbeaten, laconic, bandy-legged, who had, somehow, inspired trust. If things had been different, Smith might have climbed to the top of some ladder or other, back home. But things weren't different.

Smith, who had been alive, alert, confident, lay out there, face down, in a mess of blood and splinters.

Gladden picked him up. Groggy as he was, the idea that later dominated him was already pulsing like a soul toothache. That Smith had died because he let him die.

If that had been the end of it—

Gladden kicked at the hard, dry earth of Scotch Valley with both heels. "I suppose all my life I'll have to do things I hate doing, whether I want to or whether I don't. I'm not one of those escapers, who slip out of everything. It being me, Smith wasn't dead!"

And it being him, it had also to be the end of the war.

When Smith was hit, peace was being spoken of in high places.

Dawn had brought a beating of wings. Daylight had brought peace. The fever in Gladden's veins had receded before the mortal chill of realization: this is the end, and where has it got us? He wanted to wallow, like the others, in physical safety.

The lucky ones were glad to be alive. Some of them cheered. The more sober made coffee, when they could get it. Gladden took stock of what he had to be grateful for: Two legs, two hands, a head, ears. . . .

What he saw, that no one else seemed to see, appalled him. Physical safety was nothing, unless you were mentally sound. This war was going to leave humanity either addle-pated or infernally sane.

He had tried not to think about Smith: the futile snuffing out of a bright light, as if someone had stepped on a glow-worm for fun. Smith was gone. The only comfort there had been lay in the belief that a man in the middle of an explosion feels little or nothing. The lower bridge was across; troops were swinging over; undulating caterpillars of olive-drab headed toward the Rhine and the fruits of peace. Smith would go the other way, in a pine box.

BUT Smith wasn't dead. They had carried him back to Beaumont, and had, mercifully, left him there, since to move him would have no more than jogged the inevitable. And he wanted to see the Captain. Wanted to see him in the worst way. "And hurry," the message had come, "because I'm not going to last more'n an hour, and there's something I've got to say."

When Gladden at last stood by the bed in the great, shadowy hospital-tent, he could see nothing of Smith save the end of his nose, and a part of his mouth and one very black, intense eye, an eye in which all of that essence which is called life, ego, self, soul was concentrated like a ray of light.

That eye raked Gladden's face.

He turned his head the fraction of an inch, and whispered, "Captain, I want you to do something."

"I'll do anything. It was my fault. I let you go."

"That's all right. Only, things being as they are, I thought I'd put it up to you. Maybe you can help."

"I'll try."

"I left a wife and five kids back home. Things was almost fixed. Another year... Captain, they ain't got a cent!"

"What do you want me to do?"

The rush of breath in Smith's throat almost strangled him.

"See them through. Look out for them. Don't let anything happen to them."

"I promise. Where do they live?"

"Place called Scotch Valley in California . . . farm. . . . Oh, God, I can't finish!"

Gladden had stood by the bed repeating: "I promise. I promise," until the nurse led him away. "You're sick yourself," she said. "You'd better lie down. That's a good boy. You just come over here. . . . Steady, now!"

The nurse was a husky woman; but she couldn't hold him. He woke up, very much later, in bed, and he was terribly sick. He didn't much care whether there was war or peace, if only they'd give him enough water.

A double row of beds held similar victims, knees up, knees down, groaning, silent, each one fighting the enemy in his own way.

It did not occur to Gladden to be afraid of death. But he fought to live because he had a wife and five kids—a wife and five kids—the delirium pursued him, shaking ghoulish fingers, for ten days, leaving him as weak as a new-born child.

He had found his legs again in New York six months later.

No, Gladden was not free. The war was over, and he had come out of it with a whole skin, even if his mind promised to be bruised all the rest of his life.

He had, he supposed, made good. He had walked up Fifth Avenue in all the pride of a Sam Browne belt, gold chevrons and a wound stripe. But it was over. Now, there remained only the formality of checking out, and the future would be at his elbow, whispering, "Well, what do you intend to do with me?"

Gladden's Uncle Steven had already sketched a rough plan. He would set him up in business as soon as he was ready to start.

"What have you been doing since you got back?" Uncle Steven asked.

"Oh, I took in a symphony. A Rachmaninoff concert. Saw one or two shows. Rode up and down on a bus with a girl I used to know."

"That's all?"

"That's all. They didn't change New York much while we were over there. Sometimes I wonder what it was all about. Here I am, home again; and I go to the theatre and listen to 'Siegfried' and get the same sensation of sad pleasure I had when I was a moon-calf. It's funny; but I don't seem to want to do much of anything except listen to music."

"Good lord," his uncle remarked.

"Oh, I'm not going to play the piano!" Gladden assured him.

"Your mother was a musician."

"And a good one!"

His uncle shifted a paper weight, as if to divert the young man's thoughts into a safer channel.

He suggested that Gladden begin at once the establishment of a secure future: Item one, an office; item two, contacts; item three, a job.

"I can manage the office," he said, "the first commission and the contacts—both political and personal. I'll send important men your way. Make a success of the first job, and the rest will be easy. I promised your father that I would do this for you as soon as you were out of college.

"War delayed somewhat the fulfillment of my promise. But the war is over. I advise you not to fall into the habit of loafing. It wasn't a nice war—no war is—but you can forget it if you want to. In two or three years, a Croix de Guerre with palm will cease to attract impressionable women. You will pack yours away in a steamer-trunk and there it will stay, gathering dust, until you haul it out for some grandchild to see.

"I know, because I brought a medal back with me from Cuba. It got me into trouble with a girl in Tampa, who thought, as I thought, that a medal meant immunity. . . ."

Gladden leaned over the rim to peer into a brackish circle, flat and dead as a disk of gun metal

Gladden caught his uncle's eyes. A shutter-flash of revelation betrayed this fat, gray-lipped, middle-aged man as a lover caught in the bitter-sweet lassitude of victory and release from death. With young love in his arm, cuddling against him in the shadow of those almost-arcaded streets in Tampa. A soldier with a medal.

Gladden smiled. "I see what you mean."

"How about the Architects' Building? Lots of engineers are finding it a good location. I'll give you a year's start. Then you come to me again, and report. I don't want to spy on you, or to make suggestions. (Continued on page 180)

Is College Worth Four Years Out Of Your Boy's Life?

"Fully half the boys whom well-meaning parents send to college would be better off, in all likelihood, if they had never come!" declares Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, president of Brown University—In this article he gives seven questions for a boy to ask himself before deciding upon college

By William S. Dutton

AT THIS moment, in this country, there is a vast, earnest army of parents imbued with a single ambition, and striving hard for one common end; and that end is that they may be able, when the time comes, to send their children to college.

It is a growing army. To-day, it probably numbers several millions. Its recruits are being drawn from every street and every farm valley—and there is many a battle against need, many a sacrifice along its front.

The man of business stands in its ranks; once poor, now he is prosperous, and he wants his sons and daughters to enjoy those advantages of books which, as a boy, he lacked. The machinist, the bookkeeper, the farmer, are there. The mother of three, who is saving from her back, her table, and her play; the father who is working nights and wearing last year's suit; the widow who has mortgaged her home, "that Jack might go to college"—these are there, and perhaps you.

"Laudable!" you say.

"Tragic!" was the word used by Dr. William H. P. Faunce, who for twenty-eight years has been president of Brown University, and who, both as teacher and as administrator, has watched thousands of college men come and go.

"Our common belief," said Doctor Faunce, "that college training is suited to every boy, and that every boy is suited to college, is one of the truly great tragedies of American life to-day! Fully half of the boys whom these well-meaning parents send to college would be better off, in all likelihood, if they never had come!"

College is a factor in our daily lives which directly or indirectly touches almost all of us. We may have children to send to college, or who are debating the question of college. We may be thinking of going to college ourselves. In business, if we are not college men, we are in competition with associates who are. The college-trained man himself often debates in his mind the benefits of his college training, even though at the same time his boy, following his example, is in college.

Just who should go to college? Who would be better off by staying away and getting his education through other sources, and what sources? Who of us is, and who of us is not, of the college type of mind, capable of being benefited by college training in proportion to the value of effort, time, and money expended to get it? How can we settle this problem for ourselves, and for our children?

I went to Doctor Faunce with these questions, for they sum up one of the great educational perplexities of the present day. We are more prosperous than has been any people in history. Families who never thought of it before are sending boys to universities; and we have gained the notion that every boy who can go to college should go, and that the only test of his fitness is the entrance examination and the ability of his parents, or himself, to pay his way.

IN consequence, many of our colleges are overcrowded. They have spent millions for more buildings, teachers, and equipment, and still are overcrowded. Thousands of boys are, of necessity, being turned away, to give up the college idea altogether, or to drift into untried institutions.

"The trouble," Doctor Faunce repeated, "is not so much that we are sending too many boys to college, but that we are sending too many of the wrong kind of boys. It is a situation unfair both to the colleges and to the boys."

Brown University, at Providence, Rhode Island, which Doctor Faunce heads, incorporated in 1764, is one of the oldest and most famous of New England universities. President Faunce, in turn, is one of the most eminent of American educators. He holds degrees conferred by ten colleges, including both Harvard and Yale. He is the author of various books of note, is known as an orator, and for ten years was pastor of the famous Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, of New York City. Now in his sixty-ninth year, for two thirds of his life he has been studying men, college men especially.

The Two Things College Endeavors to Give

"MONEY, opportunity, and the mere ability to obtain an entrance certificate or pass an entrance examination are not tests of college fitness," declares Doctor Faunce; "nor is the desire of a parent for a college-trained son any evidence of the son's fitness. Colleges do not confer degrees for athletic prowess. Their aim is not to grant badges of social and commercial prestige. They do not create capacity for understanding, but demand it. They are not designed for the purely practical-minded, nor for the youth who desires merely to do, rather than to think and comprehend.

"As I told our Brown students a few years ago the young man who enters college should come seeking two main things: First, horizon, and, second, mastery. These two things the college endeavors to give.

"Most of us enter college with an experience that is real but extremely limited. We have lived in our own back yard and seldom looked over the fence. To enlarge that horizon until it covers all lands and centuries, until it covers the great domains of literature, science, history, philosophy, and art, is the first object of college training. To know something of everything!

"The other main object is to give the student mastery of some one subject. Breadth of horizon is not enough—a man may be so broad that he is flat. There is no intellectual joy quite so great as the sense of having mastered some one corner of the world's knowledge. To know everything of something, and so master it, ought to be the second great aim of college training."

Dr. William H. P. Faunce

FOR twenty-eight years Doctor Faunce has been president of Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island, one of the oldest and best known American universities. Before taking up his duties at Brown, he was for five years pastor of the State Street Baptist Church, Springfield, Massachusetts, and for ten years pastor of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, one of the leading churches of New York City. His books include "The Educational Ideal in the Ministry," "What Does Christianity Mean," "Social Aspects of Foreign Missions," "Religion and War," and "The New Horizon of State and Church." Doctor Faunce was born in Worcester, Massachusetts, sixty-eight years ago.

Peggy Hoyt

MISS HOYT is one of America's foremost fashion creators. She was only seventeen when she decided that she wanted to be a designer of hats and gowns. Apprenticing herself to a well-known milliner, she spent two years in his workroom, learning the minute details of construction. She then borrowed three hundred dollars and opened a tiny cubbyhole of a shop of her own. That was fifteen years ago. She now occupies all of a handsome four-story house just off the east side of upper Fifth Avenue. Last year, Peggy Hoyt, Incorporated, did a business of more than a million dollars. In private life Miss Hoyt is Mrs. A. L. Eads. She was born in Saginaw, Michigan.

Clothes Don't Make The Woman But They Help A Lot

Peggy Hoyt, who for twelve years has been in the business of capitalizing women's "good points" in their dress, says that men are the best judges of what looks well on a woman—Advice to the woman who wishes to be well dressed on a small outlay

By Mildred Harrington

IT WAS Sunday morning in a junior girls' boarding-school in New Jersey. Outside, the sun was shining and church bells were ringing. Inside, in the big, homelike hall, a group of girls in pretty frocks gathered for the informal procession to the morning service. They were chattering and laughing, happy in the importance of being dressed up for a special occasion.

But in an alcove, shrinking behind a heavy curtain, one little girl—a slender sprite of eight with a pair of fine, serious eyes—was not happy. Indeed, she was quite miserable. And she was miserable for a very feminine reason: she hated the ugly, somber dress she wore. Ugly clothes did something to her spirit; they took away her wings. This morning she waited until the other girls had gone. Then she crept out and followed them to church.

It was like that almost every Sunday morning.

The child hungered for beauty, as a starving man hungers for food. A gorgeous sunset or a becoming frock set something inside her free. Certain colors made her want to sing and dance. But she had to take out her love for beautiful clothes in designing costumes for her large family of paper dolls. Her mother, who worked very hard in New York City in order to send her little daughter to a good school, could afford neither the time to make pretty dresses nor the money to buy them.

All this took place twenty-odd years ago.

To-day the little girl who was unhappy because she had to wear ugly clothes is said to be one of the best-dressed women in New York City. She ought to be, for her name is Peggy Hoyt, and she is one of the foremost fashion creators in the world. Wherever smartly-turned-out women congregate, there Peggy Hoyt hats and frocks may be seen.

Miss Hoyt is one of the few Americans recognized as rivals by the great Parisian houses. Indeed, she has made the French follow her lead in several notable instances. For one thing, she got the entire world out of the somber black clothes which the French dressmakers had made the mode. She simply used pastel colors until they were established in popular favor.

The other day I talked to Miss Hoyt in her smart shop in the East Fifties. She told me the Sunday morning incident I have just told you.

"It may seem a bit far-fetched," she said to me, "but I honestly believe that these early experiences of mine marked the beginning of my present passion for making people look their best. I began to study the appearance of the folks I met. And from the start, I was more interested in grown-ups than I was in my contemporaries. I was forever picking out women, and saying to myself, 'Mrs. Brown's hat is pretty, but it isn't becoming to her,' or, 'Miss Jones ought to give that dress to the tall Smith girl.' And immediately I would start planning a dress that would belong to Mrs. Brown, or a frock that would make plump little Miss Jones look taller and thinner.

"To-day, after twelve years of designing hats and gowns, I know that many a woman who is considered plain could look positively beautiful if she only knew how to choose the things she wears.

"Deep down in her heart, every woman yearns to appear beautiful—at least in the eyes of those who are dear to her. For that matter, no man is above wanting to look his best. This is right. In fact I sometimes think that we are morally responsible for the appearance we present. And right here, let me tell you something important which may sound queer coming from a designer of fashions, but which I know is true because I've tested it out on myself and hundreds of others. Here is my secret: Genuine kindliness of heart is the best possible beautifier. The most perfect hat in the world cannot lend loveliness to a selfish face. But, on the other hand, the effect of a lovely face can be sadly marred by a badly chosen hat."

TWELVE years ago, Miss Hoyt borrowed three hundred dollars and opened a tiny place on Fifth Avenue to sell the hats which she made. Last year, "Peggy Hoyt, Incorporated," did a business of more than a million dollars. The Hoyt establishment is on an exclusive side street just off the Avenue. It keeps several hundred employees busy.

Every one of the hundreds of hats and gowns shown in the Peggy Hoyt shop is designed by Miss Hoyt. She sews a label into a garment with the same pride which an artist in another field experiences when he signs a painting. Her shop is frankly expensive. She caters especially to the woman who can spend a great deal of money on her clothes. But, she points out, the principles underlying the art of good dress hold true, no matter what the price tag on a garment.

"As a small child," Miss Hoyt told me, "I had all the pretty frocks that any little girl could wish. Then, when I was five, we lost everything we had, and for a long time before his death, which came a few years later, Father was ill and unable to resume his business. Mother made up her mind to get a job at once. She decided to leave Saginaw, Michigan, which had been her home for years, and come to New York City. Here, she believed, she would have a better chance to get work which would eventually lead to more than a bare living. Also, she foresaw the educational advantages I would have in a great city.

"MOTHER'S training was simply that of any well-brought-up young woman of her day. She had been taught that her job in life was to make a home for a husband and children. She had always had a sufficient income and she had learned to spend it so as to get the maximum return for her money. Otherwise, she was as innocent of business training as I was.

"Inevitably, she found New York unwilling to bid very high for her services. Indeed, there were several weary weeks in which there was no bidding at all. And then one day, when our landlady was getting a little more urgent about the rent than was comfortable, Mother landed a job as comparison shopper for one of the largest department stores in town.

"Her duties were simple but very fatiguing. Every morning, a little after nine, she set out to make a round of the other smart shops catering to the same class of shoppers as that served by the store which employed her. She examined goods and prices, and in the late afternoon she returned to her own shop and made a report on her findings. The work was exacting; but the pay was fairly good and Mother saw in the job that opportunity for advancement for which she was always on the alert. That she made good, you may judge for yourself: she eventually became one of the highest-salaried European buyers for the store with which she started in such a humble way.

"But the upward climb was difficult and slow. How (Continued on page 72)

The Feud In Hell's Kitchen

And how it ended in the hold of a ship

By Octavus Roy Cohen

ILLUSTRATED BY JAMES MONTGOMERY FLAGG

MR. GLORY LAWSON, of Hell's Kitchen, New York, elevated himself to a sitting posture and glared peevishly at his friend.

"If you don't quit beatin' around the bush," he promised severely, "I'll pulverize you."

Eddie Grogan placed his cigarette on the table and put out a restraining hand.

"Ain't you got even a lick of sense, Glory? Can't you tell when a feller is serious? An' I guess you ain't gonna pulverize nobody, let alone me."

"But, listen,"—Glory Lawson rose to his feet, better displaying the amazing purples and reds of his lounging robe—"you come up here an' talk about me goin' to work. Work! Eddie, how do you expect me to listen patient?"

"I didn't say work," explained Mr. Grogan painstakingly. "I said I an' you was gonna take a job longshorin' at the Trans-Oceanic pier."

Glory shook his head. "What do I want to work as a longshoreman for," he queried, "if there ain't no stealin' to be done?"

"Oh, there's plenty reasons! There's a feller workin' on that particular job. Workin' as a watchman."

Glory's expression altered abruptly. The eyes became narrow-lidded; there was a tightening around the corners of the lips and a reflex clenching of fists.

"Not Dave Kerry?" he inquired venomously.

Eddie nodded. "Him, an' no other. An' that ain't all." Already Glory was shedding the rainbow robe. "He's watchin' alone in hatch number two."

Glory Lawson whistled softly. "Some men," he declared, "have got more nerve than sense."

Eddie Grogan smiled. It was a slow, crooked smile, which raised the corners of his mouth and decorated his pudgy face with an expression of sinister joviality.

"When do we work?"

"To-morrow. For one day only." Glory bustled about the room, assembling his clothes. "Dave Kerry watchin' alone in the hold! Of all the luck—" Suddenly he paused and gazed solemnly at his friend: "Listen, Eddie! What you reckon Dave Kerry's widow would prefer—carnations or lilies?"

IT WAS neither chance nor the spirit of adventure which had brought Ellen Mabry to New York two years before. She was a small-town girl, delectably pretty and quite convinced that opportunities for advancement in her native city were decidedly less than nonexistent. There were too many personable young men in that particular city who knew perfectly well that she concocted wheat cakes and sinkers behind the gleaming window of a white-front restaurant. And, somehow, they seemed unanimously averse to becoming publicly identified with a young lady so prominent.

Ellen's eyes widened apprehensively as she sensed the hostility which was flaming between her two acquaintances

And so, while it was not chance that brought Ellen to New York, it was perhaps chance which eventually caused her to drift into a job as waitress in the Coffee Pot.

Her ignorance of New York was indicated by the fact that she accepted a position in that section of the city which bears the colorful title of "Hell's Kitchen." It was not until several months had elapsed that Ellen learned that the section in which she labored bore that sobriquet—and by that time she had become acclimated. The only impression made upon her during the first fortnight of work was that the Coffee Pot was by no means a first-class restaurant, and that the men who flocked in at noon for coffee and pie and other atrociously indigestible foods were inclined to be a trifle uncouth.

Ellen Mabry was young and unafraid. It was really quite thrilling to one who had never been closer to the ocean than the modest lake near her home town, to gaze through the sometimes clean window and see the gaunt masts and the funnels of huge liners.

AS TO the men who frequented the place they were many, and the clothes they wore were neither picturesque nor clean. Nor did they seem overly partial to razors or other sartorial refinements. They were short men mostly; men of bulging muscles and stodgy features, although there were a few of distinctly different type who also wore the habiliments of longshoremen.

She was interested in these particular men. They were longshoremen, and yet they were not longshoremen. For one thing, they garbed themselves at night in the very best of Eighth Avenue style, and they wore diamonds. She puzzled about this: the wage of a longshoreman is not of gem-purchasing proportions, and in those early days of her career Ellen knew nothing of the thievery along the water front which has served in recent years to convert many able gangsters into earnest business men.

IT WAS not until Glory Lawson came into her life that she separated any single one of them from the crowd, and the chances are she wouldn't have done that had she not heard one squint-eyed gentleman say to another as the debonair figure strolled insouciantly into the lunch-room, "That's Glory Lawson." He spoke with infinite respect, and Ellen followed the direction of his gaze. Her eyes met Glory's squarely, and it was she who looked away.

Then he was leaning across the counter, his black eyes flaming into hers, a thin, sardonic smile on his lips: "Where you been all my life, sister?"

"Just waiting," she countered. "Just waiting for you to show up."

"Well, here I am. I catch 'em young, treat 'em rough, an' don't tell 'em nothin'." He nodded toward the young gentleman standing beside him, a man considerably shorter but decidedly heavier. "I wantcha to meet my friend, Mr. Grogan, Eddie Grogan. Eddie, shake hands with Miss— Say, what did you say your name was?"

"I didn't say."

"Aw, c'mon, sister. How will I know who to ask for when I come around tonight?"

In spite of herself, she laughed: "If that's what's troubling you, big boy, I guess you might ask is Ellen Mabry at home."

And from that hour Mr. Lawson did Miss Mabry the honor of paying court to her, his intentions being by no means honorable.

Less than a fortnight later it became apparent that her views and his were radically at variance on a certain important topic. Mr. Lawson was not a believer in matrimony. Ellen explained briefly but positively that she was neither flattered nor complaisant, and Glory left in a state of utter bewilderment. Here was an experience new to him: a girl—not so durned awfully pretty, although kinda sweet-lookin'—had repulsed his advances. He wondered what the gang would think—when the gang knew perfectly well that he had marked Ellen out for his own.

Fighting and women are the only two things of importance in a gangster's life. And now Glory felt that he was to lose a considerable prestige by this rebuff at the hands of Ellen Mabry, a waitress. It was unthinkable! For three days he forbore to visit the little lunch-room; and in that time something else happened. It came to his ears through Eddie Grogan.

"Why ain'tcha been down to the Coffee Pot, Glory? You an' the kid ain't bust up, have you?"

"Uh-huh. Kinda. She's got funny ideas about marriage."

Eddie whistled. "Gee! Ain't wimmin crazy? But maybe—" Eddie paused in obvious embarrassment.

"Spill it, Eddie."

"Well—I was kinda thinkin' that if you was really strong for that frail you'd better start hangin' around again."

"Why?"

"H-mm . . . tell the truth, Glory, she seems to have took up with another feller."

Mr. Lawson's face flushed. This was indeed adding insult to injury. "You don't mean it?"

"Yeh. An' that ain't all, either. He's a watchman!"

Glory Lawson flopped into a chair. "A watchman?" he breathed unbelievingly.

"Uh-huh. A Chelsea Protective man named Kerry."

Glory was incensed. It struck him as highly indecent that Ellen should have selected a watchman to indicate to him that she didn't care. "A cargo watchman!" he muttered. "Now, can you beat it?"

GLORY clad himself in his most marvelous raiment and was in the Coffee Pot shortly before the noon hour. Eleventh Avenue was a welter of trucks and traffic; the big piers hummed with activity. It was a clear, cool morning and two big steamers had just docked. Glory sauntered back to the counter where Ellen Mabry, fresh and white and somewhat frosty of eye, awaited him.

"'Lo, sister."

"Good morning, Mr. Lawson."

"Aw, can that formal stuff! I ain't Mister to you."

"Ain't you, though. I thought I said the other night that I didn't want to have nothin' more to do with you."

Then the door was flung wide open and the hungry longshoremen stormed in. First came the men Ellen knew should not be longshoremen: young fellows who greeted Glory respectfully, and whom he knew. Then the others—men whose interest in cargo handling was professionally limited to the eighty cents per hour they received from the boss stevedore. They were unpicturesque.

For perhaps ten minutes there was a wild surging around the counter, and the waitresses worked swiftly and deftly, manipulating the short orders. During this time both Ellen and Glory were acutely conscious of the fact that several of the Gophers were more than casually interested in the return of Glory Lawson to the hunt.

Finally, they were all served and the little arm chairs filled with munching men. Then there was a distinct gasp as the door opened and Dave Kerry entered.

DAVE KERRY was a watchman, yet he was different from most of his fellows. Glory, appraising him swiftly, wondered why the man was contented with the four dollars a day that the agency paid him. Dave didn't look like a four-dollar-a-day man; he was tall and lithe and quietly impressive. Glory Lawson's verdict was instant:

"Crook!" he catalogued Kerry. "If he wasn't in on some of the dock graft he'd be workin' somewheres else for more than four dollars a day."

But Kerry was not a crook. He was an easy-going sort of person who enjoyed this type of police work because it was a care-free, rather indolent existence. It was work which held promise of romance and certainty of excitement, and Dave Kerry was only one of thousands who are content with the meager wage simply because the work and the tang of the water front appeal irresistibly.

Kerry moved across the lunch-room toward Ellen Mabry. Her eyes smiled a greeting and little telltale spots of color flamed in her cheeks. Glory saw—and understood. And he knew that there were others who also saw and understood.

Dave Kerry paused before the counter, and he, too, smiled. It was a smile which lighted up his rather thin face and lent a softness to his eyes.

"Howdy, Miss Mabry."

"Morning, Mr. Kerry. What'll you have to-day?"

"Coffee, please, ma'am, and three of them doughnuts."

She turned to serve him, but not before she glimpsed the flushed face of Glory Lawson. There was an expectant hush as Glory Lawson deliberately edged closer. It was obvious that Dave Kerry suspected nothing, and so when Glory brushed his elbow, Kerry turned with a casual "Excuse me."

"Nothin' to excuse you for," growled Glory. "I done that meself."

"Oh!" Kerry was puzzled. "That's all right."

"You bet your last nickel it's all right. Anything I do is all right."

It dawned upon Dave Kerry that this man was driving at something. His eyes lost a trifle of their softness and they focused upon the other man speculatively.

He knew just what Glory Lawson was; he had not been blind during his two years as cargo watchman. He knew also that Glory must be a gangster of parts, for he saw now that the other Gophers were watching with respectful interest. Kerry spoke frostily.

"Listen here," he counseled; "I wouldn't go pickin' no trouble if I was you."

"No? And who's gonna stop me?"

Ellen returned. Her eyes widened apprehensively as she sensed the hostility which was flaming between her two acquaintances.

"Here y'are, Mr. Kerry. Here's your coffee an' doughnuts."

"Thanks, Miss Mabry." He started to turn away, but the insulting face of Glory Lawson was insinuated before him.

"Watchman, ain't you?"

"Uh-huh."

"Well, maybe that's why I don't like you. I ain't got no use for watchmen."

A faint smile flickered across Dave Kerry's lips.

"Thieves seldom have," he replied easily.

For an instant they faced each other. Dave heard the girl gasp. There was a general shuffling of feet above the clatter of crockery, and Kerry stood expectantly, his eyes unblinking.

It was Glory Lawson who moved away. He laughed loudly and shrugged his shoulders. Kerry, without another glance in his direction, selected a chair and gave himself over to his simple lunch. But before leaving he spoke to the girl:

"Who was that bird?"

"Glory Lawson."

"I see." Kerry had heard of the man. "Why's he try to start something with me?"

She flushed: "He's been a sort of friend of mine, Mr. Kerry—and I guess he was—well, that is—"

The watchman grinned. "Jealous, eh? You know, it kind of tickles me to have a guy jealous of me on account of you. I suppose that hits you as sort of funny—"

"There's nothing funny about it," she answered seriously. "Glory Lawson is pretty bad medicine."

AND now a certain youthful clique of Gophers blazed with conjecture. According to their opinion, Glory Lawson was cut in the head over a girl. Eddie Grogan was frankly dazed. "I never see a man so nuts," he confided. "First thing you know, he'll be askin' the dame to marry him!"

Which is precisely what Glory Lawson did.

Of course it was quite apparent to him that Ellen Mabry was merely using Dave Kerry to extract from him a proposal of marriage. It was impossible that she should care for Dave, while he, Glory, remained a suitor, and it was also plain that she was not a girl to be had short of the altar. And so, more to prove to the gang that he was irresistible, he resolved that he would crush the affair with a single magnificent gesture. He informed Ellen that he couldn't live without her, and she countered with the retort snappy that he couldn't live with her.

"Aw, you got me all wrong!" he explained. "I'm decent, I am. I'm even willing to marry you."

He was doused with a shower of icy laughter.

"Can you beat it?" remarked Miss Mabry. "Can you even tie it, I ask you? You're willing to marry me!"

"Yeh. Honest. I ain't kidding."

"Listen, big boy—who are you that I should get excited because you're willing to marry me?"

He closed his fingers on the cool, firm flesh of her arm. "You don't understand."

"Sure I understand; but you don't. Now get this: I appreciate a-plenty when any feller asks me to marry him; but it's like you said yourself: You ain't the marrying kind, and I wouldn't take a chance with you."

Glory was staggered. He shook his head dazedly: "An' all the boys knew I was gonna ask you. They was gettin' ready to give us a swell racket!"

"That's all right. Just go tell your friends they was too previous."

"WELL, I'll be—" Glory departed without another word. He had the uncomfortable sensation of having had something happen to him. His pride had received a crushing blow. Why, it was absurd enough that he should have deigned to fall for a skirt; but that she should have intrigued him into a proposal of marriage and then—of all things!—refused him! . . . "Ow! What'll the boys say?"

The boys said a great deal, but fortunately for themselves did not say it where Glory Lawson could hear. It was amazing how quickly certain members of the Gopher Gang learned that Ellen Mabry had refused to marry the radiant Mr. Lawson. It also was amazing how soon they discovered that she was engaged to Dave Kerry.

Glory heard the news from Ellen herself. She told him gently, fearing to hurt his feelings.

Mr. Lawson released a little pent-up profanity having to do with watchmen and women in general, and Dave Kerry and Ellen in particular:

"I'll get that guy!" he threatened evilly. "I'll get him if I go to the chair for it."

And, even though Ellen laughed bravely into his eyes and warned him that Dave Kerry was capable of taking care of himself, she became afraid; and so, when she and Dave married a week later, her first act of wifehood was to make him abandon work on the piers.

"Watching ain't no kind of a job for you, honey. You know good and well you can make more than four dollars a day."

He stroked her glossy brown hair. "I know, sugar. I didn't select the job. Work ain't so easy to find nowadays, and maybe we better hold on."

"No. Promise me that you won't go back to that agency. Promise!"

And so Dave promised, and for nearly two years the water front knew him not. The day he went to work with a big warehouse and moving concern Ellen breathed more easily. She had learned swiftly during her tenure of office as waitress in the Coffee Pot, and she knew what the end would have been: a dark corner, a massing of Gophers, the bums' rush—perhaps even a leaden pellet from an ugly little automatic. It was better that Dave should work elsewhere.

Hell's Kitchen forgot Ellen Mabry, but not immediately. Glory himself did not forget. "Some day," he said bitterly, "that bird'll come back. And when he does—"

Dave Kerry leaped from his place of concealment . . . his hands caught the rising hook, which was swaying in the direction of his jump

Life settled into its routine of idleness and thievery and fighting and dancing for Glory Lawson and his gang, and to a quiet round of domesticity in the three-room flat down-town where Mr. and Mrs. Dave Kerry lived.

Things went fairly well with them for a time. But Dave was an easy-going sort, and not overly fond of taking orders from bosses who did not always choose their language with scrupulous care. One day there was a fight, and Dave was jobless. Other jobs were found with difficulty, and they did not prove permanent.

Then he announced that he was going back to the Chelsea Protective. Ellen was frightened; but not as much as she would have been two years before. The Coffee Pot seemed far distant, and she was fairly well convinced that Glory Lawson must have forgotten.

"You see, honey," he explained, "Old Man Vann likes me a heap. He knows I'm on the level, and he says he'll give me five dollars a day for special work. That's pretty good money."

"I Don't Know Of A Happier Way To Have Spent My Life"

Joshua D. Loizeaux has helped three generations to build the homes in which they have lived, loved, and brought up their families—At the start his was a one-horse and a one-man lumberyard, but the horse had strength, and the man had vision

By Helen Christine Bennett

WHEN I moved to Plainfield, N. J., last fall, a friend who was giving me information as to the various tradesmen concluded:

"And if you need anything in the building line, from six inches of molding to paneling for a palace, go to Loizeaux."

"Oh, now come, Jimmie, you're stretching it," I objected.

"No; I am not," he retorted. "Why, those people are wonderful! You can get anything you want there, from a piece of wood to cut a jig-saw puzzle to material for a skyscraper. If you don't quite know what you want, they will help you to find out. If you think of building, they will not only find a contractor for you, but they will also supply the plans and materials, arrange the financing, and not charge you a red cent for the extra service. It's a huge business, with a yard at Elizabeth as well as here, and timber tracts both North and South—about the biggest thing of its kind in the state."

As I began to get acquainted in the neighborhood, I found the statement to be literally true. The various mills and lumberyards running under the direction of J. D. Loizeaux were doing a total business of more than four millions; but over half of it was within a radius of this city of forty-five thousand inhabitants. No one can walk five blocks in Plainfield without coming upon one of the Loizeaux signs upon a newly completed house, or meeting one of the Loizeaux trucks, laden with sand, gravel, lumber, or other building supplies.

Scenting a story, I hunted up a newspaper man.

"It's a real yarn," he assured me. "J. D. came here about twenty-eight years ago with very little money. He ran a bicycle around town for about three years, because he couldn't afford a horse. And he sold shingles and fence rails to the farmers. Now he has about the biggest and best managed business I know of. Three of his sons are with him and three nephews, and they are all keen fellows, and good citizens. If we want trucks for a Sunday-school picnic or parade, we go to Loizeaux. When the fresh-air camp for children from the East Side of New York was started here, just beyond the town, J. D. sent all the materials for playgrounds and some of the buildings, and he spent a lot of time there. You ought to go down and see his lumberyard."

So I went down to see the lumberyard. As I approached it I stopped my car in sheer amazement. I had visited many lumberyards, but this was outside recognition. Beyond an irregular slatted fence of yellow boards tipped with black spread a village of buildings—attractive, well-proportioned little buildings, also showing the yellow and black beneath their green shingled roofs. Two beautiful pedestal lamps flanked the entrance to a small but handsome brick building, evidently housing offices. As I stepped across its threshold I caught my breath. Anything less like the ordinary lumber office would be hard to conceive:

A reception hall paneled in silvered oak, with tiled floor, rugs, comfortable chairs, and tables with vases of bittersweet flashed by as I was guided into a mahogany-lined office to greet the president. He rose from his huge desk as I entered, a tall, heavy, robust man in the sixties, with an active step like a boy's.

"DO SIT down," he urged. I looked at the chair beside me, and laughed.

"If I do, I'll never get up. Everything is so comfortable here."

He smiled with pleasure.

"Do you like the place?" he asked eagerly. "We do. It is nearly new, this building, and it seems pretty nice to us."

"I'd like to go over the yard," I said. "It's different from anything I've ever seen. And I want to talk with you. How much time can I have?"

"When I undertake anything I give it the time it requires," he said briefly.

"If you want to see the yard we will go now."

If I had known Joshua D. Loizeaux better, I would not have asked about time, for he gives to anything he undertakes the time it requires. Perhaps that is one answer to the why of the Loizeaux business. Father and sons know no limit to time spent in it, except the natural one of twenty-four hours a day.

Mr. Loizeaux greets an old friend

WE stepped through a back door into a scene of neatness. All along the streets of the little village lay regular piles of lumber under thatched painted sheds; sand and gravel and tiles and pipe, all the rough miscellany of builder's supplies, were in meticulous array; the walks were clear, paved, and clean, and the air was filled with a pungent fragrance, one which I could not identify.

"Fir," Mr. Loizeaux, as I sniffed the pungent odor. "Over there, forty-seven cars from the state of Washington are now being unloaded." He stooped, broke off a chip from a thin board in a shed we were passing and handed it to me. "Cedar," he said, "still more fragrant, cedar from Virginia." From shed to shed we went, sheds stored with spruce and chestnut, with precious white pine from Minnesota, white pine now rarer than mahogany, with shingles, brick, cement, sand, gravel, pipes, through machine shops and specialty shops, and a huge wood mill; and, last of all, a retail hardware store. Through all of these the same perfect order prevailed, so uniform that I had the illusion of unreality.

"What do you do to a board when it gets out of order?" I asked, laughing.

"THERE is more in this than meets the eye," he said. "We like to have things sightly; but we have a more profound reason for keeping them so. One of the main losses in this kind of business is waste, partly because the merchandise is rough and so in itself commands little respect. We discovered that order not only increased the attractiveness of the materials the men have to handle, but it also increased their respect for them. And a man works faster and more efficiently when he respects what he is working with. In this yard, things are seldom mislaid; but if they are they can be found easily, and that of course saves time."

"But how do you manage to have such regular piles of lumber?" I asked.

"We can pile lumber in this way," Mr. Loizeaux replied, "because our sheds are separated by block walls of hollow tiles. The walls serve a twofold purpose. They afford support to the lumber and lower our insurance about a third. Moreover, in this yard our trucks are washed every Saturday, all forty of them. Their condition is one of our best advertisements."

I began to see that this lumber and supply yard was both an example of cleanliness and order and a canny yard.

Canny, the office building too, with its little hall set aside for the entertainment of visiting contractors and buyers. Here the Loizeaux Lumber Company shows moving pictures of new building materials, and lectures on new equipment are given. In the reception-room, books of plans of houses are pored over by newly-weds, or by those of settled years, who enjoy to the full the delight of selecting their first owned home.

As we returned to the private office the telephone rang. Mr. Loizeaux answered, and I overheard a conversation that had to do with fifteen hundred bushels of apples.

"Pardon my curiosity," I said; "but do you mind telling me what you are going to do with fifteen hundred bushels?"

"Entice my employees into buying them," replied Mr. Loizeaux. "I have a contract with an apple orchard where the apples are all good, because the trees are properly cared for. Every fall I order about this quantity of apples, and try to get my employees to buy them. I get rock-bottom prices, and I usually have the satisfaction of knowing that in the cellars of the homes of the employees there is a good apple supply. I buy potatoes in the same way too. It is a thrifty way to buy."

Here, then, was another side to this many-sided business. But I was to know more sides later on, not from Mr. Joshua D. Loizeaux, but from his employees, and from residents of Plainfield: tales of men helped to own their homes, of widows financed through the first hard years, of an interest that reached out to any known distress.

"It just seems," said one employee resignedly, "as if anybody who is going to have a house mortgage foreclosed calls upon Mr. Loizeaux for help. He is full of ingenuity in finding a way out without loss to anyone. But, in any event, the company never suffers; he would think that unfair to those of us who own stock."

To understand this unusual compound of generosity and thrift, it is necessary to know something of the history not only of Joshua D. Loizeaux but also of his family.

If you will forget for a moment the lumberyard, and the shrewd, kindly man at its head, and journey with me back through the years and out of this country, you will be repaid.

TO FRANCE then, and 1853, and a little village farmhouse, where Jean Jacques Loizeaux and his wife Suzanne and their seven children lived and labored. For three hundred years, the father and forefathers of Jean and Suzanne had lived in that one spot, wresting a meager living from the soil—thrifty farmers who believed in themselves and in the God who watched over them. Morning and night Jean Jacques read the word of God, and the family joined in prayer.

But times were hard, the family was large, and Jean Jacques was put to it to feed so many. Out of his need arose an idea—America. The land of promise was great and, wonderful thought, perhaps there would be farms enough for all the boys! He sold (Continued on page 224)

Your Uncle Ed

By Don Marquis

ILLUSTRATED BY NORMAN PRICE

YOUR Uncle Ed needs no introduction; nearly every good old American family has him, or has had him. He is not always an uncle, of course; sometimes he is a father, or a brother, or a cousin, or a nephew, or even an in-law. If he isn't with you now, actually and in the flesh, he is certainly with you in memory. And as the years stretch on the memories grow kindlier. The Family used to get rather impatient with him at times; he was always something of a Family Problem; and yet he was a lovable old bird, even if he was a trifle visionary.

And, visionary as he seemed, every now and then there has been an Uncle Ed in some American family who actually made good in a big way! And it's sort of hard for any of us to Laugh That Off—even though the reminiscent laughter at our particular Uncle Ed may be tinged with tenderness and whimsicality and sympathy. For he always said that, with just a little more money, he could have made millions! He thought in millions, Uncle Ed did, while the rest of the family were thinking in terms of dollar- and five-dollar bills, some of which were needed to keep Uncle Ed going.

WHILE I am summoning up recollections of the particular Uncle Ed I knew, perhaps memories of your own Uncle Ed will return to smile upon you and be smiled upon.

I recall (as if it were yesterday) the time, years ago, when the first automobile appeared on the streets of our little city, and what a personal grief it was to Uncle Ed.

"There!" said Uncle Ed. "There! Just look at that Horseless Carriage! That's my idea. I had it first. And now, somebody else will make millions out of it—just because I didn't have a little help and money and belief at the right time, so that I could develop my idea, and take out a patent on it! But, of course, nobody in this family believed in me!"

"Why, Ed," said Dad, "it's news to me that you ever had such an idea."

"It is, is it? Then you've got a short memory! I had that idea, and talked about it time and again, ever since I was a kid. When I was about six years old I said to Father one day, 'Daddy, why couldn't the railroad engine run right down Main Street?' And he laughed at me, and said it had to stay on the railroad track—everybody's always laughed at me. And I said, 'Why?' and he laughed again. But all the time I was growing up, and after I got to be a man, I kept hold of that idea, trying to work it out; the idea of a vehicle that could run on roads, by its own power, without being pulled by horses. And now here it is! And somebody's going to make millions out of it! You see if they don't. Why, I even made drawings for it."

According to Uncle Ed, he had always made drawings for nearly everything new.

"Where are the drawings, Ed?" Dad asked him now, being, perhaps, a trifle skeptical.

"Got 'em somewhere yet," says Uncle Ed. "That is, if they didn't burn with the rest of my stuff when my shop burned down. I'd 'a' taken out a patent on 'em five years ago, but nobody would lend me the money. And now it's too late, and this family has lost millions—just simply millions!"

And as the automobile industry grew and grew and grew, Dad and the family heard more and more about the millions they might have had if they had only shown a little more enterprise, and belief in Uncle Ed; if somebody had only come through at the right time with a little money. Uncle Ed doesn't mind telling you that he would now be sitting where Henry Ford is, if he could have got the backing at the proper time. And if we had only listened to his schemes patiently, and given him our complete confidence, and a little more money to experiment with, he might have achieved what Luther Burbank did.

BUT, for the most part, Uncle Ed always took it rather sweetly. He never got envious of Henry Ford or of Luther Burbank. He triumphed vicariously in the triumphs of men like that. He always forgave the family again. He always bobbed up with a new scheme of his own. He was always generous with plans for the welfare of everybody else. He would consider their problems, and work and worry over them, and hand them out golden advice. I can remember his saying to Cousin Ferd, who was a farmer:

"Ferd, I've been thinking over your problems—every angle of them. The trouble with you is, you don't rotate your crops enough. Rotation of crops, Ferd, is the great thing in farming. I want to read you a piece I wrote about it for the county paper last year."

And Uncle Ed took it out of his billfolder and read it, for the fifth time, probably, to Ferd. He was a little hurt when Ferd didn't, forthwith, turn over the management of the farm to him. He had meant to make Ferd rich. He meant well by everybody, Uncle Ed did. Unselfishly well. His interest was always generous and kindly.

IN THE case of the Bargain Store which he purchased, the family always felt he was a little too unselfish. The man he bought it from had failed, and Uncle Ed said it was because he didn't offer good enough bargains—anybody could see that with half an eye. The store belied its name.

A week after Uncle Ed took it over, Dad went in, and the place was crowded to the doors. Dad had put some money into the enterprise. And the jam of customers about the place made it look as if Uncle Ed had finally struck something.

"I've got 'em!" said Uncle Ed, triumphantly to Dad, waving his hands with a large gesture at the store full of eager purchasers. "I've got 'em coming! Modern methods! Advertising up to date in the paper! Real Bargains! I'm going to start a chain of stores like this—there's millions in it! Millions!"

Dad got worried when he looked at some of the prices marked on Uncle Ed's goods—bargains they certainly were.

"Ed," he said, "it looks to me like you must be selling some of this stuff for less than it cost you!"

"Uh-huh!" said Uncle Ed, cheerily. "Bought all this in bulk; and I'm getting rid of it at real bargain prices! Just to get people coming here! Just to get them started! Once they're started, they'll come! Underselling everybody in town on every article offered! I'm getting 'em started my way! Biggest advertisement a store could have."

The scheme was to restock the store, after the original goods purchased had been cleared out, and offer the new goods at higher prices, showing a profit. And people would continue to come and buy, said Uncle Ed, because it would have been so deeply scored into their minds that his Bargain Store was the only economical place in town to trade.

And it worked all right, the scheme did, right up to the time when the stock had to be replenished; and then it developed that Uncle Ed must have overdone the thing a trifle somewhere. He had not only been giving extraordinary bargains to people, but he had also been giving them extraordinary credit. And he found that he could neither pay his obligations to the man from whom he had purchased the store, nor the wholesalers from whom he had purchased, with the money which was owed to him by his retail customers. But Uncle Ed always thought that if he had but had a little more time to get his chain store idea going—and a little more capital—there would have been millions in it.

He never was much good at collecting money that was owing to him; he got softhearted about it, and would often, when a debtor told him a tale of woe, lend the man a little more money besides—if he found someone he could borrow the extra amount from.

No family gathering was ever complete without Uncle Ed. And probably he contributed more to the general joy of these festivities than any other one person. Children flocked to him instinctively. And if he happened to be in such financial straits that he could not bring a toy for each one of them, he always had a facile jackknife with which he could make something more wonderful than money could buy. He was a wizard with waterwheels and windmills and kites and little wagons constructed of cigar boxes and spools, and with pop-guns and squirt-guns and crossbow-guns; and he could fix anything that needed it about the house, from churns and window-blind rollers to washing-machines and old-fashioned clocks. And he would spend patient hours cheerfully tinkering with these things—or even with the less profitable job of helping the twins construct a steam engine out of junk, an engine that sometimes almost ran!

AFTER the Bargain Store failed, Dad never actually backed him in but one other thing. And that was, on the face of it, a perfectly good idea. Uncle Ed got heated up with the notion that there should be a canning factory in our town.

And, the cold fact is, there should have been. It was the center of a very productive agricultural community. And the canning industry was developing rapidly.

It was a sane idea; a really good business proposition. Dad put almost a thousand dollars more of his hard-earned cash into it, after mature consideration, rejoicing that Uncle Ed had at last got down to something practical; and some of Dad's friends also subscribed small amounts.

Uncle Ed was so sure there was fortune ahead this time that he mortgaged the last piece of real estate he possessed—the lot where the shop used to be before it burned down as a consequence of some of Uncle Ed's experiments in chemistry.

But the investors had reckoned without Uncle Ed's vast mental activity, and his tendency to think in millions.

For the enterprise

The Grateful Lunella

A love story in which a little servant girl plays matchmaker

By Elisabeth Sanxay Holding

ILLUSTRATED BY FRANCES ROGERS

THERE was always a quality of enchantment for Clare in entering her own flat at the end of the day. When she turned the key, there was that little domain awaiting her, peaceful, exquisitely neat, glowing with quiet colors. It seemed to her that, of all the people she knew, she alone had discovered this secret of a perfect home, a serene and ordered place, where one could really enjoy rest.

For all she saw of the process, the flat might have been kept in order by Brownies—except that Brownies ask only a saucer of milk and present no bill for services. She had arranged with an agency for a reliable woman to come in every day, and every day somebody did come, unseen by Clare. She went out in the morning, and while she was gone all was made ready for her return.

A florist had a standing order to keep her supplied with flowers; she liked not to know what would be sent, but to be delighted with a sudden vision of jonquils or roses or peonies. Every detail of her life at home was lovely. She had not only physical ease and comfort, but all those other things to gratify her fastidious and varied tastes: a rosewood piano, shelves and shelves of books, two or three signed lithographs on the walls, and from her window a glimpse of the Hudson.

On this especial evening she came home as usual, in her usual tranquil and contented frame of mind. It was a wild, rainy November night; but what cared she for that? She had taken a taxi up from the office, and she stepped out of it under the portico of the apartment house and entered the hall, smiling, faintly rosy, and quite unruffled.

A charming young woman, Clare was, blond and slender, with clear, delicate skin, and gleaming hair that testified proudly to the care given it. She was quietly and becomingly dressed, and she had a manner rather remarkable for her twenty-five years—the unmistakable manner of the successful.

The hall boy and the elevator boy showed her marked respect; everyone did, for she knew very well how to get what she wanted, and was always ready to pay for it.

She opened the door of her flat, pressed the switch-button in the hall, and at once two shaded lamps blossomed like living flowers of soft, blended colors. The perfume of roses greeted her; on the table lay two new magazines come by mail; a delightful evening awaited her.

She telephoned down-stairs to the hall boy and asked him to go to the little restaurant 'round the corner and bring her in dinner—that being her custom when the weather was bad and she did not care to stop at her usual restaurant on the way home. Then she washed, brushed her hair, put on slippers and a negligee; and, just at the right moment, the dinner came.

She arranged it on a little table by the window and sat down there. The rain was driving in violent gusts against the glass, and she drew aside the curtains so that she might see the wild blackness outside. And there was Clare, so snug, so justly comfortable, in this little refuge she had won by her own efforts. All alone she had accomplished this; she often said to herself, with pride, that she owed nothing to anybody else, and she imagined that that was a good thing.

Her parents had died when she was a child; but they had left enough money for her education, and the aunt who had looked after her in those brief intervals when she was at home from boarding-school had been well repaid for her trouble. It had been always a matter of business between her and Clare, and nothing more.

After school, Clare had gone to an art institute and taken a course in textile designing, and had got a good job and done well in it. And then got a better one, and gone on and on, until at twenty-five she was—where she was. And it seemed to her a good place to be.

SHE was just finishing her coffee when the front doorbell rang. Now, this should have been impossible, and Clare was displeased. It was the hall boy's business to see that no one got up here without first being announced by telephone, and he had never before failed in his duty. Clare frowned a little as she went to open the door.

The queerest little figure stood there. A very small girl, in a wet and bedraggled cotton dress, with a towel pinned around her head in the fashion of a Red Cross nurse. Her eyes were wide with fright, and she was trembling from head to foot; yet, for all this, she had such an air of grown-up responsibility.

"Excuse me, ma'am," she said. "But—but I'm afraid I've set his house afire."

Clare stared at her in amazement.

"If you'd jist please come an' see!" said the child.

"But I don't understand!" said Clare. "Whose house? Where?"

"Mr. Arthur's house—right here—next to yours. Jist please step in—"

"Next door! Call the boys! Ring for the elevator!" said Clare, with considerable energy. "I'll telephone—"

"No, ma'am! Please don't do that!" cried the little girl. "Please, please don't! If you'll jist step in—you an' me kin put the fire out. It's only a little, weeny fire! Oh, please come!"

"My dear child—" Clare began; but when she looked down at the poor trembling little thing, "I'll go and take a look," she said, doubtfully.

The little girl was off like a shot, and Clare followed her into the apartment next her own. She was met by a dense, choking cloud of smoke that stopped her.

"Come back!" she called. "Come back, child!"

But the child had disappeared into the smoke, and Clare hurried after her, down the passage, and into the front room.

"It's here, ma'am!" said a stifled little voice, and in the corner of the room where the smoke was thickest, Clare saw the child. She ran to her, and caught her by the arm.

"Come at once!" she said. "You'll—"

THEN her eye fell upon a curious shrouded object on the writing desk, which was evidently the cause and fountainhead of all the smoke. She could not discern what the thing was, but at least it was only smoldering, without flame.

"Bring some water!" she cried. "Hurry up!"

"I—I dassen't," faltered the little girl. "I dassent put water on Mr. Arthur's desk. . . ."

So Clare got water herself, plenty of it, in a saucepan from the kitchen, and poured it liberally over the smoldering object. Then she flung open the windows and, as the room cleared, was able at last to investigate this remarkable fire. From the top of the desk she lifted a reeking woolen mass, sodden with water.

"What's this?" she asked.

"It's m-my coat," said the little girl. "I throwed it on, to see if I couldn't—kind o' smother out the fire."

Clare looked at the garment; a plaid coat, it was, the cheapest, flimsiest little coat, with big pearl buttons.

"But what was the fire?" she asked, more gently.

"I was jist clearing up Mr. Arthur's desk—an'—it cotched."

"But how?"

"I jist wanted ter see—jist wanted ter see—" Sobs choked her. "Jist thought them candles must look so pretty when they're lit up—an' the match dropped outen my hand—fell in a little box 'at had cotton in it—and the whole thing cotched—so I—I throwed my coat on it. . . . It's all my own fault. I hadn't ought ter of m-meddled. . . ."

Clare was, as a rule, very fond of justice, and of people taking the consequences of their acts, and that sort of thing. But in this case she was simply and unjustly sorry for this forlorn little creature instead of blaming her. That poor little drenched coat!

"My dear—" she began, when the child seized her arm.

"Mr. Arthur!" she whispered. "Oh, my goodness gracious me! Oh, whatever will he do to me!"

Clare could not help smiling at this exaggerated alarm, although she was far from easy herself. It was an undignified, it was a ridiculous, position, to be caught here by this Mr. Arthur. She heard a step in the passage; she could not get out without meeting him, so she stood her ground.

"What the—! What's all this?" exclaimed a voice, and there he was, in the doorway.

And he was, Clare thought, exactly the sort of person she did not want him to be. He was the sort of man who would not understand things, who would not make allowances; one of those aloof, high-and-mighty young men, handsome, with a distinguished nose.

"THERE was a little accident," said Clare, in her cool business voice. "I live in the next flat, and I stepped in to see if I could help."

"That was very good of you!" said he earnestly. "Very! Thanks!"

She rather liked the way he spoke. Perhaps he was not so high-and-mighty as he looked.

"You're quite welcome," she answered, a little more human herself. "There's really no harm done. The poor little girl did the best she could. She called me—"

"Yes," said he. "But who is she, anyhow? What was she doing here?"

"But I thought she belonged here!" said Clare, surprised.

"Never saw her before in my life!" said he.

They both turned toward the little girl.

"I'm—I'm Lunella!" she cried, in a terrified squeak.

"Yes; but even at that," said Mr. Arthur, "even if you are Lunella, what were you doing here?"

"I'm Mrs. Jenkins's daughter!" said she, in despair. "Mrs. Jenkins, 'at always does the flat for you. She was real sick terday, and she sent me to do the cleanin'."

"I see!" said he. "But aren't you pretty young?"

"No, sir. Sixteen years ole."

"Oh, Lunella!" he said reproachfully. She began to cry.

"Look here!" he said. "Don't cry! Speak the truth, and fear no man. How old are you really?"

"'L-leven."

"All right! You run home now, and come back in seven years, and you can have the job. Go on, now!"

The room, which had always seemed so charming, appeared to her now as the stupidest, primmest, most hateful room she had ever seen

"But Mommer's sick—and somebody's got ter work!" cried Lunella passionately. "If you'll jist let me wait an' finish, you'll see how good I kin do!"

"Sorry, Lunella, but—"

"Oh, jist go an' set in that lady's parlor for half a nour!" said Lunella, with a sort of exasperation. "I'll knock on the wall when I'm done. Jist half a nour!"

There was a moment of blank silence. Then Mr. Arthur caught Clare's eye, and they both began to laugh. Clare did not want to laugh, but she couldn't help it, and once she had done so a sort of bond was established between them.

"If you'd like to come in . . . " said Clare.

This was the least she could say, in the circumstances, and he should have understood that, and should have said, "Oh, thank you very much! I'd be pleased to, some other time." But instead of that he said only, "Thanks!" and did come.

Clare was proud of her lovely little room and expected that he would say something in praise of it. He did not. When asked to sit down, he did sit down; when asked if he would care to smoke, he lit a cigarette. And when, merely in the course of polite conversation, she asked him about his work, again he took her at her word and began to tell her about his work.

HE WAS an architect, and nobody could have accused him of lack of interest in his profession. He talked, walking up and down the room scattering cigarette ashes over the rug. He went back into his own apartment to fetch some blue prints, and when he had them he pushed everything down to one end of her orderly table, so that he might spread out the prints before her. He shoved a vase of roses off onto the floor, but that did not interrupt him.

When he paused, to light another cigarette, Clare mentioned that, as a textile designer, she was interested in interior decorating.

"Yes . . . I see!" he said, and went on with his own subject. He grew excited, striding up and down. Tobacco ashes flew about wildly as he drew plans in the air; he went to the window to explain his idea as to what sort of buildings ought to be built upon the Drive and, to get a clearer view, he yanked aside a curtain

"Look here!" said he. "Would it be tactless if I said that, I never—never in all my life—saw anything so—so womanly and lovely as you are—this minute?"

with such vigor that it was pulled off the rod.

Just then Clare heard a knocking on the wall; fortunately, he heard it too.

"Must be Lunella," he said, and looked at Clare somewhat anxiously; no doubt he wanted to stay longer. But Clare only smiled, a polite, polite smile, and off he went.

The door slammed after him—he was, thought Clare, the sort of person who slams doors—and she sat down and looked about her room. Ashes everywhere, the curtain torn down, the table in disorder, the vase of roses still lying in a pool of water. How quiet it was, without him!

"He's awful!" she thought. "The most self-centered, overbearing man! I hope I'll never see him again."

She began to straighten up the room.

"He had a nice way with that child though," she thought, with admirable fair-mindedness. "Perhaps, after all—"

She had scarcely got home the next day when the doorbell rang, and there was Mr. Arthur again.

"Good evening!" he said. "Look here! She's here again. Lunella, I mean. Can't you do something with her?"

"I?" said Clare. "But—"

"I FOUND her there when I got in," he went on. "Working. She had a tale about her mother being sick and her grandmother blind and her little brother's hurt his head, and, as far as I can make out, Lunella's the sole support of a large and worthless family. I offered her some money; but she won't take it unless she can 'work it out.' And I can't have the poor little kid buzzing about while I'm home. I've got to have peace and quiet."

"I'm sorry," said Clare frigidly; "but I need peace and quiet too."

"Yes, I know. But, you see, there's my Work."

"Unfortunately, there's my work too," said Clare.

"Yes, of course. But, after all, you're a woman, you know—"

That was entirely too much!

"Certainly! I'm only a woman," said Clare, "so, of course—"

"I didn't say 'only' a woman!" he protested.

"You thought it," said Clare.

"I didn't! Give you my word I didn't! All I thought was that, being a woman, you'd know what to do with the poor little pest. Because I—well—I haven't much tact. . . . And I'm so tired!"

He did look tired, and in spite of herself Clare couldn't help feeling sorry for him. She was tired, too; but that was different. He seemed to be one of those excessive, unreasonable persons who don't know how and when to rest.

"If you feel that you've got to let her come," she said, in a practical tone, "tell her to come in the morning, when you're away."

Ten Years After

A backward look at April 6th, 1917—and the years that lie between

By Dorothy Canfield

WE HAD been living in France about a year when—it was almost ten years ago to the day—the news reached Paris that the United States had entered the war. The children, little things they were, exulted. "Oh, now we can hang out our flag from our balcony!" they cried, and went to pull it from the bottom of the trunk . . . the old American flag that had been their grandfather's, that had been hung out all during my peaceful childhood to celebrate the birthdays of great men—Lincoln's, Washington's; and on the Fourth of July to celebrate the birthday of the safe, bright, cheerful country I lived in.

"What birthday is it celebrating now?" I wondered to myself as the children came bringing it, the chubby littlest tripping in its long folds.

They arranged a parade with it. "These are wartime children to whom marching with a flag—" I thought.

The flag was put into my hands. The littlest brought his drum and, rattling his sticks upon it, brought up the rear. We stepped out upon our high-hung balcony on a level with the roofs of the houses across the way, where a couple of white-haired workmen were mending a leak.

At the sound of the child's drum, they straightened their bent old backs and stood up. They saw the big American flag roll out its folds to the breeze. They saw the bright-faced, eager children. They took off their caps and waved their hands and cried eagerly, loudly, "Vive l'Amerique!"

The children were enchanted. "Vive la France!" they shouted back. The littlest beat loudly on his drum.

I bent over the railing to fasten the flag and to hide my face. But the eldest spied it, and cried out, startled, "Oh, Mother, why do you look so sad? You and Father work all the time to help in the war. Aren't you glad our country is coming in to help, too?"

What could I tell her? Yes, I was glad that my country was taking its part in what had to be done. But glad as she understood it . . . light-hearted. . . . No; I was not. If only it had not been necessary for my country . . . for any country! I was as "glad" that more human beings were coming into a war as a family is glad when the doctor decides that it is necessary to perform a major operation on a much-loved brother. If it means a possibility of cure, yes; but—

The child was waiting for my answer and I had not thought of anything to say to her. I remembered long ago hearing my elders comment impatiently on the odd silences of those who had seen the Civil War. "Not a thing to be had out of them. You'd think it embarrassed them to be asked about it. They shut up like clams." One of those silences fell on me. I stooped to kiss the seven-year-old face. "Time to start to school, dear," I said.

Another too-well-remembered silence hangs about me on the nearing of this anniversary day, as though I sat there again in the battered little train, inching its way forward with an anxious caution over the track sketchily relaid after its dynamiting of the week before. The compartment was filled with shabby people loaded down with bundles tied up in sheets or old bedspreads, refugees returning to the corner of the earth which for generations had been their home. For three years they had been living in exile, anyhow, anywhere, five in a room, or in a half-open shed, waiting till they could go home.

They sat looking out of the windows at the heaps of blackened trash through which we were passing. Once in a while someone would murmur, "This must be where St. Quelle stood," or, "There is where the factory of St. Flamentin was."

A four-year-old child who had been sleeping in his father's arms woke, stretched, yawned, wriggled, and glanced idly out of the window. The unexpectedness of what he saw there made him burst into a clear laugh, "How funny!" he cried. "Look, Papa, the great big roof there, lying flat on the ground, and no house under it! Just like my Noah's Ark roof when I play with it. How funny! A real roof, ha! ha! ha!"

WAS there a dramatic moment of horror at the child's callousness? Did nobody cry out to him, "Little hard-heart! That is a human home destroyed you see!" Was he shaken, and told peremptorily: "Don't you know better than to laugh at tragic things?"

No. We were in the fourth year of the war. The gap between those who felt the meaning of what was happening and those who had been saved from the need to feel it had grown too wide. No one tried to bridge it with futile words. No one tried to teach what could only be learned by experience. A profound, yes, just as my elders had said so long ago, almost an embarrassed silence fell on us. It was almost as though we were shamed by what we knew and the child did not, almost as though we tried to lean forward and hide it from him. His father said, in a low, patient tone, not looking at us, "Didi, are you ready for your piece of bread now?"

The child set his little squirrel teeth into the crust with gusto, and we all sat silent,

Why So Many People Enjoyed the War

"MORE bitterly than food or shelter or love or occupation," says Dorothy Canfield, "human beings need a goal, a compelling reason for going on. The more time they have to think, the more drastic is this need, the more horrifying that dead absence of a purpose in life, which is really the absence of religion, of faith. What the war did, for the time being, for all who gave themselves to it, was to provide at least a temporary aim, something that had to be accomplished, some definite reason for rising and going through the day. . . .

"That was why people enjoyed the war, the simpler ones, unabashed; the more self-conscious, secretly . . . because they felt with every breath they drew that they were working toward an aim that was worth more than their lives, that they were having their share in achieving something that must be done if they were to save what men most prize. . . .

"If there is anything to be learned from the war about the race we belong to, it is that healthy human beings crave not comfort and self-regarding security but the feeling that they are giving themselves to some purpose worth while; so long for it that they snatch at anything that seems to give it to them, even though they must take it stained and foul with human suffering.

"The monstrous, touching, tragic irony of it all . . . that so many found what they craved in those four years of blood and cruelty; that in these following years of easy abundance so few have found it!"

our eyes lowered over what we were thinking.

Did we ever speak out at all? Even to those who had shared it and knew all that we knew—and more. No, very seldom. Words—compared to the revelation through which we were living—words would seem chatter. It was bad enough to find out the sort of place the world was, the sort of creatures human beings were, without talking about it. We shut up our new guesses at reality in a bitter silence. Least said, soonest mended. All that could be done was—perhaps—to save a few scraps of life from the hurricane. To those who felt as we did, there was no need to talk of what we really felt. To others it was impossible.

So we talked business with grown-ups, and tried to be cheerful with children. "Where did that last consignment of socks get put?" and, "We must add soap to the list for the people in La Ferte. They haven't had any for weeks." and, "Tell Marie not to go up the rue Prichard to-day. It's in the zone where the shells are dropping."

And when people newly arrived from home said, with their fresh exuberance, "You must have had *won*derful experiences," or, "Do tell us some of your war adventures," we fell into an embarrassed silence too full of what we were learning to speak of it.

BUT that was ten years ago. Ten years in the middle period of a human life is a long time. It is more than twice as long as the war lasted. One cannot but live, as the days go by. And there are many days in ten years. One changes; memories settle down from their harsh jaggedness; it does not hurt so cruelly to handle them. The instinct to try to make some sense out of life, which had been battered into insensibility, proves not to be dead, and cautiously begins to stir, to sort out experiences, to see which belong to which, even to venture to look for elements of logic, sequence, cause and effect, in what had seemed mere meaningless blackness.

I don't at all mean what learned political writers mean when they speak of trying to understand the war; trying to decide whose fault it was, of the esoteric underlying economic causes which for generations had slowly pushed European Governments into the catastrophe. It is not that I doubt their learning; but all their talk remains book talk to me, as military tactics always remain book talk. I am a mere home-keeping woman with children, my experiences limited to the kind of life open to such a woman—my real experiences; that is the only kind that means anything.

I am as capable as anybody else of learning and of reciting why the frontal attack failed and the flank attack succeeded; and why such a diplomatic move meant that such another one would surely follow it. But I neither believe nor disbelieve such statements. They do not sound real to me; and no more real because through the war-time years I lived almost wholly in the war. What makes my heart begin to hammer loudly is the possibility that from those first-hand war experiences of mine I may draw some guess of my own at the capacities, the possibilities, the essence of the race I belong to.

Dorothy Canfield, well-known author, who tells in this article some of her experiences during her three years' war work in France. In private life Miss Canfield is Mrs. John Redwood Fisher. Her books include "The Bent Twig," "Home Fires in France," and "The Brimming Cup." Her home is in Arlington, Vermont

Before the war I had taken other people's word about this. The war seemed to me to show that either they lied, or that they knew nothing about it. That was my first reaction after the war had begun to stop being something read in a newspaper. I was past thirty, had earned my own living, had long been married, had borne children, had moved about confidently in the world—all in profound ignorance of the nature of things. Life was not what I had been told it was, nor what I had seemed to see it. This revelation filled my consciousness to its outermost edges. I am sure that this was practically the universal experience of thoughtful people in a position to see the war at first hand. We were all like people who had been blindfolded (by safety, protection, comfort, ease), from whose eyes the bandage had suddenly been snatched off. What they saw was something so madly different from what they had thought was about them that they could but gape and stare. How could they speak, when they did not yet even know what they saw; and how could they ever again feel any confidence in their own understanding, when they had been so fooled by appearances?

But that was ten years ago. I suppose I have no right to speak for the others who came silently back from France, who, keeping silence about what the war meant to them, for the last decade have been going through the variegated motions of ordinary life, keeping house, selling bonds, bringing up children, buying cars, running stores, going on summer vacations. But my guess is that, in the back of the consciousness of every one, as in the back of mine, there has been a ceaseless, groping, fumbling attempt to make some sense out of the insane confusion of all those revealing experiences. Of one thing I am sure—that they have not forgotten, as it is the careless habit to assume they have.

I WONDER if I can break through the habit of silence, and put my hand firmly enough on one or two of those attempts to understand, so that I can get them into words? They usually come into my mind in the shape of a memory, something seen and lived, which recurs and recurs, knocking endlessly at the door of my understanding till, little by little, the raw, bare facts begin to be tinged with some notion of their meaning.

There is Bouillonval's wedding breakfast, and all that went before it. There is stuff in that for a lifetime's meditation—rich veins of information about what the human beings are. Here are the facts. They need no eloquence to make them speak aloud. In their general pattern they are familiar to everyone who knew France during the war years. Bouillonval is a tall, blond, stalwart young North of France workman, who lived in Chauny, worked in the glass factory there. He was in the middle of his term of military service, far from home when the war broke out.

Chauny was one of the towns taken by the Germans and held. Between Bouillonval and his father and his mother and his sisters and his young fiancée and all the human beings he had ever known, there dropped, from one day to the next, the black curtain of complete separation. For months, (Continued on page 189)

Gee—I've Had A Fine Time!

I went down to the equator with Doctor Beebe and up into the Arctic with Dad, and it's most awfully good fun to see the world like that

By David Binney Putnam

(13 Years Old)

BETTER look out, or he'll turn into a scientist."

When I went down on the equator to the Galápagos Islands in the "Arcturus," Uncle Will—that's Doctor Beebe, who's most awfully nice to me—said that one day to Mother.

I guess he meant I might become one of those funny baldheaded men who wear eyeshades down-town thinking they have their hats on. But I would risk that if I ever could learn enough to be a real scientist. I don't believe anything could be much more fun than to be able to go off on expeditions and really to do worth-while study of the things you see and collect. And being a writer, too, would be fine if you are successful. For a writer really isn't tied down to an office or anything. He can take his job with him wherever he goes.

Well, of course I'm not a scientist, and being only thirteen years old I am not much of a writer. Certainly at school I don't get any very famous marks! But I've been awfully lucky in being taken along on two really big expeditions. And I've written two little books which have been read by a good many boys and girls—and grown-ups, too, from the number of letters I get. (That's one of the worst things about writing. You get so many letters. And Dad always makes me answer mine!)

The first expedition was on the steamer "Arcturus" for three months in the Pacific down to the Galápagos Islands. Doctor Beebe let me go along on that last year when I was twelve years old, as a sort of junior guest. And the past summer I went with Dad up to Greenland on the American Museum Expedition. "David Goes Voyaging" was my book about the first expedition. "David Goes to Greenland" is the story of the grand time we had in the Arctic.

Of course these are just simple little books. I wrote them like writing school compositions. It was hard work, some of it, and not much fun, for lots of times I would rather have been doing other things instead of writing down about what we saw and did. For instance, who would really want to stay below in the cabin, chewing up the end of a dry pencil, when you could feel the sides of the vessel crunching along through the ice pack?

Of course it would have been more fun on deck seeing what was happening. Or loafing up in the forec'stle, listening to the stories of old Tom Gushue, who used to be mate on the "Roosevelt" when Peary got to the North Pole. Or just fooling around with Capt. Bob Bartlett. But Dad used to make me stick. And I suppose that's the only reason why I ever got the Greenland book done.

And then Dad would make me write the poor parts over again and write out misspelled words and all that. But when it was all over it certainly is fun to have the story of the good times we had there in the book, with the pictures too!

Speaking of those letters that come in. Of course some of them are most awfully nice. I just had one from London that I like a lot.

I told about reading up in the Arctic the book "The Cruise of the Cachelot." Well, my London friend read that, and he sent to me quite a wonderful letter written to him twenty-five years ago by Frank Bullen, who was the author of "The Cruise of the Cachelot." That letter is for me to put in my copy of the Cachelot. And in the letter Mr. Bullen, who was first mate of the "Cachelot," thanks my friend for sending him a copy of "Moby Dick," which is certainly a grand sea story. Mr. Bullen says "Moby Dick" is a great book. That's a pretty fine letter for me to have, isn't it?

And then there are some awfully nice letters from little chaps, younger than myself. I know how I hate writing letters, so I understand how hard it must be for them. And that makes it nice for them to take the trouble to write me.

THE other day some ladies were talking to Dad about our Greenland trip, after they'd seen the movies, which really are pretty grand and give a fine idea of exactly how rough and exciting the expedition was. Well, one of them said she didn't think it right to take a young boy on such a trip. She said it was too dangerous. Dad told her he didn't think anything of that kind is a bit more risky than living in a big city like New York, with all the germs you can pick up. And he said he thought the automobiles were a lot more dangerous than icebergs.

Then the lady said, well, anyway, she didn't see how a mother would let her thirteen-year-old boy go, which of course was foolish, I thought, because Mother herself went on the "Arcturus" trip and she just loves this sort of thing. Anyhow, I can't see much to be frightened about. A fellow with Capt. Bob Bartlett and Dad and Carl Dunrud, our cowboy friend, and the rest of the "Morrissey" gang could get out of almost any kind of a fix, I think.

But that's up to Mother and Dad. If they'll let me go I want to go. And right now Dad and I are planning another expedition up into Hudson Bay. Perhaps my boy friend Deric will go too—he's thirteen years old, and a little later I want to tell you about him.

Certainly it's most awfully good fun to see the world the way I've been able to. I'm awfully lucky. And there's so much to see!

A Little Wasted Sympathy

TWICE during the Christmas holidays I autographed books at stores," says David Putnam, "and once I heard a nice-looking lady say something like this:

"'I think it's a shame for a boy like that to have to go around and do things like this. He is not getting any boy's life at all!'

"Of course, the lady didn't know I heard her. But I would like her to know she is all wrong. And I would also like her to know the very few things of that kind which I do, in comparison with the lot of invitations I get. And when it comes to having a 'boy's life,' I don't know who could get more fun than I do.

"What boy would want to miss a chance to go off on a real expedition and have real adventures? But I know that sort of thing can't go on forever. And it suits me perfectly well, for there is such a lot of fun at home just playing around with boys and girls."

"David Goes A-Voyaging" is about his experiences with the "Arcturus" expedition to the Galápagos Islands in the South Pacific. "David Goes to Greenland," tells how he went with the American Museum of Natural History's recent expedition to the Arctic. David describes in this article what he liked best about his adventures, how he wrote his books, and the kind of letters people write to him. He does not believe that thirteen-year-old boys are better off in school than on adventurous trips. William Hoskins

WILLIAM HOSKINS' work has touched the life of nearly every reader of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE. As a consulting and research chemist he has taken out more than a hundred patents for discoveries ranging from a special chalk for the tips of billiard cues (developed from a volcanic ash found in Illinois) to the high-resistance electric wire found in electric irons, toasters, stoves, and other electric heating appliances. The story of his life told in the accompanying article reads like a romance. He is president of Hoskins Process Development Company, of Chicago, and is a member of many scientific societies here and abroad. He is sixty-five years old, and lives in La Grange, Illinois.

"The World's Most Tragic Man Is The One Who Never Starts"

His zest for solving difficult problems led William Hoskins through an amazing career as chemist, inventor, and manufacturer—Some of his results have surprised even himself, as when he set out to make synthetic rubies and wound up with the high-resistance wire used in toasting your bread and ironing your clothes

By Neil M. Clark

ON a summer morning in the year 1870, a man and a boy slipped away from shore in a rowboat, their eyes glued earnestly to a small object that rose and fell a few yards ahead of them on the inshore waves of the Ohio River. This object moved steadily, though slowly, away from the bank, across the current, and, as it went, emitted a tiny cloud of white smoke which drifted back over the water.

Presently the man looked at the boy with a gleam of happy satisfaction. "She goes!" he said.

The boy nodded, grinning.

They continued to watch with fascinated interest, dipping their oars occasionally to keep close. These two were John Hoskins, a house painter by trade, and his son William, aged eight. The object in the water was a miniature model of a steamship, which, with lashed rudder, was heading straight across the river, propelled by a tiny steam engine which the man had made with his own hands as a plaything for his boy. Indeed, he had made the whole boat, from keel to rigging, as a boy's plaything. The little boat chugged along valiantly, not once losing headway until it reached the far shore.

In a certain sense, this little summer-morning incident forms one event in a curious and fascinating sequence. Of itself, it was nothing. Taken with what went before and with what came after, it may be reckoned to have had some effect on the everyday lives of nearly every one of us.

William Hoskins, the boy of the boat, is now a man of sixty-five, gray-bearded, with twinkling gray-blue eyes revealing a wise and softened humor. He looks back on a career as a consulting and research chemist, covering nearly fifty years, a half-century during which more discoveries and faster strides have been made in the science of chemistry than during all previous centuries in the history of the race.

In this progress he has had a distinguished part. He has performed hundreds of experiments never before undertaken by any man. He has obtained more than one hundred patents. Occasionally, usually as a side issue, he has engaged in manufacturing. His assay furnace, invented when he was little more than a boy, for years remained standard apparatus. The chalk he developed is universally used on billiard cues. To his most important single scientific achievement, the development of the high-resistance wire which is the essential element in all electric heating appliances, we owe the comfort and convenience of electric toasters, heaters, irons, stoves, curling irons, and all such as we know them.

As a consultant, thousands of clients have advised with him on problems as diverse as constructing a race track to insure speedy races, and devising secret ways, through the chemistry of paper, to prevent fraud in the use of street car transfers and bank checks. At sixty-five, Mr. Hoskins looks back on a career crowded with interest and achievement.

BUT more significant even than his numerous accomplishments, to my notion, is the stimulating philosophy of life and achievement which he has evolved as a result of his experiences; a philosophy that prompts him, at an age when most men are content to spend their time remembering, to work with his eyes turned forward, and with as passionate an absorption as ever in his life, to dream new dreams, plan new conquests, explore fresh fields.

He holds, briefly, that everything matters; that the least beginning may lead to the greatest end.

"Chance," he says, with conviction, "plays a smaller part in our lives than some of us think. Every day, hour, and minute, as I see it, we are building—or neglecting to build. Events that we attribute to luck nearly always are due to some act, thought, or purpose long since forgotten.

"I have known worthy beginnings of the least promising kind, which led on to consequences beyond the wildest hopes and dreams. To me, therefore, there is only one really tragic figure in life, and that is the man who never makes a start."

This philosophy is illustrated time after time in the career of Mr. Hoskins. Even the incident of the toy steamboat on the Ohio River fits in.

The beginning is a day in England some eighty years ago, when John Hoskins, then a boy himself, was permitted to turn on the steam to start a great Cornish pump installed in an iron mine owned by John's father. This experience filled the boy with enthusiasm for machinery.

His father, however, was a mine owner and well-to-do, and John was not trained for a mechanical career. He was given, instead, what was thought to be a first-class schooling in France. It was not until he had passed the period of life when a man learns most easily that the family fortune vanished.

"At that time," William Hoskins told me, "my father came to the United States. Visiting a cousin in Covington, Kentucky, who had become a house painter, my father learned that trade as a means of supporting himself. As it turned out, he followed it till near the end of his life.

"His interests, however, were always mechanical and scientific. He indulged these interests chiefly by making ingenious mechanical toys for me. We played with them together.

"Along the side of our house in Covington, too, my father built on wooden timbers a miniature railway track, forty or fifty feet long. Here my friends and I used to play by the hour with a miniature steam locomotive he made for me, a real engine that burned charcoal, got up steam, and pulled loads. It was not flimsy and unsubstantial, like most store-bought toys, but was an actual model, correct in detail, of a British locomotive. I have it to-day. With fresh packing and plenty of oil, it would still run.

"MY FATHER, too, was forever taking me with him on long tramps over the hills. He was interested in animals, birds, trees, insects, flowers. With a small French microscope he had, we used to examine specimens minutely. He took a keen interest in pointing out to me the structural differences between, say, granite and limestone rock formations; or in lifting boulders and studying the various kinds of bugs underneath. Besides all this, we always had scientific journals in the house, and they were my daily reading matter.

"So, primarily because of my father's passionate interest in such matters, an interest for which he never found much means of expression except in play with me, I grew up absorbed in problems of mechanics and science.

The Great Cascade Tunnel

A new chapter in the romance of railroad building

By Keene Sumner

UP IN our big Northwest, separated from each other by more than a thousand miles, are two groups of men who are feeling rather proud these days. We ought to feel proud ourselves. Proud of them, for they are doing a tremendous job and are breaking all previous records for that kind of work.

The men in one of these two groups may be found—at least, sometimes—at their offices in St. Paul, Minnesota. The other group is out in the towering Cascade Mountains of the state of Washington.

When I say in the mountains I mean just that. For these men are driving a tunnel through the Cascade Range, a tunnel which will be the longest in the Western Hemisphere and one of the five longest in the world.

It is being constructed by A. Guthrie and Company for the Great Northern Railway; and both companies have their head offices in St. Paul. In the Great Northern offices are the two men who planned the undertaking: Ralph Budd, president of the road, and J. R. W. Davis, its chief engineer.

The contract between the railroad and the Guthrie Company was a surprisingly brief document, considering the magnitude of the job. But, short as it was, Mr. Budd took care to write into it the name of the man whom he wanted to have charge of the work.

That man was J. C. Baxter, vice president of the Guthrie Company. He is a civil engineer who has come up from the foot of the ladder in his profession; and to be at the foot of the civil engineering ladder means working with a construction gang, and may mean, as in this case it did mean, doing actual pick-and-shovel labor.

SITTING in his St. Paul office, Baxter told me a lot about the new tunnel—and a little about himself. As with most men of that type, his interest is ninety-nine per cent in his job and perhaps a measly one per cent in himself. They can't understand that our interest is at least fifty-fifty.

Baxter was born in New Jersey, moved to California when he was four years old, moved to Salt Lake City a few years later, and has been moving—or, at any rate, on the move—ever since.

A civil engineer doesn't stay still long enough to become a "mossback." He bears no resemblance, however, to a rolling stone. He is more like a peripatetic drive wheel, with both purpose and power behind its motion.

When he was a youngster, Baxter became a machinist's apprentice; but he quit that job in order to sample others. Among them, was the humble task of shoveling dirt with a construction gang—and right there his sampling days ended! For when he realized that the engineering ladder rose out of the very dirt which he shoveled, he determined to stick to that ladder.

He never has taken a technical course in college. When he directs a construction job to-day, he does it as a graduate from the school of experience. He has worked at highway construction, mine stripping, shaft sinking, tunnel driving, railroad and bridge building—all the way from the East to the West, and from Mexico to Alaska.

He worked, at first, with his hands; later, with his brain and his personality. In carrying out any big construction project, the greatest factor is the human element! Machinery and methods make these projects possible of achievement. But machines are useless, and methods are a dead letter, without the men behind them.

About fifteen years ago, when Ralph Budd was chief engineer of the Great Northern, J. C. Baxter worked under him; out in those very mountains which are now being pierced by the new tunnel.

Baxter's name was written into the Cascade contract, because Mr. Budd knew him to be not only a civil engineer but also a human engineer. So the story of the tunnel is one of machines and of methods —plus men.

PEOPLE will tell you that the golden age of railroad building in this country—the age of romance, adventure, and great achievement—is over. From coast to coast, and from Canada to the Gulf, there is a vast network of tracks: two hundred and fifty thousand miles of glittering steel threads. Experts say we have enough railroads. Even more than enough! The giant builders, who created our railway systems, had their day of romance and left nothing for this generation, except to operate what they created.

It sounds rather depressing. We hate to see "The End" written after any thrilling chapter of romance. But don't close the book too hurriedly, just because somebody has scribbled "Finis" at the foot of a page. Turn the leaf, and you will find a new chapter well under way.

In it you will read the story of new marvels in railway history; of a new generation of builders who still find wonders to perform —and are steadily and surely performing them.

It was in 1890 that John F. Stevens, then chief engineer of the Great Northern, led a surveying party through the forests of the Cascade Range, searching for a route by which the railroad might cross the mountains.

Between two points, which later became the stations Berne and Scenic, he found a pass which seemed to be the most promising. The road was built there, climbing over the pass by a series of switchbacks. In 1900 this was altered into the line which is now used.

The line between Scenic and Berne is about eighteen miles long. Coming east from Scenic, it has to climb 1,325 feet, pass through six tunnels and six miles of snowsheds. Five of the tunnels are very short. The sixth is almost three miles in length, making the total length of covered track about nine miles. When the line reaches the summit elevation at 3,380 it descends 546 feet to Berne.

THE weight of a railroad train runs into hundreds of tons! And to drag this weight up hundreds of feet is an herculean job. It costs money, too; and it takes time. As both money and time are the great factors in modern railway operation, that eighteen-mile bit of road has always given Great Northern officials something to think about.

Moreover, there were those six miles of snowsheds. In themselves, the snowsheds of our Western railroads are a triumph of human ingenuity over the forces of Nature. Built of concrete walls and great timbers, their roofs are almost an integral part of the mountainsides which they follow.

The conception and building of these snowsheds formed one of the dramatic chapters in the history of our railroads. But when Nature "built" a mountainside, she turned out a permanent job; whereas, a snowshed has to be maintained, repaired, and occasionally rebuilt. To do this work on the six miles of sheds between Scenic and Berne costs hundreds of thousands of dollars a year. And here is an interesting fact: The new tunnel, which will eliminate those sheds entirely, will cost about ten million dollars. But the saving, on the upkeep of the sheds alone, will more than pay the interest on this investment.

That is not all which the tunnel will accomplish. The line between Berne and Scenic will be ten miles long instead of eighteen. The climb will be 501 feet less each way. If all the present curves were added together, they would form just about six complete circles; but the new tunnel will be straight from end to end. As for the important factor of time, the tunnel will save one hour in the running time of passenger trains, and three hours on freight trains.

These results may, or may not, sound important to you. It depends on whether you have any conception of the job of "railroading." Most of us have no real understanding of this job, which calls for billions of dollars, uses the labor of hundreds of thousands of men, and without which our modern life would be utterly impossible.

AS FOR the days of railroad romance being over, let's read this one new chapter, with its story of the ten-million-dollar Cascade tunnel.

It was in November, 1925, that the plans were submitted to the Great Northern's board of directors and approved by them. But that had been preceded by months of study, consultation, and calculation.

The preliminary survey by Great Northern engineers was made in winter; sometimes at an altitude of five thousand feet, with correspondingly intense cold.

It was necessary to take long sights across canyons; and as the air currents were confused and changing, the sights were taken over and over, in order to check up on their accuracy.

A report of this one small detail of the work says: "A large and special theodolite was bought. Then, for eight days and nights in midwinter, an observer kept constant vigil beside this instrument, on a frigid and storm-swept ridge, hopefully awaiting the few moments of visibility necessary to sight through to the next station."

IT IS front-page news in the paper if some mountain climber, on a holiday excursion, is caught on a "frigid and storm-swept ridge" and has to stay there a couple of days. But to these unknown and unheralded "observers," that bleak vigil was just a part of their job, a mere incident in "the preliminary survey."

If you want to take your hat off to them, I'll wait for you to do it. You might as well, for you'll have to take it off anyway to the men who come after them.

These later comers appeared on the scene almost before the ink on the contract was dry.

Work on the tunnel was to start at four points: From Berne on the east, and from Scenic on the west, men were to bore straight into the mountain. And from Mill Creek, about two and one-half miles west of Berne, and high above it, a shaft was to be sunk to the proposed level of the tunnel. From the foot of this shaft, men would bore east toward Berne and west toward Scenic.

At all four points, work was to continue twenty-four hours a day, with three shifts of crews. There must be electric plants for power and light; pumps, in case of subterranean flows of water; drillers and track layers, and men to handle the blasts; machinists and blacksmiths—and only a tunnel builder knows what else!

Moreover, all these men must be fed and housed. Most of all, they must be made contented and satisfied! And this had to be accomplished away up there in the heart of the mountains, surrounded by the wilderness.

Scenic and Berne were not towns. They were merely stations. Towns had to be created there! So the forest was cleared away and three main camps were built to accommodate the men—and even their families.

These were not mere rude barracks. Each of the bunkhouses for the unskilled laborers is sixteen by thirty-two feet and accommodates ten men. For the skilled workmen there are similar quarters; but with only six men to each house.

All the men are supplied with bedding by the company. In fact, they are not allowed to bring their own bedding, since it might not be up to the sanitary standard maintained at the camps.

Hot water is always available. There are both showers and stationary tubs. The bunkhouses have concrete floors, which are swept every day and, twice a week, are hosed out. Each man has a steel locker for his personal belongings.

Besides the bunkhouses, there are eighty-six houses for families. They have three or four rooms, bath, up-to-date plumbing, and electric lights! The rents are fifteen and twenty dollars a month. Every family house is occupied and there is a long waiting list. Each of these groups has a schoolhouse for the children.

THE camps have sidewalks, sewer systems, recreation halls, main dining halls. The company has provided pianos for dancing and encourages the men in athletic sports. In short, these wilderness camps, built for a brief three years' existence, are places where human beings can be comfortably and happily at home.

This is just one of the results of having "human engineers" in charge of the job. Some day, perhaps all employers will stop thinking of "workmen," and think instead of "men who work." There's a big difference between those points of view.

This human engineering has produced an interesting state of affairs at the tunnel camps. In the first place, the labor turnover—the number of men quitting the job—is so low that it is a record for such work.

In the second place, there is a spirit of loyalty and of coöperation which keeps the entire force, from top to bottom, on its toes. In the common phrase, these men are "driving" a tunnel. And they are driving it, not merely with machinery but with the combined force of their own will and ambition. They themselves are not being driven. They are accomplishing almost superhuman tasks, because they care about the job.

If that kind of spirit hasn't the thrill of romance, then there "ain't no such animal" anyhow.

And these men have made a world record as far as tunnel driving is concerned. When the work started, it was estimated that three years would be required to finish it. But at the present rate of advance the tunnel will be completed and trains will be running through it weeks before the three years are up.

LET'S get that part of the story right now. The longest tunnel already built in the Western Hemisphere is the Rogers Pass tunnel, about six and one half miles long, on the Canadian Pacific Railway. In driving a tunnel, the drillers first make a central bore. Other crews follow behind them and enlarge this passage to the size required for the completed tunnel.

The central bore, at Rogers Pass, was 6½ by 8 feet. In January, 1915, the men on that job broke the previous world's record by advancing the center heading 932 feet in thirty-one days.

A view of the "main bore." (In the circle) One of the smaller "pioneer" tunnels, which run parallel to the main bore. Pioneer tunnels, by tapping the main tunnel at various points, provide additional "working faces" and give an opportunity to bring up machinery and carry away débris without crowding the main tunnel

More than eleven years later that was still the world's record. Then, literally right and left, the Cascaders began to smash it. During August, 1926, the crews working in the pioneer tunnel from Scenic —I'll tell you about the "pioneer tunnel" later—advanced 937 feet in thirty-one days. And their center bore was 8 by 9 feet in size! They and their superintendent, O. C. Hartman, would have worn 8 by 9 smiles, if that had been possible.

The men are paid minimum wages, based on a 650-foot advance per month. For anything over that, they receive a bonus. So the Scenic crews put their bonuses in their pockets, and triumphantly ran the "high camp" pennant to the peak of their flagpole.

On this prized pennant is the figure of a Rocky Mountain goat, the emblem of the Great Northern railroad. The winners hoisted this flag, and dared the rival crews to "get their goat."

Whereupon, the men at the Berne camp, working under "Hurry-up" Jones, proceeded to do it. In the next thirty-one days, they drove their center bore—which was 10 by 10 feet—984 feet into the granite mountain!

The high camp pennant was transferred to Berne. During October it fluttered defiantly from the Berne flagpole. But meanwhile, the "beat the world record" spirit had become an epidemic.

Everybody had caught it. In September, the officials of the Guthrie company had come out to inspect the job. And before they left, they posted an offer of five hundred dollars to the outfit which would make a new world's record.

That offer meant more than mere money to the crews. It meant comradeship, appreciation, mutual interest, all along the line. The result was that the pioneer tunnel outfit at Scenic, then under H. J. King, hung up a record of an 1,157-foot advance in October! With whoops of joy, they reinstated the goat at the peak of their flagpole.

AS I said before, this sort of thing isn't achieved by mere machines, although the ones used here are marvels in themselves. The romance in any achievement is always found in those two words: "Plus men."

For example: Among the machines used in the tunnel work are what are known as "muckers." After the drillers have driven holes into the face of the rock, and blasted them out with dynamite, the mucker, operated by still another crew, gathers up the débris and deposits it in cars, which are run outside, where the contents are dumped.

That is only a hint of the variety and complexity of the operations, but it will serve to show, in a small way, how all these operations must dovetail into one another. If there should be a failure at any point, the whole program would be held up.

If anything goes wrong with the compressed-air pressure, the drills cannot be operated; and drillers, blasters, muckers, shifters all have to stand idly waiting.

If a machine breaks down, the whole sequence of work breaks down too. To avoid these breaks, the men keep their machines up to the top notch of efficiency. Each man watches his particular part of the equipment like a hawk. He is always searching for any threat of trouble.

AS a sample of the results of this watchful care, one of the mucking machines worked twenty-four hours a day for one hundred and thirty-four days without coming out of the tunnel for repairs!

Team-work is building the Cascade tunnel at a record-breaking rate of speed. But team-work is also building something else—a mutual respect and friendliness among the men on the job.

After one of the camps had won the pennant for breaking the record, the event was celebrated by taking an official picture of the leaders of the winning crews. They, of course, were employed by the contracting firm. But they refused to pose for the photograph unless the group included the Great Northern engineer whose duty it was to "give them the line."

Don't Tie To Health Rules Unless They Fit Your Own Case

"Human beings are not standardized like nuts and bolts," says Dr. Charles M. Wharton, in charge of physical education at the University of Pennsylvania: "Each of you has an individual capacity for work and for play, and it's your job to learn your limits"

By Sherman Gwinn

HE WAS small and wiry, a veritable bundle of sinews and nerves. When he first got into the game, he was like a fighting and spitting young wildcat—ripping at will through the opponent line, darting for long gains around the ends, spinning with him the whole 'varsity in a perfect frenzy of brilliant football.

Nobody could stop him. He was unbeatable. He was a star of big measure—those first ten or fifteen minutes.

Yet the thousands in the stands did not leap up to cheer him. In football, as in everything else in life, it is the second, the third, the final quarter which most counts to win. And this boy had the name of a quitter.

Even the coaches, wise in men, shook their heads, at a loss to understand, and admitted that this sensational starter was a mighty poor finisher. Quitters are not popular in college, or anywhere else. And as for the boy, he worried, began to doubt himself, until his good became bad, and his bad faded to worse. In his heart he knew he wasn't a quitter; in spirit, he fought the game through to the end. But actually, long before the end, he was gasping on the side lines—done, unable to go on.

Let Dr. Charles M. Wharton, in charge of health and physical education at the University of Pennsylvania, go on with this boy's story, a story, I was to discover as he told it, which strikes pretty close home to a great many of us. For nearly thirty years Doctor Wharton has been a trainer of men, a counselor to boys and to their parents alike. During the war, he was associated with Walter Camp in directing physical training for the navy, and later for the army Air Service. Old-timers may recall him best as "Buck" Wharton, the six-foot-four, two-hundred-and-ten-pound "Penn" guard of All-American fame in 1895 and 1896, one of the greatest "line buckers" of football history.

"Yes, they called this boy a quitter," Doctor Wharton said. "The mysterious feature of it was that he didn't seem to have any reason for quitting. He kept in excellent physical condition. He had a sound, sturdy heart; muscles that were built for endurance; and he had the spirit to win, the courage to stick to the finish. Yet, after his first fine burst of playing, he 'laid down,' as the fellows say, wilted so there was nothing to do but take him out for a substitute.

"For weeks I worked with the boy, pondering over his case and trying to get at his trouble. I subjected him to every exercise test I could devise, and in each he showed up perfectly. Then one day, while observing his play with the team, it occurred to me that his weakness invariably came on after about fifteen minutes of exertion. Guided by this, I examined him after five minutes of play, next after ten minutes, and last after fifteen minutes. The first two examinations revealed nothing but his excellent shape. It was the third which brought out the cause of his trouble.

"His lungs, while perfectly sound, were smaller than they should have been to supply his body with sufficient oxygen for more than a limited period of exertion. You might say they were of fifteen-minutes 'football capacity.' The short rest provided by the rules between consecutive quarters of the game wasn't enough to allow him to recuperate. His 'let down' as the game wore on was not quitting, as the term was applied to him, but sheer physical exhaustion.

"Acting upon that discovery we played him differently. We put him into the game for the first quarter, rested him during the second and third, and returned him to the scrimmage when he had recovered. We simply lengthened his rest time to meet his individual need. And he became what he might have been from the beginning—a star.

"The point I want to make is this:

"EACH of us has an individual capacity—for work, for play, for enjoyment of life. This capacity extends to eating, sleeping, exercising, to almost every activity under the sun in which we may engage. We are not all eight-hour-a-day workers. We are not all eight-hour-a-night sleepers, not all of us can be slender, regardless of beauty doctors and Paris fashions. In short, we are not standardized like nuts and bolts.

"We are at our best, and achieve most, when we give intelligent regard to our capacities and keep within them. Much of our unhappiness, failure, sickness, pessimism, and very often death itself, may be charged against overloading in one capacity or another.

"We build motors, and rate them ac-

Consider Your Health First And Then, if You Must, Your Looks

"ONE of the commonest questions I'm asked," says Doctor Wharton, "is this: 'Doctor, how can I take off ten pounds? I think I'm over weight.'

"'Are you well?' I inquire.

"'Oh yes, I feel all right,' is usually the answer.

"'Eat well? Enjoy your sleep?'

"'Sure.'

"'Then why, in the name of common sense, don't you leave well enough alone?' I inquire.

"'I think I'd look better, if I lost a little weight.'

"There you are, the old notion that we must be standardized like tailor's dummies. Ready to risk health, vigor, happiness itself in order to conform to a physical pattern by reducing a waist line or flattening a hip. Not that you can't be over weight, or under weight, but your own private normal weight should be the standard by which to judge, and not a table somebody has made up, or a mandate from some tailor or costumer. It's no crime to be normally stout, any more than it's a crime to be thin."

cording to their horse-power. We build trucks, freight cars, elevators, and paint or stamp on them the load they will bear. For racing, we breed race horses; for plowing, plow horses. Even our land is rated for its productivity per acre according to the crops that best suit it. The only thing or creature that we don't rate, though it has a rating just as fixed and as certain, is man—ourselves. This is illogical, unscientific, and it isn't right. Many a man who is called a quitter, or a failure, is that simply because somewhere he has loaded beyond capacity. Yet, curiously enough, the capacity that is least often overloaded is that of work."

"But the example you just cited," I objected, "was that of a boy who was subjected to too much work."

"Not too much work, but too little rest," Doctor Wharton corrected. "Later, when we tried the plan of resting him before he was overtaken by exhaustion, he was able to return to the game for a second quarter. Thus he was good for double the amount of work he had been doing.

"ONE of the most successful business leaders in this country, a man who has a reputation for performing a prodigious amount of work, stops work promptly at noon and takes a nap. He sleeps until two or two-thirty o'clock, arises refreshed, and returns to his desk, where he works until six or seven. He is always at his best.

"He has learned through experience that he saves time by taking that daily nap. When he worked through without it, he found himself thick-headed and listless during the whole afternoon. Frequently, he had to do over the next morning much that he had done the previous afternoon. He suffered with headaches. His digestion was bad.

"Now, I don't mean to infer by this that everybody is in need of a nap at noon, though I do believe that a break in the work day that furnishes some diversion and rest makes anybody the better for it.

For thirty years Dr. Charles M. Wharton has been a trainer of men—and of boys, as the picture above shows. He is in general charge of health work and physical education at the University of Pennsylvania. In his student days, "Buck" Wharton, as he was then known, was one of the greatest of football players

The amount of rest we need is governed by our individual capacity for recuperation.

"For every ounce of energy we expend we must put an ounce back. Some of us generate energy slowly, others rapidly. Some of us expend it slowly, others rapidly. There is a balance somewhere which makes it a fifty-fifty proposition between the energy we generate and that which we expend.

"To find that balance, we must ignore everything but the conditions under which we live. Your balance may change simply by moving from a noisy street, where your rest is disturbed, to a quiet street where your sleep is sound. It may change with a change of work. It may vary with the seasons, and it usually does.

"YOUNG men often talk of the work done by their fathers and grandfathers. One was in the other day.

"'My grandfather began work at four in the morning and didn't let up until dark,' he said. 'I don't think he was sick a day of his life, and he lived to be eighty-four.'

"'What did he do and where did he live?' I asked.

PHOTOGRAPH BY JEANNE E. BENNETT, BALTIMORE

"'He farmed and lived in the country,' was the answer.

"'And you,' I reminded him, 'live in a great city, at a great university among thousands of others. You live in a day of motion pictures, theatres, radios, automobiles, with life moving all about at a rate a thousand times faster than the quiet country life that moved about your grandfather. He went to bed at eight and got up at four, which gave him eight hours of sound and restful sleep. You get to bed at eleven, sleep amid the clang of cars, traffic whistles, and the tooting of automobiles, and you arise at six after seven hours in bed, during which you tossed and dreamed.

"'Do you realize,' I asked, 'that to-day you expend more energy in walking across an average city street than your grandfather did sixty years ago in walking a mile?'

"Free, Wide, And Handsome"

The story of a man who was given a new chance at life

By Stewart Edward White

ILLUSTRATED BY THOMAS FOGARTY

I HAD progressed as far as the fifth tee when I became aware that I was not alone on the links. This is sufficiently unusual to give me pause, so I do so. This is to say, I paused. For I am not a golfer, and therefore I dislike having anybody on the links with me. Even a caddie. Even my wife. Especially my wife.

I was very much surprised to see this player apparently awaiting me at the fifth tee. I could not see how he could possibly have got that far ahead of me at this time of day. You see, my own habit is not only to start very early, but also to begin at the third tee. The first tee is directly in front of the clubhouse; and the second also is plainly visible to people, mainly women, who have nothing better to do than swig after-lunch coffee on the terrace. But the third tee is nicely situated just behind the blind side of the caddie house. This chap could not have eaten any lunch; or else he had indulged in the reprehensible practice of cutting in ahead.

I lingered on the fourth green as long as I decently could, but there was no budging the fellow. In fact, after I had done my putt over again for the third time, he hailed me.

"Want to go around together?" he called.

"Sure! Delighted!" I called back, as cheerfully as though I meant it. "If you don't mind my being a poor player."

Now, I did not in the least want to go around together. When I go around together I do not enjoy the links at all. They are very beautiful links. There are rows of tall trees, and the soft-round roll of slopes, and long shadows across green turf, and a milky, misty light in distances, and remotely glimpsed hills bathed in quiet magic, and flocks of killdeer that rise with cries of marshlands. Lone, far-off green keepers do grateful buzzy things with lawn mowers, and nearby bumblebees with wild flowers. It is pleasant to loaf in the presumed direction of the ball, expandedly soaking up these things. One cannot do this when going around together.

HOWEVER, I was in for it and I might as well make the best of it. He was not a bad-looking chap, tall, middle-aged, of a dark and rather melancholy countenance, but with a human twinkle in his eye.

"My name is Parker," I introduced myself. "I'm not much at this game, but if you'll be patient at least it's a fine day."

"It is that. Mine's Thrackleford."

I looked at him again with interest. Thrackleford is not a name one would be likely to forget if once he had seen or heard it, and I had encountered it many times; in fact, as often as I had idly glanced at the club handicap rating posted in the locker-room and caddie house. It stood in a column all by itself, and had stood so for years. I had noticed it first when the chairman had assigned me my handicap, which was—and is—25.

"But look here," I had expostulated mildly, "I'm just beginning this game—never had a club in my hands before. You ought to do better by me than that. All these other '25' fellows have played a long time, and—"

"Twenty-five is the highest handicap that we give," he interrupted me firmly. "All beginners have to start there."

"But here's the name Thrackleford, marked '35'."

"That," said the chairman grimly, "is different. He's earned his."

Remembering these things, I looked at the man with more interest. I had never seen him before; I had never met anybody who had seen him. As far as any of the friends I had casually asked about him knew, he never played our course. When or how the committee had obtained the information on which it made such positive decisions, it alone could have told—and didn't.

"Glad you came along," he greeted me as I drew near. "I don't like to play alone. Isn't often one finds a man loose week-day afternoons."

"I'm a painter," I defended myself. "So, naturally, my job is where I am."

"Lucky boy. Doctor's orders accounts for me. Shoot 'em up."

I shot 'em up, and, being somewhat over-eager as—comparatively, of course—a low handicap man, I topped it.

"Too bad," he observed. "You bent your left elbow and took your club head away from the ball at an angle instead of an arc."

HE TEED his ball, stepped back from it, stood for just a moment as though in thought, and then, with a loose-muscled, free swing, sent it straight and true an incredible distance down the middle of the fairway. Remembering his handicap, I felt myself permitted to ask him if he could do that right along.

"Pretty regularly," he replied, in a matter-of-fact tone.

It took me two more strokes to place my ball only a little beyond that mammoth drive of his. The fifth hole on our links is the long one, over five hundred yards and up a persistent slope, with undulating ground swells all the way.

Thrackleford took his brassie, again contemplated the ball a brief instant—and again smote it with that same free, loose-jointed swing. It started low along the curve of the slope, then began to rise and kept on rising until personally I lost sight of it against the distant trees.

I trudged on to my own ball, conscious of a little indignation. Thirty-five! How did the committee get that way! This fellow hit them out like a professional!

Under the spur of this indignation—which was, after all, only mild, I can get up but an academic interest in such matters—I did pretty well, if I do say it. I was hole high in 5, actual count. Thrackleford's ball lay only twenty yards short of the green. He picked out his mashie, crouched over in the approved attitude, and made his stroke. The ball shot away from the impact, described a rainbow arc completely over the green, and bounced and rolled into the rough beyond. Thrackleford watched it anxiously until it stopped, barely within bounds.

"WELL, that's safe, anyway!" he cried exultantly. "I lifted her all right; but the trouble was I snapped at her just at the last minute. I'm still away."

He left his bag and walked across to where his ball lay. This time it hopped forward about four feet.

"See what I did then?" inquired my opponent with entire good nature. "I peeked. Didn't keep my fool head down."

His third attempt was more successful, and seemed to please him greatly, though the ball was barely on the green, leaving him a thirty-foot putt.

"Look at that!" he cried. "That's the time the little imp did what he was told! Not so worse!"

His exultation seemed to me misapplied. The shot was away short; it had barely hopped on, and from only a few yards; and just before he had accepted two marvelous efforts with complete indifference. But he was very engaging in his enthusiasm. I found myself beginning to like the chap, and to be glad that we happened to be going around together.

Now, I am pretty good with a mashie. It is the only club I am pretty good at. I have discovered that I can think of the ball as something to be scooped away with that implement so that I can see what lies underneath it, and if I can pretend a tremendous interest in what does lie underneath it, so that I look eagerly as soon as the ball is out of the way, I can make good shots. It's quite a good scheme. I thought it up myself. So I pretended hard, and did it.

"Gosh, that's a peach!" cried Thrackleford. "I wish I could do that!"

Mighty decent of a fellow who could pull off two like those first ones, especially on top of his subsequent bad luck. I warmed to him still more. Then I looked to see, and found that my ball had come to rest about ten feet from the pin. It always surprises me when this happens, though under my make-believe system it does it quite often.

I can never get a true cause-and-effect feeling out of it. I just do it—that's all.

He prepared very elaborately to putt, extending his elbows at equal and exact angles from his body, like wings, planting his feet at forty-five degrees. Twice he shifted his position slightly before he topped the ball. It missed the cup three feet to the right and overran considerably.

As he was away, he tried again, with the same preliminaries and not dissimilar results; though this time he was inside me somewhat. I made one of my usual approach putts; that is to say, I landed about three feet from the hole, from which distance I have a fair chance, but that is about all. As this brought me in his line, I offered to lift my ball.

"Go ahead and putt her out," he waved my offer aside.

I missed, but went down on the next shot; which made me a nine, actual strokes. Pretty good for the long hole! And Thrackleford took two more, which halved it.

"Beats my record for this hole," he remarked.

That seemed likely. Mine looked good to me; but must be unusual in the reverse sense to a man who handled his clubs like Thrackleford.

WE SAUNTERED over to the next tee. It is silly to take this game seriously, but I found myself childishly elated and correspondingly expansive.

"Don't remember to have seen you about lately," I suggested. I put in the "lately" just to be polite.

"No; this is my first try at the course for a long time. I've been off on one of my exploring expeditions," said he.

I was interrupted by a rough and sarcastic voice. "Say," it observed witheringly, "are youse guys going to stay in your trance, or what? We been yelling fore at you for the last hour!"

That sounded interesting, and I said so.

"What you been exploring this time?" I asked. I put in the "this time" also just to be polite. Evidently he had the habit; but I'd never heard of him.

"Heaven, I suppose it is," said he.

"Where does heaven happen to be?" I laughed. "Must be an attractive country if you call it that!"

"I don't know where it is," he replied, "and I don't know whether it would prove attractive in the usual sense or not. But it was darn interesting, what little I saw of it. It attracted me. I wasn't there long enough to find out very much about it."

"But you must know where you were," I insisted.

"I don't know where I was; as a matter of fact, I merely know what I was."

"Yes?" I queried. "What do you mean by that? What were you? Shanghaied?"

"No. Dead," said he.

I looked at him. He was apparently quite serious, but I caught a twinkle in his eye.

"Of course, if you went to heaven," I agreed. I would as soon fool this way as any other, though the trend of the joke was obscure.

"Your honor," he said.

A dozen more holes merely underscored what the first seemed to have demonstrated. Thrackleford's long game was almost perfect. His wooden shots were marvelous, and invariable. So were his full iron shots. But when he got near the greens, or in any circumstances where he could not take a full swing, he became cramped and uncertain and hopeless. In spite of my usual deficiencies, I managed to pull ahead of him once or twice. It was not that he did not know how, or that he did not try intelligently. He had evidently taken many lessons and read many books, for he analyzed his failures carefully, and told me the why of them very completely. I remarked on his knowledge of the game.

"Oh, I can tell you what to do," he laughed, "if you don't pay any attention to me, doing it."

"I wish you'd tell me the trick of those long shots of yours, then," I rejoined. "If I could ever get off one of them—let alone a dozen, as you have to-day—I'd tie a pink ribbon on the club I did it with and hang it on the wall!"

"I don't know . . ." he answered vaguely. "You just step up and hit it, without bothering too much about it—sort of free, wide, and handsome."

"But do you—"

"I'd like to tell you," he interrupted, "but I don't know; and I don't dare to think about it or try to analyze it, because I'm afraid if I did I'd lose it. I don't know how I do it; I just feel how I do it."

"Well, where did you learn?" I persisted.

"I GOT the feeling that time I was dead," concluded Thrackleford.

"That's the second time you've said that," I pointed out a little irritably, my ball having plopped into that idiotic sand trap on the sixteenth fairway. "Would you mind telling me what you mean?"

"What I say. I was dead for about two hours. It wasn't really long enough to do much."

I glanced at him sharply. Sure enough he was laughing at me, but I realized at once that his laughter was directed only at my bewilderment. When he caught my eye he made a suggestive gesture toward his own forehead.

"Coo-coo! Nobody home, eh? Well, I was dead all right. Dead as a mackerel, for about two hours."

"How do you know you were dead? You couldn't have been really dead. Catalepsy—trance—"

"Well, of course I don't know what you call dead. But I have the word of experts that I was dead by all known tests. Also, I know it myself. And the other fellows told me so, too."

"Other fellows?"

"Yes. Over There. Where I went—wherever that is."

"You remember what happened to you?"

"Perfectly."

"And you mean to tell me you learned—you mean to say they play golf—"

"No, no! Of course not! All I said was that I learned the feeling of how it is to be free, wide, and handsome sometimes. That's different."

WE HAD stopped in the middle of the fairway. I am afraid I was a little goggle-eyed, not only at the extraordinary nature of these statements, but even more at the good-humored, matter-of-fact, commonplace conviction with which Thrackleford proffered them. He seemed not only to believe thoroughly what he was saying, but he also spoke exactly as he might have spoken of any of his experiences in any of the strange countries which he, presumably, had explored.

"Do you mind—that is to say, would it be painful—" I ventured.

He threw back his head and laughed.

"To tell you about it? Not at all! Why should it be? There's nothing disgraceful about dying, is there?"

"But to recall painful—"

"It wasn't painful at all," he interrupted. "Why in blazes should it be? Perfectly natural function. Everybody's doing it—or going to."

"Tell me," I begged, "from the beginning. This is the most interesting thing I ever heard." You see, I was beginning to believe the man had died; such was the effect of his personality.

"I'll do my best; but it's difficult to tell. I was pretty ill before I died, and things about me got somewhat vague and unreal. I suppose I was half dozing, and partly delirious perhaps. I'd slip in and out of focus, as it were. Sometimes I'd see myself and the bed and the room and the people clearly enough; then again I'd sort of drop into an inner reverie inside myself. Not asleep exactly, nor yet awake. You'll get much the same thing sitting in front of a warm fire after a hearty dinner."

"I think I get that," I assented. "Go on."

"Now, here's a funny one: I don't know if you'll get this: You know these pictures sent by radio? They are all made up of a lot of separate dots, you know. If you enlarged the thing enough, you'd almost lose the picture, wouldn't you? And you'd have a collection of dots with a lot of space between them. Well, that's how I seemed to myself.

"I could contract myself, bring all the dots close together, and there I'd be, solid as a brick church, lying in bed; and I could expand myself until the dots got separated so far that there were mostly spaces between them. And when I did that my body in the bed got very vague to me, because the dots were so far apart they didn't make a picture; and I—the consciousness of me—was somehow the thing in the spaces that held the dots together at all. I found it quite amusing contracting and expanding like that."

"Delirium," said I.

"That's what I thought at the time. Probably it was. Anyway, that's the picture I got. Then I began to think about it. I began to wonder whether I held the dots together, or whether the dots held me together; and I got so interested that I thought I'd try to find out. You see, I wasn't the dots: I—the essence of me, the consciousness of me—was the spaces between the dots, holding them together. I thought to myself, 'I wonder if I can get away from these dots?' So I tried it; and I could. I must say I was a little scared. That body made of dots was a good, solid container. When I left its shelter, it occurred to me that I might evaporate into universal substance, like letting a gas out of a bottle. I didn't; but I certainly was worried for fear I'd burst out somewhere. I felt awfully thin-skinned!"

He laughed contagiously.

"Then I heard someone say— No; I didn't hear it, I got the impression of somebody saying, 'There, he's quite successfully dead,' and I thought to myself that it wasn't much of an operation after all."

"Didn't you suffer any?" I asked.

"Not a bit; that's the funny part of it. Doc Carpenter, in his cheerful fashion, told me afterward that I had 'died hard.' I didn't know it; it was a very pleasurable sort of expansion, the way you feel when you step outdoors on a fine morning, only more so. The way I figure it is that I, the real Me, had got out of reach, where nerves and things couldn't report to me."

"Where were you? What did you see? What was it like?" I asked eagerly. By now I was at least temporarily under an Ancient Mariner spell and was accepting all this at its face value.

"I haven't the slightest idea. I didn't see a thing. I felt quite content—also weakish and decidedly lumpish."

"But you must have—"

"I was darn glad I still was Me," stated Thrackleford emphatically. "Look here, answer me a few questions: Just on common-sense lines, what do you expect to take with you when you die? You know you've got to leave your bank account and your flivver and that set of golf clubs and all the rest of it, of course. Also, your physical body. Well, what do you take?"

"Why—my, my soul, I suppose: my personality."

"Got to specify better than that. That's just a feeling that you are You. What's the feeling consist of?"

"Why, my memories and experience and ability, I suppose; and—"

"LET me tell you something," interrupted Thrackleford. "Just about nine tenths of your knowledge and experience and memory would be just as much junk as that bum physical body you left behind. Why? Because it's merely ability to handle physical things. You don't need to die to find that out. Just go to the middle of Africa. What good there does your knowledge of how to run your radio or take care of its little insides do you, where there aren't any radios?

"What good does your knowledge of telephones do you, where there aren't any telephones? Or how to handle bell-boys, or go up in an elevator, or check your baggage and buy (Continued on page 212)

Will These Tests Make You Change Your Job?

Maybe you and your job are at outs with each other. This article will help you to place yourself in the scheme of things and will give you a line on the type of work that suits your particular personality

By Albert Edward Wiggam

Dr. Donald A. Laird, Director of the Psychological Laboratory of Colgate University, editor of the monthly magazine "Industrial Psychology," and author of three books and of more than a hundred technical articles. Before coming to Colgate, Doctor Laird taught psychology in five other universities, including Yale and Northwestern. He was born in Indiana, in the year 1898

TWO men of equal intelligence do the same sort of work. One of them likes it and succeeds, the other dislikes it and fails.

What is the difference?

Every summer thousands of college students go out selling something to make their next year's expenses. They all have about equal intelligence. They sell everything from magazine subscriptions, Bibles and Shakespeare to aluminum skillets and teakettles. Some of these boys make good money and have the time of their lives. Some of them have to yank themselves up by the nape of the neck and screw up their courage every time they knock at a door. And in the end they fail miserably, and come home discouraged and without money.

Again, what is the difference?

It is not a lack of intelligence nor a difference in intelligence. They all have plenty of brains to sell Bibles or frying pans.

At Colgate University, Dr. Donald A. Laird and his students have begun to find out what the difference is, and have discovered to some extent how to measure that difference. To-day men can be told pretty well in advance the jobs they are almost certain to fail at, or at least be given a hunch as to the jobs at which they will probably succeed.

For some time I had been reading in technical journals about the "Colgate Emotional Hygiene Tests" which had been devised by Dr. Donald A. Laird, psychologist of Colgate University, at Hamilton, New York. I had also heard of their practical success in some of the big industrial plants of the country, and knew they were being used to test the emotional attitudes of college students in numerous colleges and universities from Maine to California. From the importance and scope of these investigations I had gathered that their inventor must be a man of some fifty or sixty years of age.

Imagine my surprise when, calling on him in his laboratory to find out about these tests, I found a young man around twenty-nine years old. He was surrounded by a group of enthusiastic students, and for the moment I was not sure which was the professor and which the students, as they all seemed to be about the same age.

I learned from his wife, who assists him in his researches and often carries on his work during his absence, that when a sketch of his life was requested by a publication some years ago, the editors wrote back to Doctor Laird, insisting there was surely a mistake in the date of his birth. Apparently they considered it quite improbable that anyone so young could have conducted such a string of important researches. Doctor Laird, moreover, has three books to his credit, "Applied Psychology for Nurses," "The Psychology of Selecting Men," and "Increasing Personal Efficiency," not to mention over one hundred articles printed in both popular and technical magazines and the published findings of seventy-five investigations.

In line with his energy and decision on other matters, Doctor Laird chose his wife and married her when he was a sophomore in college at the age of eighteen. At the age of twenty-one, while he was conducting psychological examinations in the Navy during the War, he saw to it that his wife worked at the same station, by the simple expedient of not telling Uncle Sam that they were married.

"What would you first advise a man to do," I asked Doctor Laird, "who wanted to make the most of

Directions for Scoring

TO MAKE up your own score and find whether you are an introvert, extrovert, or ambivert, you must first answer each of the forty-eight questions in the Personal Inventory. Notice that there are five printed answers to each question, and that each of the five questions has two numbers above it—the entire series of numbers running from one to ten. After reading over the phrases in small type following each question, think back over your life for the past few months and place your X under the number which best describes your average behavior and thoughts. For instance, if you are very strong on any answer you mark the first of the two numbers above that particular answer; if you are rather weak or moderate mark the second number.

When you have marked all the answers, turn to the score table on page 134, carefully reading the explanation of the score marks. Then total up the number of crosses on your inventory which fall under the score marks given in the appropriate table.

At first glance, you might think, since there are forty-eight questions and three emotional or personality zones, that sixteen answers one way or another might decide the matter. But this is not the case. Between the introversion and the extroversion zones which, of themselves, are not of equal range (there is a stronger leaning toward introversion than extroversion in the human race) lies the wide ambiversion zone, in which the two types of mind are pretty evenly mixed. The reader is asked, therefore, to take some figures for granted, as it has been found by long experience, which we cannot go into here, that if a certain number of questions are answered introversionally then a proportionate number of questions are automatically answered extroversionally. That is the way the mind works. For instance, if a man answers fifteen or more questions introversionally he has answered not more than nine extroversionally, therefore he is an introvert.

If a man answers five or fewer questions introversionally, he has automatically answered not fewer than nineteen extroversionally, therefore he is an extrovert.

If a man answers not fewer than six or more than nine questions introversionally then he automatically answers fifteen to eighteen extroversionally, and that puts him in the ambivert class.

himself and his opportunities?"

"The first thing any man should do," he replied, "is to ask himself two important questions, either about the job he is going to choose for his life work or the job he is in now.

"(1) How well does this job allow me to express the traits and characteristics which are my traits and characteristics.

"(2) Does this job make me repress my natural likes and dislikes, or does it allow me to express them?

"Even if a man is a dumbhead and likes his work, he is a personal success. And if he is a genius and is in a job that does not fit his emotional make-up, while he may have to stick it out from force of circumstances, he may not be a personal failure, yet he has missed his chance of real life and self-realization. What a man wants is a job that gives him not fifty per cent or seventy-five per cent, but one hundred per cent self-realization. The difference between two men of equal intelligence doing the same work, one of whom succeeds and the other fails is one of emotional attitude. The difference between the students who succeed and those who fail in selling aluminum ware, is that one group finds self-realization in the work and the other does not.

"My students and I—you must give a lot of credit to my students as they have done most of the work—have devised a battery of forty-eight tests that we call our 'introversion-extroversion tests.' These, we believe, give us a pretty good line on a man's emotional make-up and personality. And we find a man's emotional- and personality-fitness for his job are just as important as his mental capacity to do the work.

"A man who tests high in introversion, we call an 'introvert,' and one who tests high in extroversion, we call an 'extrovert.' Most of us, however, have a considerable number of the qualities of both introverts and extroverts, which fall into what we call the 'ambiversion' zone. This zone occupies quite a large area in our emotional make-up and personality. As a matter of fact, it is only when we lean way over toward the introvert or extrovert side of our make-up that these qualities stand out very definitely.

"Fundamentally, the introvert is a man of ideas and thought. His life and his satisfactions are mainly inside of himself. On the other hand, the extrovert finds his life and satisfactions outside of himself, loves to meet people, to build, to promote and manage.

"Our great typical extrovert was Colonel Roosevelt. A great typical introvert was President Wilson. Of course each had some qualities of the opposite type, but these terms 'introversion' and 'extroversion' describe the main trends of each man's personality. Think for a moment how different they were in physical make-up and bodily proportion! I have little belief in what is commonly called 'character (Continued on page 125)

Sam Rubee Let The Sunshine Into A Place Of Shadows

He changed an unsightly graveyard into a beautiful park, rich in flowers, in vistas, and often filled with the laughter of children

By Mary B. Mullett

A WOMAN, living in Des Moines, Iowa, took her pen in hand one day about a year ago, and wrote me a letter. Not that this was anything unusual. We of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE receive hundreds of letters a month from all over the country.

But this one was unique in my experience; for it was the only letter I ever have received, in which the writer became enthusiastic and excited over a cemetery.

So I sat right up and took notice.

It wasn't even her own cemetery. It belonged to Marshalltown, a hundred miles from her home city; and she had discovered it during a chance visit to that community.

The result was her letter to me; a letter in which two phrases stood out with startling effect.

They were these two: "A place gay with life," and, "A spot where the living like to linger."

"Well!" I said to myself; "if there is a cemetery anywhere that is 'gay with life,' I certainly would like to see it!"

It is curious, but it is a fact, that a cemetery is vitally interesting to every living human being. I sometimes see it as a center where thousands of silken threads converge; threads of tender memories, coming from all kinds of homes; from shops and factories and offices; some of them from far-off cities; even from far-off lands; an invisible web of loving thoughts, woven between human hearts and—the cemetery.

Yet the cemetery is usually "a place apart" from our daily lives. When we go there it is to make a sort of formal call. When we enter the gates, we put on a special manner. If we take the children with us, they feel uncomfortable until they have escaped from—they don't quite know what, but something alien and depressing.

If, instead of this place apart, there really was a cemetery where "the living like to linger," I wanted to know about it. So the next time I was in the Middle West, I went to Marshalltown.

I found just what I was in quest of; and I found also the explanation of how it came to be in existence.

This explanation is—Sam Rubee. I suppose his name is Samuel; but it is a significant detail of this story that the superintendent of Riverside Cemetery is called "Sam" by the people of Marshalltown.

THEY go even further than that. They call their cemetery by its first name! They don't refer to it solemnly as "Riverside Cemetery," with the emphasis on the "Cemetery." They just say "Riverside;" with the same cheerful companionship that makes them call their friends by their first names.

Marshalltown is a live and attractive place with about eighteen thousand inhabitants. But I think that the livest thing in it, and certainly the most beautiful, is Riverside.

It is alive, just as a factory, or a store, or a library is alive, with progressive ideas and modern methods. But that isn't all. Riverside is alive with the living! A place where they go happily and linger lovingly.

Even in its location, it is not a place apart. Only a few blocks away is their bustling Main Street. The seventy acres of Riverside are within the town limits. Dozens of houses face it—and their occupants are glad to look out upon it.

PHOTOGRAPH BY WALTER L. SMITH, MARSHALLTOWN, IOWA

Mr. Rubee changed a swamp into this beautiful spot

IN MOST towns, a protest would go up, and property values would go down, if a cemetery were placed in the heart of the residence section. But Marshalltown people like to live near Riverside; just as, in other communities, they like to live near a park.

Marshalltown has parks of its own; but they don't compete with Riverside as places of popular resort! Can you imagine a cemetery where the custodians have to drive the people out, in order to close the gates at night? That is what has to be done at Riverside, every pleasant evening from early spring to late autumn.

Can you imagine a cemetery where children flock to play? Where the littlest ones go in winter, to skate on a tiny lake? Where, in summer, they joyously feed the stately swans in this same lake?

Can you imagine a cemetery where one of the driveways is officially designated "Lovers' Lane"?

There is such a driveway in Riverside. The board of managers tried to apply a very different name, but it simply wouldn't stick. Finally, they gave up the attempt; and on the official map of the cemetery I read in bold letters, "Lovers' Lane;" two words which probably cannot be found on any other cemetery map in existence.

Do you know of a cemetery, in a place no larger than Marshalltown, where the daily visitors often number as many as fifteen hundred? Visitors who are not making a mere "formal call" but who spend long hours there; because, as my Des Moines correspondent said, "They like to linger" in a place they love.

If there are other Riversides, I am willing to wager that there is a Sam Rubee behind every one of them. For miracles of this sort do not just "happen." They come because someone has, first, dreamed a dream—then made the dream a reality.

The real story of Riverside begins, not in Marshalltown, but many miles away on the Wisconsin farm where Sam Rubee was born. His father went as a pioneer into what was then a vast forest region. He bought several hundred acres of government land in the heart of the wilderness; but when he started to clear it, a large part of his prospective farm proved to be nothing but tamarack swamps and spruce swamps.

"My father died only a little while after I was born," Mr. Rubee told me. "The hardships of pioneer life killed him. Worn out by these same hardships, my mother died a few years later. There were seven of us children; the eldest twenty years old. For a while, we struggled along as best we could. Then, one by one, my brothers and sisters went away, until I was the only one left. I lived four years with my uncle, then joined my eldest sister in Chicago.

"By that time, I was ten years old. But the first ten years are the formative ones of our lives; and I never had outgrown the effects of a childhood spent in the wonderful outdoor world of nature.

"I learned to love the curving lines of the hills, the changing vistas of a winding road, the gleam of water through the trees. Even the tamarack swamps were full of mystery and beauty to me. So I started with this love of the outdoor world.

"I stayed in Chicago only a year. Then I joined my eldest brother, who had a farm in Wisconsin. A little later, we came to Iowa, where we rented a farm near Hampton. I stayed there most of the next eight or ten years, with two years of this time spent in railroad construction work. So, you see, not only the first ten years of my life, but the next ten as well, were spent out of doors.

"I WANTED to quit farming; but I realized I never could be contented in a store or an office. I had gone to school every time I had a chance and I was good at mathematics; my experience in the fundamentals of engineering in railroad construction work, together with that inborn love of God's great out-of-doors, were the outstanding factors in shaping my future. I studied long and hard to master the problems in the field of engineering. As fate would have it, I found a job here in Marshalltown, as assistant to the man who was then superintendent of Riverside.

"I have been here ever since! Five years after I came, I became the secretary and superintendent of the association, which, by the way, is not run for profit. The board of trustees has given me an absolutely free hand. And although I have received tempting offers to go to other places—even to Chicago—I remain here, because I want to make Riverside my ideal of what a cemetery should be."

"What is that ideal?" I asked.

"Come with me," he smiled, "and I'll show you."

LEAVING the hotel, where we had begun our talk, we drove a few blocks along a street which seemed to end at a park entrance. As we came nearer, I still thought I was facing a park. There were fine iron gates, to be sure; and an attractive sort of lodge just inside them. But they were flanked and overhung by noble trees; and a little beyond these I could see a fountain sending a silver shaft of water thirty feet into the air.

Even as we passed the gates, there was nothing to indicate that we were entering a cemetery. At one side, set deep in grassy banks, was a pool of water lilies. There were flower beds and lovely groups of high-growing shrubs. Winding drives threaded their way through the trees.

Stopping the car just inside the gates, Mr. Rubee pointed to a spot where there was an opening in the leafy branches.

"Do you see a gleam of white through that break in the foliage?" he said. "Well, that is an obelisk; the only memorial—monuments, most people call them—that is visible as you enter Riverside. You have to look sharply to detect even that one.

"As we drive (Continued on page 202)

Scattergood Sets A Speed Trap

A story

By Clarence Budington Kelland

ILLUSTRATED BY PAUL MEYLAN

A LARGE automobile, driven by a uniformed chauffeur, stopped before the Coldriver Hotel. From it alighted a large gentleman, who carried a tremendous weight of dignity and who could be identified in the dimmest light as a person of consequence.

Will Goodspeed, who for three years had been proprietor of the inn, left his comfortable rocking chair and met the guest at the steps.

"How be ye, Senator?" he said in the loudest voice in the township. "Calc'late to spend the night? Kind of lookin' after your fences pendin' election?"

"Ah—how are you, Will? My fences—I may say my fences are in excellent repair."

"Glad to hear it, Senator. Scattergood's in town. But I don't need to tell you that, do I?"

"Ah . . . Mr. Baines is in town." The Senator said this without interest and rather coldly, so that Will Goodspeed half turned to look at him sharply. "No; I didn't come to see Mr. Baines. I thought I'd look into the local post-office situation."

"Didn't know the' was one," said Will.

"The present incumbent has held office upward of thirty years," said the Senator. "I understand there is some local demand for—ah—new blood, and a younger man."

"Better ask Scattergood about that," said Will. "He kin post ye better'n anybody."

"Perhaps," said the Senator, "I shall have time to see him."

Mr. Goodspeed carried the Senator's baggage to his room in silence. It appeared to him something was in the air, and that the part of a gentleman who always desired to sit in the middle of the road would be a profound silence.

The Senator's attitude was peculiar, to say the least of it. It seemed to indicate a certain negligence toward Scattergood Baines, and Coldriver was not accustomed to having politicians behave in any such manner.

And as to the post office: Will Pratt had been postmaster for so long a time that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. Also, Will Pratt was a close and valued friend of Scattergood's. It looked, thought Mr. Goodspeed, like a season when a cautious man should take to the cyclone cellar.

That evening the Senator received on the piazza of the hotel, and made a profound impression. He discussed national policies, and made apparent why he had found it necessary to differ with the President upon important issues. It was noted that the Senator did not refer to Scattergood, did not call upon Scattergood—and that Scattergood did not call upon the Senator. Groups discussed this phenomenon on every street corner.

In the morning the Senator arose, breakfasted, and motioned Will Goodspeed to approach the presence. "Ah—would you oblige me by informing Mr. Baines I will see him at two o'clock," he said.

"Certain, Senator, certain," said Will, not at all overjoyed at this responsibility.

Nevertheless, he walked to the hardware store, where he found Scattergood weighing out five pounds of nails.

"Mornin', Will," said Scattergood.

"Mornin', Scattergood. Senator's in taown."

"Heard tell of it," said Scattergood, removing three nails from the pan to make the scales balance more equally.

"He wanted I should come over," said Will.

"And, follerin' that," asked Scattergood, "what?"

"He wanted I should inform ye he would see ye at two o'clock."

"Comin' here, Will? Was he comin' here?"

"It looked more to me like he expected you should come there."

"Walked here, didn't you, Will? Didn't ride?"

"Come afoot."

"Count the steps, Will?"

"Hadn't no occasion to."

"W-al," said Scattergood, "when ye walk back mebbe ye better count the steps."

"What fur?"

"So as you kin give your word to the Senator that it hain't a mite farther from there here than it is from here there, and mebbe not so fur. . . . G'-by, Will."

"Hain't no other message than that?"

"Yes, Will; ye kin tell the Senator that I'm willin' to see him in twenty minutes, and not no sooner nor no later. G'-by, Will."

"G'-by, Scattergood."

WILL proceeded with some trepidation to the hotel. Scattergood tied up the bag of nails with his accustomed thoroughness, and then spoke to the customer.

"Goin' past the post office, Charlie?"

"I could."

"Um. Prob'ly see Will Pratt if you passed, wouldn't ye?"

"Most gen'ally he's there."

"Say anythin' to him, Charlie? Would ye?"

"I could."

"What you got on your mind to say?"

"That I was talkin' to you."

"Anythin' else, Charlie?"

"Why, I might say you wanted to see him."

"Um. Didn't say so, did I?"

"No."

"Swear to that in court, wouldn't ye?"

"Calc'late I could."

"G'-by, Charlie."

In five minutes, Will Pratt, the veteran postmaster of Coldriver, came into the store.

"Mornin', Will," said Scattergood.

"Mornin', Scattergood."

"Had enough of bein' postmaster, Will?"

"Hadn't thought of it."

"Hain't wishin' to retire?"

"Not unless you want I should, Scattergood."

"What you got to live on, Will, besides what the Gove'ment pays ye?"

"Not much."

"Served the Gove'ment hard and faithful, hain't ye, these thutty year?"

"'Tain't for me to say, Scattergood."

"Um. Calc'late ye mebbe better set back there around the corner a spell. Ye kin come out when I call ye."

"Be they after my job, Scattergood?"

"They be."

Will hesitated: "Scattergood, you stood by me a sight of times. We hain't neither of us so young's we once was. Mebbe I better step down. Don't want to git you into no wrangle, Scattergood. Don't aim to cause ye any trouble."

"It hain't me you're a-goin' to cause trouble fur," said Scattergood cryptically.

By this time Mr. Goodspeed had delivered Scattergood's message to the Senator, who reddened, puffed up, seemed on the point of uttering words and phrases, but abstained. He swallowed three times, and made no reply. But, presently, he arose with elaborate nonchalance and walked majestically toward Scattergood's store.

The Senator entered the hardware store and stood waiting.

"Kind of calc'lated to show the state you could walk into my town and app'int a postmaster right under my nose, did ye? W-al, mebbe ye kin; but it hain't been demonstrated yit"

Scattergood looked up from a paper on which he was figuring, to nod. "See ye in a minute," he said. The minute passed, and a couple of others. Then he lifted his head. "Wanted to see me, did ye, Senator?"

"I thought you might want to see me."

"Calc'late we was both mistaken," said Scattergood. "G'-by, Senator."

"Ah—well, as long as I am here, we may as well discuss the situation."

"Didn't know the' was one," said Scattergood.

"Changes are taking place in the state. Methods are altering. It is something to which we must all grow accustomed, Mr. Baines, with the passing along of the years."

"I kin still eat three times a day, and piece a little when I git peckish."

"The leadership of the party in the state," said the Senator, "seems to—ah—to be passing into my hands by—ah, by common consent."

"Hain't got mine yit, have ye?"

"I am even spoken of for the Presidency."

"Kind of in a whisper, wa'n't it? 'Tain't been shouted yit."

"Nevertheless, my name will go before the convention in three years and, I fancy, not without ample backing."

"Our party convention?"

"Yes."

"Kind of figgered you'd stepped outside the party."

"My aim," said the Senator, "is to purge the party."

"I TOOK note of some of your speeches," said Scattergood placidly. "Been kind of buckin' the President, hain't ye?"

"We've not always agreed."

"And so you got it in your head you better be the bell-wether of the party in this state, eh, before you step out to run the whole dog-gone nation."

"Exactly."

"Um. Not worried about the senatorship none?"

"My reëlection is assured."

"Lucky, hain't it? Because, if you was to be licked for that you'd be kind of shouldered away from the Presidential trough, eh?"

"No likelihood," said the Senator.

"Um. And you kind of figger I'm to step down, eh? And you calc'late to prove I lost my grip by oustin' Will Pratt?"

"There will be a new incumbent in this post office."

"Um. Will? Be you there, Will? Come out and meet the Senator."

Will Pratt came forward diffidently. The Senator swallowed, but extended his hand. "Sorry, Mr. Pratt, but necessities of politics compel."

"Had to come sometime," said Will bravely.

"I'm glad you are reconciled," said the Senator.

"He hain't," said Scattergood. "He hain't no'eres near reconciled. Ever read up on how app'intments is made, Senator? I allus got the idee they was made by the President."

"As Senior Senator, the patronage belongs to me."

"It b'longs," said Scattergood, "to the feller that gits it. So fur, that feller's been me."

"But—"

"So, Senator, I guess we better kind of talk about suthin' else. The next postmaster of Coldriver's a-standin' right there. His name's Will Pratt. G'-by, Senator. . . . Kind of calc'lated to show the state you could walk into my town and app'int a postmaster right under my nose, did ye? W-al, mebbe ye kin; but it hain't been demonstrated yit."

"I'd hoped to settle this amicably."

"Ye kin," said Scattergood.

"How, Mr. Baines?"

"By moggin' along and tendin' to your knittin', and havin' a good time fillin' up the halls of Congress with big words and resoundin' sentences," said Scattergood; "and by leavin' to them that's able to run it, the affairs of the party in this state."

The Senator drew himself up to his full height and glowered. "You go too far, Mr. Baines. And now, sir, here is my ultimatum: Since you decline to step down graciously, I shall abolish you. Yes, sir, abolish you. Am I clear?"

"Everythin's clear," said Scattergood, "exceptin' one p'int."

"And what is that, sir?"

"How you're goin' to manage it," said Scattergood. "G'-by, Senator."

The important gentleman turned on his heel and withdrew. Will Pratt remained, standing uneasily, moistening his lips.

"Where you think you're headin' for—a fire?"

"Now, Scattergood, I been and got you into trouble."

"You go back and run your post office, Will, and don't pay no heed to nothin'. I calc'late to be busy this afternoon, Will. I'm a-goin' out to the house, and kind of rid up my barn door."

"What fur, Scattergood?"

"To git it ready to nail a hide onto," said Scattergood.

JOHNNY BONES, who for many years had been Scattergood Baines's legal staff, was surprised by a visit from the old hardware merchant. It was unusual for Scattergood to come; he generally sent.

"What's happened?" Johnny asked, feeling certain something alarming must have befallen.

"H'm, substantial citizen, hain't ye, Johnny? Substantial?"

"Why, I suppose so—thanks to you."

"Got plenty money invested?"

"You know how much, Mr. Baines."

"Um. Own a silk hat and one of these here Prince Albert coats?"

"No. Why?"

"Git you one," Scattergood said sententiously. "Git ye a set of 'em."

"But what for?"

"Calc'late you're goin' to need 'em."

demanded this guardian of the highways

Johnny waited. He knew more would or would not be forthcoming; but that, either way it went, it would be futile to ask questions.

"Seen the Senator?" Scattergood asked presently.

"I heard he was in town."

"He figgers on dischargin' Will Pratt," said Scattergood.

Again Johnny waited, but his eyes glowed with the light of battle. Upon one point he did not need to ask any questions:

Scattergood would fight to the last recourse for his old friend Will Pratt.

"The Senator," said Scattergood, "has went and gone and outgrowed his bigness."

"You're going after his scalp?"

"Scalp and hide and taller," said Scattergood.

THE old man must be thoroughly aroused, thought Johnny, or he would never commit himself to so direct a statement.

"Calc'latin' to run up to the capital?" Scattergood asked.

"Yes," Johnny said promptly.

"Hain't apt to see Lafe Siggins, be ye, Johnny?"

Lafe was one who formerly aspired to the political rule of the state, until Scattergood put him in his proper niche—which was the satrapy of the northern counties.

"I'm sure to see him," said Johnny, enjoying this old-time method of receiving his instructions.

"Um. Goin' to hold conversation with him? Now, what would you 'n' Lafe find to talk about?"

"Politics," said Johnny.

"Quite likely. What phase of 'em?"

"The senatorial phase," said Johnny promptly.

"Do tell!" said Scattergood, waggling his head. "And what do you calc'late to say to Lafe about sich matters?"

"I'd say to him, 'Lafe, are you going to climb on the band wagon and beat the bass drum, or are you going to get fired out of the band?'"

"Sounds ominous," said Scattergood. "Know Marvin Whitehouse?"

"Yes."

"Think Lafe knows him? Mebbe Lafe's got some opinions about him."

"He will have," said Johnny.

"G'-by, Johnny," said Scattergood. "See you in a few days."

"Going away?"

"Washin'ton," said Scattergood. "Got to show Mandy them statues in the cellar of the Capitol. Mandy admires them statues surprisin'ly. G'-by. . . . Um. . . . Git your order in for a silk hat and one of them danglin' coats."

"Good-by, Mr. Baines."

SO JOHNNY journeyed to the state capital, while Scattergood went to Washington to confer with certain party leaders, and notably with a gentleman who occupied the White House, and whose supporter the Senator had not been. On his return he went up-state to call upon Marvin Whitehouse, a gentleman of wealth and standing and popularity in the state—a man who never had aspired to public office, but who by a lifetime of rectitude and dignity had gained the respect of the people. He found Mr. Whitehouse in his office.

"Howdy, Marvin," Scattergood began.

"I'm glad to see you, Scattergood—and I've got my eye on you. What are you going to bamboozle me into doing?"

Scattergood cocked a wise eye out of the window. "I seen the President day before yestiddy."

"Yes?"

"Your name come up."

"Very gratifying, I'm sure."

"Um. Him and me, we kind of wondered if you was a feller that could look like he wanted suthin', when what he wanted was suthin' altogether different."

"And what were your conclusions?"

Why I Quit Being A "Family Fixer"

WE LAWYERS hold many secrets. We know who in the community is at swords' points with his wife, though to all outward appearances they are a most devoted couple. We know who is in trouble with the Government via the income tax; and who stays awake nights trying to devise some way of locking up his estate so that his useless son will not get hold of it. And all these things we keep hidden behind a calm professional smile.

The story I am about to tell concerns a client who is dead. I think I owe it to folks in general to break through the barriers of professional silence, and show why it was that a man having a substantial income should have derived no pleasure from it, and why, with one of the finest physiques ever given to a human being, he should have become tired out and ready for death at the age of forty-five. In telling his story I shall also tell my own, for up to a certain point our lives ran parallel. Happily, the parallel was broken in time. He is dead, and I am still alive and enjoying the world, more than ever before, the reason being that I quit and he did not quit being a "family fixer."

I met him for the first time at the Grand Canyon. A few weeks before, I had succeeded in persuading the courts to set aside the will of a despicable old miser who had tried to carry his hatred of his children beyond the grave. The resulting fee was large, and my wife induced me to celebrate. I had walked out for a last glimpse of the Canyon's magnificent colors as painted by the setting sun.

The vision was so absorbing that I must have stood at least ten minutes before I realized that I was not alone. Twenty feet to the right of me, seated on a big rock, was a man. His hat was pulled down over his eyes; his cigar had gone out, and was held with a sort of desperate intensity in his clenched teeth; his shoulders slumped. Though he was staring at the same marvelous picture which had held me entranced, it was evident that his eyes saw nothing. I ventured to speak.

"Glorious, isn't it?" I asked.

He gave a sudden start. There was something almost pitiful in the movement, as though the sound of a human voice could mean nothing to him but bad news. Recovering himself, he attempted a smile.

"I've waited a good many years to see this Western country," I continued; "and I must say that it fulfills all my expectations."

He nodded, and then, after a glance which seemed to assure him that I, too, was just a middle-aged family man, he pointed to a gnarled and bent old tree.

"I was looking at that poor fellow," he said, with a forced laugh. "Sort of reminded me of myself."

I studied the tree. A heavy rock had rolled down and bent its trunk a few feet from the ground. Undeterred, it had struggled upward, but in later years a couple of younger trees had leaned over against it, appropriating most of its sunlight, and finally a thick vine had grown up to complete the process of suffocation.

My new friend stood up and came closer, his eyes still fixed on the tree.

"That old fellow would have made a pretty good record if they had let him alone," he mused. "His purposes were right. He started out in life with the idea of growing straight up toward heaven. But one thing after another has leaned on him, and what has been the result? He still carries on. He 'bears his burden,' as the saying goes; but all pleasure has been shut out of his life. I'm in just about the same fix," he added, "just an old stump for folks to lean on."

"Come, come," I said. "You and I are about the same age; we've got a lot of good times ahead of us."

"A man is as old as his relatives make him," he answered gloomily. "On that basis I'm a hundred and one."

I LAUGHED. "I guess I know what you mean. In every family there is one member who has to do most of the worrying. I'm the one in my outfit; you apparently are the one in yours. It's tough; but we only make it worse by thinking about it. Let's forget it until we get home."

"Home," he repeated with a shudder. "Do you know what will be waiting for me when I get back home? Complaints, petitions for loans, quarrels, problems. However, you are right. We ought to try to forget it while we can. I thank you, sir, for the suggestion. Permit me to offer my card."

I gave him mine in return, and we were pleased to discover that we were both citizens of Chicago, though our offices were at opposite ends of the town.

"I shall take pleasure in calling on you one day," he volunteered.

It was a nice remark for him to make, and I thanked him, not expecting, of course, that he ever would call. But less than a month later he did. He was looking somewhat more rested, and I remarked upon it.

"Yes," he answered; "I've been trying to take your advice and forget my family troubles. In fact, the reason why I am here is that I am hoping to shift one of them over onto you."

I smiled professionally, and waited.

"My wife and I have no children," he continued. "One of my brothers is able to take care of himself. The other one has always leaned on me, and probably always will; so will my wife's brother, who is no earthly good. I have one sister, and it is about her son that I want to talk to you. I am very fond of him, and I should like to set up a trust fund of thirty or forty thousand dollars, so that in case of my death he would be sure of having an income. He is a fine lad, and I'd like to spare him some of the hardships I have had."

He showed me the boy's picture: a clean-cut youngster of about nineteen, with an engaging smile and a chin that was none too firm. He told me about his family affairs in detail, his dependent mother and cousins and aunts. All of them were entitled to some help from him, he said, but the nephew was the apple of his eye. It had always been understood by his sister and her husband that the boy was to be "taken care of." Hence the visit to my office, for, "While I don't expect to cash in just yet, I haven't felt any too strong the past year or so. And I want to make things sure while I can."

When he finished his story I put in an objection.

"Of course, as an attorney I am here to carry out the instructions of my clients," I said. "But it is also my duty to give the best advice I can. If you will pardon me for seeming blunt, I think you are doing everything possible to insure the failure of that boy."

He stiffened: "I don't understand you."

"I mean that human beings are naturally lazy. Most of us who have made any success at all have been driven into it by some sort of necessity. You are proposing to take the spur of necessity out of that boy's life. You are going to give him the pleasant but wholesome assurance that if at any time he does not like his job, he can chuck it and loaf until he runs across one he likes better. You are planning to give him not enough income to make him independent but just enough to make him undependable. Believe me," I said, "I am talking to you as one who has a lot of family problems of his own, and my advice to you is to help that boy to get the best education possible, and then set him afloat in the world and leave him to sink or swim."

He waved my argument aside with a tired gesture. It was evident that he had worried so long about the boy that he felt he must get rid of the worry somehow, and so had selected the trust fund as the best method, and myself as a trustee who would take the responsibility seriously. In the end I made the legal arrangements, and he left the office carrying his shoulders a little straighter.

IT WOULD take too long to detail our subsequent relationships. Suffice it to say that he came to the office on an average of once a month, always with a new worry about a member of his family, and usually it was a matter which ought never to have been on his shoulders at all. My remonstrances were of no avail. He had that Puritan conscience which made him a born bearer of burdens, and he had plowed such deep furrows of worry in his mind that his thoughts could run in no other grooves.

When he was forty-four I could see that he was breaking under the strain; but I could not persuade him to go away. "Next year," he would say. "Just let me get these few little matters cleared up, and then next year my wife and I will go abroad."

But the first six months of next year he was helping his youngest brother to get a divorce, and immediately afterward he had to move his wife's cousin and her family to another suburb.

It was a very hot summer, and he tramped up one street and down another, looking at all sorts of houses, listening to all sorts of realtors, the most tiring work in the world. At the close of an unusually hot August day he complained of being worn out, and said he would lie down for a few minutes before supper. When they went to call him to the table his weary spirit had flown to that better land where relatives do not cast their burdens on each other, because they have cast them all upon the Lord.

There is no surer way to master a subject than to attempt to teach it, and no more certain method of overcoming a fault in one's self than to seek to remove it from the life of another. I owe a very great debt to this dead client of mine, for I was well on my way to the same hopeless condition when he visited me, and while I did not effect a cure in him, I did in a measure help myself. Every argument that I advanced against his sacrifice was an argument born of my own sad experience. Repeating them over and over to him, I began gradually to work out for myself a new point of view. It is this hard-won philosophy that I now seek to pass on.

I was born the eldest child in a family of six, four boys and two girls. One of my earliest memories is of a talk I had with my father in the pasture, where I was helping him plow.

"You are my eldest son," he said. "Never forget that I rely on you to set an example to the rest. If anything should happen to me it would be your duty to carry on."

I do not think it is fair for mature men and women to lay such solemn warnings upon the sensitive souls of growing boys and girls. We learn soon enough that life is real and earnest. Surely Plato was right in prescribing that the first ten years should be given over to play and health-building. Ten years is little enough to allot to the Garden of Eden. For me, the days in the Garden closed in my seventh year. It was then that I began to feel the first weight of responsibility for the younger members of the family.

WE WERE making our way home from school one afternoon when a lad of the bullying type slipped up behind my brother Joe and tipped him off his velocipede. Joe was not hurt, only surprised, and the incident would have passed off easily, but for the hot surge of my "parental" affection. The sight of my little brother being tumbled off into the grass seemed to turn my blood to fire. Hardly knowing what I was about, I rushed up to the bully and hurled my little fists into his face. The fight did not last long, for we were pried apart by friendly onlookers before my opponent's greater strength could do me any injury.

My heart beat too fast for the rest of that afternoon, and I could not get to sleep for hours that night, the memory of the conflict tormenting me. But I had vindicated the family honor. I had avenged the insult to my little brother. Yes, and, while I did not realize it at the time, I had done Joe a permanent injury.

My father had never been trained for anything, and his versatility was his curse. He played the cornet; he did parlor tricks. He could build houses and mend harness, and prescribe for sick cows. He was one of the best companions a bunch of kids ever had; and if my mother had lived we might have led a very happy existence, in spite of poverty, for she was a blessed spirit with a perfect faith. But she died early, and my father, at his wit's end with a brood of youngsters, married the first woman who passed the door. Thus there sat in my mother's chair one who knew neither love nor faith, a blighted spirit whose ruling passions were fear of the future and greed for money, as the only escape from that fear.

I hope I am free, in some degree at least, from both the fear and the greed, but her constant harping on the subject of money, with the incessant repetition of hard-luck stories, which she was so fond of gathering and retailing, left an indelible imprint on my mind. The result has been twofold.

In the first place, I set out in life with the fixed determination to acquire a competence. The "dependent old age" which she pictured so vividly should not be a part of my program; nobody would ever have to give a church social in order to rescue me from (Continued on page 174)

If You Ask Me:

If you can't control your temper, somebody big enough can do it for you

SUPPOSE you walk in the back yard and step on a rake, and the handle flies up and strikes you between the eyes. You feel resentful, of course, however much or little civilization has done for you; but if civilization has given you the self-control normal men possess, you are content to hang the rake where it belongs, whereas the man whose temper retains the vigor of primitive times will not feel avenged until he has broken the rake handle and kicked the fragments into the alley.

It is easy to believe that Nature equipped her creatures with temper because they needed it. Temper is a kind of madness, and makes the wild things forget discretion and pain and weakness. It is necessary to forget these things when one must fight for food and for life.

Doubtless, temper served primitive man also; but now it is an unwelcome hang-over, and of no greater worth than the appendix.

Infants have temper, and employ it frequently to gain their ends when experience has taught them that it is a valuable asset. If they retain it as they grow older, it is because temper continues to pay dividends. No normal child will develop and employ a temper after hard experience has proved the thing a liability.

The same is true of adults. If a grown man has an "uncontrollable temper," it is because he was denied the blessing of a sound licking during the period when it would have done him the most good.

I once saw an "uncontrollable temper" in operation. The man who possessed it had been offended by the stubborn cap of an oil can, and he threw the can to the ground and leaped upon it and kicked it into a shapeless mass.

This man's temper once caused him to kill a pup, and once it caused him to throw a shoe at his wife; but he could control it when necessary. He had it under perfect control one Saturday afternoon when a larger man with a cold blue eye backed him against a bank window and threatened to spoil his face if he opened his mouth.

If you have an "uncontrollable temper" that is family legend, it isn't anything to inspire boasting. Nine times in ten that kind of temper is the mark of a bully. You wouldn't have it now if you hadn't developed it by means of exercise during the years when your character was forming. And you didn't develop it by using it on people stronger than yourself. If you had tried anything like that, the temper would have been eliminated—along with numbers of your teeth. You developed it by using it on the weak, which means that you cultivated a yellow streak at the same time.

Temper doesn't make you a dangerous man—not all the time. You are harmless while facing a large man who has a club, but you are dangerous to furniture. How savagely you can kick a chair or fling a book out the window when the world displeases you! Temper shouldn't affright anybody. It usually belongs to a chair kicker.

On Which Side Of The Windshield Do You Do Your Cussing?

By H. I. Phillips

ARE automobilists people?

Can a man be a motorist, and still be himself?

Is it possible for a person to drive an automobile, and remain a human being?

Do gasolene and courtesy mix?

Why is it that Casper M. V. Bluegills, the mildest, gentlest man in the neighborhood when afoot, becomes a Terrible-Tempered Mr. Bang the moment you put a steering wheel into his hands?

How comes it that Chester X. Y. Oohms, the well-poised bank clerk, will ride all day in a stuffy day coach and show only mild irritation if the train is held up by cows on the track ten times during a 55-mile run, yet become a profane and infuriated madman if, when driving his coupé around the block to get a pack of cigarettes, he is delayed forty-five seconds by a traffic cop directing a bewildered old lady to an emergency hospital?

How do you explain that Artemus V. Beedeez, passenger on a twelve-day boat to Europe, will force a smile and say philosophically, "Well, we'll have to make the best of it," when the ship is delayed nine hours by a fog, but become apoplectic with rage, and bellow, "It's a blankety-blank outrage!" whenever he is out in his fireless cooker and is held up two minutes by a hard-working coal-truck driver trying to back up to the curb and unload?

Why is Luther Q. Brighteyes, efficiency expert, psychologist, and author of the stirring pamphlet "The Importance of Patience and Self-Control in Business," one of the first men to fly off the handle when a little boy, hurrying home from the delicatessen store with a pound of potato salad and a dozen eggs, tries to cross the street unaccompanied by the state militia?

Can you tell me why Otis Throckmorton Whooziss, secretary of the Golden Rule Society, will smile graciously, lift his hat, and say sweetly, "I beg your pardon. I'm really awfully sorry. Please excuse me," when he accidentally steps on a strange woman's foot in a theatre lobby, yet will lean out and make faces at his own grandmother if she fails to slow up her flivver and allow him to "cut in" on a congested highway?

It's all over my head. I haven't got the right answers.

Possibly there's something about a windshield that distorts a man's outlook on life.

Perhaps it is the horn.

I'm not preaching. As a matter of fact, I'm in the same boat with the rest of the Occasionally Human Race. I believe in graciousness. I think courtesy and consideration two great virtues. I have no patience with the gruff, ill-mannered person who has no sense of fair play. Ordinarily, I keep my temper and rarely do I wax profane. But I'd hate to be held strictly accountable for all that I do, say, or think when driving an automobile.

Once the smell of gasolene gets into my nostrils, I become a different man. And how!

Few things that the other fellow does seem right to me. I denounce traffic policemen as dumb-bells, brand truck drivers as idiots, classify women drivers as nitwits, bawl out little children as crazy numbskulls, and dismiss pedestrians as a whole with the scornful, "The big louts! Can you beat 'em?"

I become overbearing, disdainful, superior. I become, as it were, an hauteur-mobilist.

NOW, I'm not that way under other conditions. Subway tie-ups I regard as unavoidable. When one occurs, I read my paper for fifteen or twenty minutes, and then, if the train isn't ready to move, I walk out and grab a taxi. If the taxi gets tied up in traffic, it nettles me somewhat, but I don't tear my hair, glare out the window, and use language not permitted in the fourth-best families.

If I go to the theatre and the curtain, scheduled to rise at eight-thirty, does not rise until nine I get somewhat peeved. I shuffle my feet a bit and mutter a little, but I don't blow a horn vociferously at the producer and make grimaces at the usherettes.

Even on the telephone I am under better control than in an automobile. I give "central" an even break, at least. She always gets a minute for rebuttal.

BUT in the gasolene rickshaw—that's something else again! Once aboard the motor lugger and I'm the whole nine reels of D. H. Griffiths's "Intolerance." And I'd be awfully upset about it and conscience-stricken if I didn't know from observation that ninety-nine out of one hundred men are the same the minute they step on a self-starter or let in a clutch.

Is the craze for speed so predominant a characteristic of the people of the United States that, once it is given an opportunity to express itself, it submerges all other traits? That may be it.

One touch of gasolene, possibly, makes the whole world spin.

Give a man a chassis, four tires, a soap box, and a horn, and he immediately wants to become the Vanishing American.

From that time on he believes in the survival of the fleetest.

He has two mottoes. They are:

1. Fright makes right.
2. The other fellow is always wrong.

This speed mania is no respecter of persons. Last summer I was all but sidewiped by a big rumbling limousine that tore out of a side street with absolutely no warning. My amazement at the performance was eclipsed by the recognition of the driver as a beloved priest, well over sixty and widely known for his gentle ways and inherent kindliness. He probably didn't know what a different picture he made with his foot on an accelerator. One of the most careless drivers in my home town was a bishop. Any place but at the wheel of his runabout he was a cautious, slow-moving, extremely considerate gentleman. But once in his petrol-barouche, and he was more of an insurance risk than the fire chief.

For some years, I was secretary of an automobile club in my home town. Its slogan was "Safety First!" and its board of directors, meeting once a week, issued a flood of bulletins emphasizing the need of cautious driving, and urging all motorists to consider the rights of others. One of its officers was arrested one day while carrying some "Go Slow" signs into the suburbs!

After nailing up one "Go Slow" sign, he had violated the speed laws in his rush to put up the others! At another time, the club, aroused by a series of accidents, appealed to the public to report to the club any persons observed driving recklessly. When the complaints were opened at a later meeting, one of the first read was against the president of the club.

INCONGRUOUS as it may seem, the drivers of ambulances are particularly subject to speed dementia. It is getting so the most hazardous part of a patient's illness is his trip from his home to the hospital in an ambulance. For that matter, the immune motor-cycle policemen are just about as reckless as most of the drivers they arrest, and, as everybody knows, the fastest driving seen in American communities to-day is being done by fire chiefs on their way from the firehouse to the quick-lunch-room for coffee and crullers.

It's in the blood. The man on the way to a notions store to buy a spool of thread for his wife drives just as heedlessly as the chairman of the reception committee clearing the way for a channel swimmer, a golf champion, or the Prince of Wales.

The motto of both is, "Don't stop until you see the whites of their eyes!"

And that—let's be honest about it—is mine, too.

The change in character that comes over me when I step out of the rôle of a pedestrian and into that of a flivver pilot is very curious. Whenever I walk about town, crossing streets in heavy traffic, I become an outraged citizen, a downtrodden, brow-beaten, fender-scarred pedestrian, whose spirit flames in revolt against "the stupid, irresponsible, selfish, pig-headed, pygmy-brained automobile drivers who don't give a whoop about the rights of other folks." I deliver a tirade at the taxicab chauffeur who grazes my thigh as he sweeps around the corner; I denounce the truck driver who by a blast of a trick horn causes me to set a new running broad jump record; I stand shaking my fist and purple with rage as the gentleman at the wheel of a private car ignores my attempt to cross the street at a walk and chases me up an alley.

"Has a pedestrian no rights? Do these fellows in automobiles own the earth? What's the matter with the police? There oughta be a law-w-w-w-w-w!" I mutter to myself.

How traffic seems to the pedestrian and how it seems to the motorist

But, a few hours later, when I hop into my own 45-horse-power percolator, and pick a course down Broadway through the milling throngs, I become an outraged motorist, an agitated car owner, an impatient speed demon, whose spirit rises in revolt against "the stupid, irresponsible, selfish, pig-headed, pygmy-brained pedestrians who don't give a whoop about the rights of motorists." I let fly a blast at the struggling man who darts in front of me to avoid death under the wheels of a ten-ton truck. I bawl out the messenger boy who dashes across in such a way as to compel me to cut my speed from 30 to 29½ miles an hour. And I mutter "Fool!" at the elderly gentleman who ducks back to the curb just in time to save his trousers from being carried away by my front right fender.

It all depends upon the point of view!

However, I'm trying to reform and lead a better life. I'm nearer right when, as a pedestrian, I condemn the automobilists than I am when, as an automobilist, I condemn the pedestrians.

The pedestrian, I am satisfied, is the under dog. He has no flexibility, no quick "pick-up," no accelerator and, above all—no horn!

The advantages are all with the automobilist. There is no justice in the motorist's assumption that he should take a mile while a pedestrian takes an inch.

So of late I have been making a serious effort, when driving a car, to be fair to the man who navigates in a pair of shoes. Whenever a pedestrian steps out into the street with what seems poor judgment, I restrain that impulse to skirt him and cry "Whatzamattah? Are ya sound asleep?" Instead, I often put on my brakes; if necessary, come to full stop, and with a smile wave him on his way. But the results have been disheartening. When I slow up my old boiler and show consideration and courtesy to a pedestrian, almost invariably he thinks there's something wrong with me!

HERE are some exact experiences taken from my diary:

MONDAY: Still trying to play fair with pedestrians, but they don't seem to get the idea. Driving out Merrick Road, when young man and woman stepped abruptly from curb in path of car. I put on brakes quickly and came to full stop. Startled by grinding of brakes, they seemed confused and stood in middle of road. I motioned for them to go ahead and cross the street. They did so. I then started car again, and, as I passed the couple, the young man gave me a bitter look and cried, "You're one of them fresh guys, ain't you?"

TUESDAY: Had another amusing experience to-day in working out my attempts to be gracious toward pedestrians. Was passing through Central Street when a workman stepped out from the curb to signal a trolley car. He did not see me at first, but jumped back onto sidewalk as I came to a stop. I leaned out of car and nodded for him to step out and get his trolley. He looked at me in a dazed manner. "Come ahead," I called to him. He made no move for a few seconds, and then walked around the rear of my machine to board the car. I am sure he thought there was some catch in it.

WEDNESDAY: Was bowling along suburban road at more than a reasonable speed when a mother pushing a baby carriage stepped from the sidewalk about half a block ahead of me. I slowed up, and motioned for her to cross, indicating that I would wait for her to do so. She dashed back to the sidewalk again, quite frightened. As I came to a stop, I smiled and said, "It's all (Continued on page 98)

"Nevada"

A romance of the West

By Zane Grey

HETTIE'S senses reeled, and almost failed her. When his kisses ceased she felt herself held closely for a long moment, then let down from the horse until her feet touched the ground. She was falling when Nevada leaped from the saddle.

He put her on the grass with her back resting against the trunk of a tree; and there presently her eyes opened.

Nevada knelt before her, his face convulsed. Slowly it smoothed out and a wild darkness faded from his eyes.

"There. I reckon I must ask you to excuse me for bein' rough. But I shore couldn't stand that talk aboot not lovin' you."

"I will not believe—unless you prove it," returned Hettie unsteadily, as she reached for her sombrero.

Nevada rose to his feet. "I cain't prove it, your way," he replied, and his features set stone-cold and gray.

"Oh, what have you done to me?" cried Hettie wildly, as again emotion rose strong and regained the ascendancy over her.

"Reckon nothin' compared to what you've done to me," he responded, with somber gaze upon her. "Dillon will just aboot beat me to a gun!"

Hettie stood up, holding to the tree trunk. "Nothing! . . . I've loved you since I first met you. I've been true. I trusted you. My faith in you was as great as my faith in God. I believed you loved me. That when you rode away from Forlorn River—to escape the consequences—when you killed Less Setter to save Ben—I still believed you would be true to me, to the higher self you had found through Ben's love and mine. . . . But you went back to the old life, to the old comrades. Rustlers, gamblers, gunmen! Jim Lacy! You killed just because you wanted to keep that name hated and feared. Oh, my God—it would be my death, if I could not kill my love. But I will kill it. It shall lie as dead as my faith."

Nevada's eyes held a blaze like black lightning. "Reckon that'll be aboot all I want to heah," he said, in tones she had never heard before.

He gathered up the reins and vaulted into the saddle, then turned to gaze down the trail over which he had just ridden.

"Horses comin'," he said, briefly. "It's Marvie with his girl, Rose Hatt. They'll look after you. It's aboot sunset," he went on, with strange gaze upon the west. "Sunset for Dillon! An' shore sunset for me!"

Then he spurred the big black, and clattering into the trail soon vanished from sight toward the ranch.

NEVADA approached the Ide ranch from that side closest to the forest, where the pines and cedars trooped down the gentle slopes of the benches, clear to the most outwardly of the cattle sheds.

With his brain on fire and his heart like lead, his whole being crushed under the burning weight of Hettie's outspoken love and terrible scorn, he halted under cover of the last clump of cedars, and dismounted, answering to an instinct, true even in that hour of utter catastrophe—to the instinct which had preserved him so long as Jim Lacy.

He removed saddle and bridle from his horse, and turned it free. He would have no more need of a horse. Then he crouched in the cedars, under tremendous strain, driving himself to the exclusion of all thought, of all emotion, of all faculties except those few cardinally important for the issue at hand.

When he emerged from under cover of the cedars he might have been an automaton, with guidance of some grim-strung spirit.

He glided behind brush to the sage, and through this to the pole fence. It led to the back of log cabins, which he marked as the bunk-houses. The sunset hour was near. Silver-edged purple clouds hung over the soft rounded foothills. Soon the sun would sink from behind the broken mass of cloud, and slide down into that golden space behind the ranges. Cowboys, riders, range hands, foreman, all would be waiting the call to supper. The day had been hot. Just now, with the first cool breeze breathing down from the hills, all the men would be outdoors.

There is a fate in many meetings of life, and singularly in all those that involved Jim Lacy.

He swept his gaze to the left, over pasture and field, which were open to his sight. A few horses and colts, cows and calves, a burro, and some black pigs dotted the gray-green pastures and the brown fields. No rider in sight!

Nevada stole swiftly along the fence to the first high corral. Climbing to the top log of the high fence he peeped over. No man in sight! He climbed and ran and climbed and ran, quickly gaining the open gate of the last corral.

A Mexican boy appeared, leading horses to a watering trough; a rider came trotting down the long lane between the fields; someone was driving cows in from the pasture. From behind the cabins in the courtyard came the loud rollicking laughter of cowboys.

Nevada did not hesitate a moment, Leisurely he strode from the corral toward the longest cabin, making for the nearest end, where cords of firewood were stacked high. That end, where blue smoke curled from a stone chimney, would be the kitchen. There would be a porch on the other side.

Nevada gained the wood piles. They had been stacked, seemingly, to furnish him perfect passageway and perfect cover, for the fruition of this long-planned moment. It never crossed his mind that Dillon might not be there. Dillon would be there. For the men who had wronged Jim Lacy or incurred his enmity there existed a fatality which operated infallibly. Or else, Lacy never made a mistake. It was something that he felt.

He glided between the high stacks of wood. Before he peeped out he saw horsemen riding down the dusty road, which wound away to the north and Winthrop. Then Nevada put his eye to an aperture between two billets of cedar that protruded from the stack.

A dozen or more men lounged and sat and stood in plain sight. Cowboys in shirt-sleeves, faces shiny and red, hair glossed and wet, sat on the ground, backs to the cabin.

Nevada recognized Macklin, the Winthrop sheriff, leaning against the hitching rail, in conversation with two other men, not garbed as riders. Facing Nevada was a tall man in black with a bright badge on his vest. This was another sheriff, a stranger to Nevada.

"We sure want to get off by sun-up," he was saying to a man near him.

This man stood with his back toward Nevada. His powerful, supple shoulders showed wonderfully through his white, clean shirt. Nevada recognized that lithe, stalwart build, the leonine neck, the handsome head, with its clustering fair hair.

DILLON! A slight, cold thrill ran over Nevada. Following it came an instinct like that of a tiger to leap.

Nevada swiftly ran his glance over the other men, standing near and in the background. Ben Ide was not present!

Then Nevada drew back behind the woodpile, loosened his gun in its sheath, and stood there an instant, while the waiting forces of brain and muscle vibrated into a tremendous unity.

"Come an' get it," sang out the cheery voice of the cook inside.

At this instant Nevada bounded out swiftly and ran to a halt.

"Hold on!" he yelled, with all the power of his lungs.

In the instant of silence that ensued Dillon was the only man to move, and he wheeled swift as a flash, so swiftly that the receding trace of mirth had not yet left his handsome face.

"Howdy, Dillon," drawled Nevada, slow and cool.

Macklin shuffled erect.

"That's Jim Lacy!" he shouted hoarsely.

"Shore is. Careful now, you outsiders!" warned Nevada, yet with eyes only for Dillon.

Every man in line with Dillon plunged off the porch or darted into the cabin. The cowboys sank back to the ground, sagging against the log wall.

Dillon stood on the porch facing Nevada, scarcely thirty feet distant. His reaction from careless mirth to recognition of peril was as swift as his sight. But there followed the instant when his faculties had to grasp what that peril was, and how he should meet it.

Nevada had gambled on this instant. It was his advantage. He did not underrate Dillon. He read his mind in those dilating eyes.

"Wal, you know me," said Nevada icily. "An' I know you—Dillon—Campbell—ED RICHARDSON!"

That was the paralyzing challenge. The rustler turned a ghastly white. The frontier's bloody creed, by which he had lived, called him to his death. His green eyes set balefully. He knew. He showed his training. He had no more fear of death than of the swallows flitting under the eaves above. But he had a magnificent and desperate courage to take his enemy with him.

Richardson never uttered a word. Almost imperceptibly his body lowered as if under instinct to crouch. His stiff, bent right arm began to quiver.

Nevada saw the thought in Richardson's eyes—the birth of the message to nerve and muscle. When his hand flashed down Nevada was drawing.

"Crash!" Nevada's shot did not beat Richardson's draw; but it broke his aim. The rustler's gun went off half-leveled. He lurched with terrible violence and his gun boomed again. The bullet scattered the gravel at Nevada's feet and spanged away into the air.

A wide red spot appeared as if by magic on the middle of Richardson's white shirt. How terrible to see him strain to raise his gun arm!

At Nevada's second shot one of Richardson's awful eyes went blank. His arm hooked round the porch post. Then it sank limp, letting him fall with sodden thud.

Nevada was the first to withdraw his gaze from that crumpled heap. He flipped his gun into the air and caught it by the barrel.

"Heah, sir," he said to the sheriff with the star on his vest, and extended the gun butt foremost. "I reckon that'll be aboot all for Jim Lacy!"

The strain on the watchers relaxed. A murmur of wonder ran through them, growing louder. The sheriff came to a power of movement and speech.

"What? Lacy, are you handin'—over your gun?"

"Wal, I'm not pointin' the right end of it at you," replied Nevada, and tossed the gun at the sheriff's feet.

Here Macklin came rushing up, to get between Nevada and the other sheriff.

"Jim Lacy, you're my prisoner!" yelled Macklin. "Hands up!"

"Shoot an' be hanged, you four-flush officer of the law," retorted Nevada wearily, and, turning his back to Macklin, he strode to a seat on the porch steps.

"Run for the boss!" shouted Raidy to the cowboys. "Fetch him an' Judge Franklidge."

"Hyar comes Tom Day with his outfit," yelled a cowboy, pointing to the horsemen entering the square.

Nevada experienced a weariness of soul and body. It was over. He did not care what happened.

"Say, give me a smoke, one of you punchers," he said, removing his sombrero to wipe his clammy brow.

BEHIND, in the forest, Marvie Blaine had come, swinging down the trail at a gallop, with Rose Hatt riding close upon his horse's heels.

Marvie rode right upon Hettie before halting. "Say, you look like thunder!" he ejaculated, with anxious concern, as he helped her mount her horse.

"Marv, that's the way I feel," replied Hettie.

Rose joined them, to crowd her pony close, eager yet shy, with eyes alight and lips parted. "Oh, Miss Hettie!" she cried rapturously. "Marvie's brought me to you. I—I'll never go back—to the brakes."

"My dear, you're welcome to my home," returned Hettie warmly, leaning to kiss the flushed face.

"Hettie, you've seen a ghost, the same ghost I saw," declared Marvie shrewdly.

"Oh, Marvie lad—a ghost indeed!" moaned Hettie. "Nevada! . . . He just left me—to—to kill Dillon!"

"No news to me!" shouted Marvie fiercely. "I've got to see that. . . . Fetch Rose. But go 'round. Keep away from the corrals!"

The last he delivered over his shoulder, as he urged his horse into the trail and whipped him into a run. In a moment he passed out of sight among the pines. The swift patter of hoofs died away.

"Come, Rose—ride!" suddenly cried Hettie, striking her horse.

The spirited animal, unused to that, broke into a gallop, and then a run. Hettie looked back. The girl was close behind, her hair flying in the wind, her face flashing.

WHERE the trail emerged from the pines, Hettie turned her horse and kept to the top of the slope. Soon she passed Nevada's big black horse, grazing on the sage. "An' shore sunset for me!" Nevada's words of resignation and sadness rang in her ears like bells of doom.

Suddenly she imagined she heard a shot. Another! A gunshot—then two sharp cracks, clear on the breeze. She reeled in her saddle. Almost she put her horse at the ranch fence. But she kept on in wild flight, forgetting Rose, clutching with left hand at her breast, where uncertainty mounted to supreme agony.

Her fast horse, keen at the freedom afforded him, swept on as in a race, on by the corrals and gardens, up over the low bench, and through the woods to her cabin, where her mother stood, waving frantically from the porch. Hettie rode on, over the bridge, into the shady green glade before Ben's house.

Here she pulled her iron-jawed horse to a snorting halt. She saw men running. She heard Rose's pony come clattering over the bridge. Then Marvie's horse appeared over the rise of ground toward the corral.

One sight of Marvie's flashing face answered Hettie. She could have screamed in her frenzy. Marvie reached her at the moment Rose came up. His horse reared and pounded. Marvie jerked him down with powerful arm, and closed with Hettie.

"Nevada's down there—handcuffed!" he whispered pantingly. "Dillon's dead! . . . Oh, there'll be trouble now! . . . But not a word from—you an' Rose!"

The boy's heated face, the horses, Rose so white and rapt, the running riders, the houses and the pines, all blurred in Hettie's sight. She felt the girl's strong hand on her, steadying her in the saddle. The deadly faintness passed.

Ben and Judge Franklidge were striding out to meet the running cowboys.

"Judge, I told you I heard shots," Ben was saying. "Somethin's happened!"

"Seems like. But don't let it upset you," replied the judge.

"There's Marvie. . . . Has he gone loco?" exclaimed Ben in amaze, as the boy, riding wildly, scattered the men coming up the slope.

How a Handwriting Expert Solves Mysterious Crimes

Murderers who think they have covered every clue; forgers who are sure they have done perfect jobs, and other criminals who match their wits against the law, have found the "questioned document" man an enemy they cannot deceive

By John Kidder Rhodes

IF THE little French milliner of a Wisconsin town had not written a letter and mailed it to herself, some of her gossiping neighbors might have continued to entertain their doubts of her; but, at any rate, nothing could have been proved against her. Faulty flues, an accident, spontaneous combustion—any of these might have been sufficient to explain the blaze, if an explanation were needed. As it was—

Inasmuch as half a dozen trains stopped at her town between midnight and nine o'clock the next morning, it seemed curious that Madame chose to have her trunk taken to the station to go on the train that was about the least convenient of all; namely, one scheduled for 3:41 A. M. The night operator and another railroad man or two were at the station when she arrived. She came a little too soon, and the train was a little too late, for her plans to end happily. Presently, while she was still tapping her toes on the depot platform, one of the men exclaimed:

"Why, look, ma'am, ain't your store on fire?"

True enough, flames were leaping up the sides of the little frame structure. The fire quickly roused the town. A bucket line formed, and volunteers did what they could; but the store burned to the ground. A couple of other stores near by also caught fire and burned. And, finally, the depot fell a prey to the flames. As a consequence, the three-forty-one did not even stop that night, and Madame remained in town with the ashes.

THE insurance adjuster—yes, Madame carried insurance on her tiny millinery stock!—discovered by methods which satisfied him, that apparently there had been little or no millinery in the store at the time it was burned; but that much of it had somehow found its way into the trunk which Madame had prepared to take on the three-forty-one. Was she intending to collect insurance to which she had no right? Had she started the fire? It almost seemed so. But who could be certain?

Madame unwittingly supplied proof. She produced a letter, addressed to herself. It was written in a bold, rough hand, and purported to be from a rejected suitor. "I burned your store down," the writer said, and went on to state that he had hidden some of Madame's things in a certain culvert.

The letter, Madame hoped, would remove any suspicion that she had started the fire. But it had exactly the opposite effect. The letter was taken to Mr. John F. Tyrrell, of Milwaukee, one of the inner circle of a profession for which few men in the United States, besides himself, are fully qualified; and he proved beyond reasonable doubt that it was written by Madame herself, and that the rejected suitor, if he existed anywhere except in Madame's brain, had no hand in its composition. It seemed pretty plain, therefore, that the little milliner had lighted the match that burned her store, hoping to collect the insurance. She did not collect. And in a fury at losing everything, she had the audacity to try, vainly, to collect from the railroad for her burned trunk!

My Visit To The Old Home Town

By Albert Payson Terhune

HUMAN nature abhors a vacuum.

This fact, and the fact that memory is gorgeously optimistic explain the most grisly disillusionment I ever suffered. It happened after I was full grown, and should have known better; but I never was bright enough to learn anything much, except through experience. Here's the story:

I had great times in Fallfield when I was a boy. Perhaps I had miserable times there, too; but those were forgotten. (One remembers only the picnic's jolly ball game and swim, and forgets there were ants and sand in the coffee.)

The memory of the fun and the friendships, and all the rest of my early life in Fallfield had glowed more brightly and more homesickly, year by year, after I left.

Every inch of the Old Home Town stayed fresh and beautiful in my memory. Every lineament and every trait of my old-time neighbors and chums was vivid.

I wanted to go back. Always I wanted to go back. It grew to be a kind of obsession with me.

Let me pause here, in the story of my return to the Old Home Town, to say that if this had been nothing more than my own long-time desire, it would not be worth your reading. But I believe it is the wholesale craving of all men and women who have left an Old Home Town.

Is there any former small-towner, now domiciled in a big and distant city, who does not find himself looking back yearningly sometimes to the Old Home Town, and who does not console himself in hours of blue loneliness by planning to return home, sometime, if only for a day or two?

I think not. It seems to be a yearning as universal as that for sudden wealth or for all-conquering fascination.

And so, for a few minutes, let's take a look at my return visit to Fallfield.

I left there when I was twelve. I did not go back again for fifteen years. With each passing year, that throb of homesickness at the bottom of my heart waxed more chronic.

Meanwhile, I went through college, in slovenly if happy fashion; then I wandered around Europe and loafed in the Orient; at last coming back to New York and landing a job.

BUT always in the hinterland of my brain was the memory of the Old Home Town—the front gardens in the springtime dusk, lush with pink and white June roses and breathing the sweet-bitter tang of syringa; the coasting hill with its muffled throng of boys and the multiple roar of the "double rippers" as they swirled down the steep ice-tracked slope; the Main Street shop windows in Christmas week with their incredibly glorious display of Aladdin riches; the kindly Old Folk; the swarm of boys of my own age with whom I had chummed and fought and played and got into mischief. All that kind of thing.

I wanted to go back. More and more I wanted to. Like many of the things we shiftless mortals most want to do, I put off my return, for one reason or another, until I reached the age of twenty-seven.

Then I had a two-weeks vacation. I resolved to spend every hour of it in the dear old town of Fallfield. I framed, for months, an elaborate program for each glorified day there, and for each portion of each day.

I would arrive on the first morning train. From then until afternoon, I was going to wander, ghostlike, through the undimmed scenes of my boyhood. Next, I was going to hunt up a bunch of fellows who had been my chums (my "rowdy little friends," my mother used to call them, with her mercilessly strict regard for the truth), and we were going to have an epoch-making dinner at the Massaquam House.

It was to be more than a mere dinner. It was to be a golden reunion, possibly a riot. We were going to talk over the glad old times.

The dinner, of course, was to be on me. I had been saving much cash toward it. It was to be one of those laugh-tinctured "Do-you-remember?" reunions.

I had not told anyone I was coming to Fallfield. It was to be a grand surprise. And it was. As you shall see.

THE moment I set foot on the platform I saw something queer had happened to the Fallfield railroad station.

From time to time, in the course of my world wanderings I had compared it favorably with the Gare de Lyons and Paddington and with the Grand Central. But now—

In shape it was as of old. But someone had been careless and left it out in the rain. It had shrunk.

Still, a station, at best, is a thing of minor importance; unless one chances to be too far away from it at train time. So I passed on into the street, and turned my steps toward the palatial Massaquam House.

The same devastating rain which had shrunk the station had done even worse havoc to the size and magnificence of Main Street. I looked forward to the Massaquam House, to restore my shaken sense of proportion.

I REMEMBERED that mighty caravanserai with a certain awe. It had towered to high heaven. It had mile-long white marble corridors with shimmering scarlet velvet carpets running down them. Its lobby had vied with the Taj Mahal in size and architecture.

But in my fifteen-year absence, someone had played a cruel trick on the Massaquam. An evil wizard's wand had changed the superb edifice into a resort for commercial travelers with small expense accounts.

The once-imposing lobby was cramped and dim. From it, to either side, debouched little passageways of near-marble, with strips of frayed and faded red carpet down the middle. All in all, the Massaquam was a caricature seen through the wrong end of an opera glass.

These were the first steps of a disillusion which grew as I tramped through the changed town of my golden memories. Into my dazed brain, as I roamed the new-old highways and byways, seeped a couplet of "The Wanderer's Lament," which I had learned (with three gestures), at Miss Kimball's school on Union Street:

The streets are narrow and the houses mean.
Did I, or Fancy, leave them broad and clean?

Of course the quotation was rankly unfair. Fallfield was, and is, one of America's beautiful little cities. Even at the time of my visit, fine modern hotels already had shamed the ancient Massaquam House, which was soon to be torn down. But the Celestial City itself scarce could have come up to my fifteen-year magnifying of my Old Home Town. (No, nor to your own homesick mind pictures of your Old Home Town, nine tenths of you who read this.) Even my father's former church, on Court Square, was no longer a close rival, in size and grandeur, to St. Peter's in Rome, nor to St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York.

Well, I consoled myself, presently, for the shock of readjusted ideas, by thought of the joy that awaited me in meeting the boys I had known. I proceeded to hunt up the first of these—Buck Olin.

In the outer office of Buck's commission house on Upper Main Street, a stenographer told me Mr. Olin was busy. (It sounded odd to hear that youngster spoken of as "Mister.") The stenographer was correct. Buck was busy. I sent in my card. Then I braced myself to meet his whirlwind rush of welcome. Out came word, by an office boy, that Mr. Olin was in conference, and would I please leave my message?

THIS was going to be one grand joke on good old Buck when he should learn his mistake. I was not going to let him hear the last of it, either. Of course he could not have looked at my card!

I gave the office boy a half-dollar and told him to go back to his boss and say that Bert Terhune was waiting to see him. Also, that I had been waiting fifteen years to see him; and that I was going to bust right in on his "conference" unless he should come out on the jump to greet me.

He came. Buck Olin came. Studying my card. He nodded to me, then civilly he touched my eagerly out-thrust hand.

He Preaches to Deaf-Mutes In the Sign Language

Ernest Christian Sibberson, pastor of a Lutheran church in Topeka, Kansas, learned the deaf-and-dumb sign language, and now holds special services for deaf-mutes in his church. He also preaches sign-language sermons in many different cities and states

ONE Sunday morning in June, three years ago, while the Reverend Ernest Christian Sibberson was talking to his older people's Bible class in the First English Lutheran Church, of Topeka, Kansas, three elderly women walked in the door. They hesitated, glanced at one another, and looked about, as if confused. The pastor went over to them. "Won't you come and sit down?" he invited, with a gesture.

The three women did not speak. Each placed a finger on her lips, then back to her ear. The minister knew nothing of the sign language, but he understood these simple motions, meaning: "I do not speak, or hear."

The pastor was embarrassed. He did not know what to say, or how to say it. "Well, that's too bad!" he finally exclaimed, pronouncing the words with mobile lips, thinking they might understand.

The three visitors smiled. The pastor bowed and pointed to his assembled class. The women nodded. He escorted them to a seat, then again took his place before his class. As he talked, he observed the three silent visitors watching him intently.

When the three women were about to leave, the pastor again approached them. He said: "We are very glad you came today. You must come again." Then one of them took from her purse a pad of paper and a pencil, and wrote, "What's the use? We cannot hear." The pastor wrote his reply: "But we will be glad to have you anyway." The oldest woman wrote: "We can't learn your language, why don't you learn ours?" The minister took the pencil, and scrawled his promise: "I will."

With that vow, the Reverend Mr. Sibberson, after twelve years in the pulpit, began a new career.

That afternoon, the oldest of the three women, Mrs. D. H. Mammough, seventy-two years old, became his tutor in the sign language of the deaf. The Bible was his textbook. The pastor went to her home at two o'clock. By four o'clock, he could recite the Twenty-third Psalm in her language. He studied with her two months, then went to the state school for the deaf at Olathe, where he studied for two weeks. Returning to Topeka, he became the pupil of Mrs. I. M. Croxton, an adept in the sign language. A month later he preached his first sermon to the deaf.

Since then, Mr. Sibberson has preached to more than one thousand five hundred deaf people, in thirty cities, in five states. Many of them never had "heard" a sermon before. Special services for the deaf are held at his church every Sunday afternoon. On Wednesday evenings, he teaches the sign language to a group of deaf-mute children. Two or three days a week he is out of town, conducting special services for deaf-mutes in other cities or rural communities in the state. He has nineteen regular preaching stations in Kansas. Each week he receives letters from churches and other organizations in different states, asking him to come and preach. He is devoting half his time to his pastorate and half of it to his work among the deaf, which he dreams of some day making nation-wide.

The little First English Lutheran Church and its nearby parsonage have been settings for many strange services. Half a dozen wedding ceremonies have been performed in it without a word being spoken. Once there was a double wedding, and neither the brides, bridegrooms, nor the friends who accompanied them, could speak.

Sunday afternoon services for the deaf are not devoid of music, for the deaf-mutes worship in song as well as prayer. There is a choir of twenty persons, a male quartet, a mixed quartet, and there are trios, duets, and several soloists, all deaf and mute. Although there is no audible sound, one unfamiliar with their language and music can easily tell that these deaf-mutes are "singing." The swaying of their bodies in unison, the rhythmic motion of their hands, the changing expressions on their faces, impart an understanding of rhythm and of music. During the hot summer months, when weather permits, union services are held on the steps of the statehouse, in which all churches join. Great crowds attend these services. Those who can speak join with those who cannot in singing the same hymns.

On one of his trips through the southwestern part of the state last winter, Mr. Sibberson met two brothers, both past sixty-five years of age, neither of whom ever had "heard" a sermon. And here, he believes, is the one great disadvantage the deaf-mutes have. Heretofore, only a fortunate few have had anyone to preach to them. Hungry for the word of God, they have been forced to seek it for themselves. Puzzled, they have had no one to help them understand. Whatever other handicaps they may have had, they have largely overcome them; but many have been denied the comfort of religious faith.

Mr. Sibberson translates in five languages, including ancient Hebrew and Greek. He calls the sign language the most nearly perfect of them all. It is more beautiful and more expressive, he says, than any tongue. It is also faster than articulate speech. He can preach a sermon in the sign language in less time than he can deliver it orally. In the sign language there is a sign for almost every concrete term in any language. Prepositions are eliminated, and the article is used only for great emphasis. Abstract terms and proper nouns must be spelled out. The sign system is universal. Nationality and locality are no barriers when two deaf-mutes meet. The American and the German, the Frenchman and the Spaniard, may converse at will, so long as they talk in concrete terms. WILLIAM FORD

This Farmer Does His Errands in His Own Airplane

DID you ever hear of a dirt farmer who keeps an airplane back of his henhouse for the purpose of flying to town and back on Saturdays, and making a little extra money on the side? Clyde E. Shockley, corn grower and hog producer, personally operates a two-hundred-acre farm northwest of Kokomo, Indiana, and as a side line pilots an airplane for pleasure and profit.

Shockley is a typical young farmer of twenty-nine years, born and bred in the country, and he does a full day's work on the farm some three hundred times a year. His "ship," as he calls it, has two purposes—doing the errands that would ordinarily be done in the family flivver and carrying passengers, to pick up a little spare cash. Flying is not a fad or hobby in the Shockley family, but just a regular event in the course of a hard day's work of making a living on a Hoosier farm.

"I've had the flying bug for several years," explained Mr. Shockley, when I asked how he happened to get started in this side line. "When the war broke out, I wanted to join the flying corps. I went down to Scott Field, at Belleville, and started to sign up. But when I wrote the folks about it, they were so worried that I gave in and went to the officers' training camp at Rockford, Illinois. When the Armistice was signed I came back to the farm, but I couldn't get the flying idea out of my head. A couple of years later an aviation squadron of the National Guard was organized at Kokomo. Every Sunday for months I sat along the fence watching the ships soar, and I was particularly interested in the commercial flyers who took up passengers.

"I was working at home then, and didn't get very big wages. But eventually I had enough saved to buy a fifteen-dollar trip, and that clinched my desire to become a pilot. One flight was soon followed by another, and in time I became well acquainted with the officers and joined the Guards. Soon after I had learned to fly, I had an opportunity to buy a plane at a reasonable price, so I borrowed a little money from the farm and started out on my own. I have been flying for five years now and have never 'crashed up.'

"My passengers have varied from fifteen months to ninety years, and a few times I carried Harry Rich, the aërial acrobat."

Although Shockley's first biplane purchase was pretty much of an experiment, the enterprise has since become an important source of revenue. When things are quiet on the farm he does commercial flying, carrying both passengers and freight. He pilots for emergency business trips, distributes handbill advertisements by scattering dodgers from his plane over the cities, does exhibition and straight flying at fairs, makes and sells aërial photographs to firms desiring such work, gives instructions in flying and occasionally sells airplanes on a commission basis. He will transport one person by air at forty cents a mile, or two persons for thirty cents on round trips.

Twenty-nine-year-old Clyde Shockley owns and operates a two-hundred-acre farm near Kokomo, Indiana, flying into town in his own airplane to do his marketing. When there isn't much to do on the farm, he carries passengers and freight, and does exhibition flying at fairs. Mr. Shockley is shown with his wife and two children

The net profit from his ship last year amounted to more than one thousand five hundred dollars. As he says, the ship has helped out the family budget during the past years of lean farming. Last January he sold his first plane and bought a new one.

A few months ago, Clyde leased seventy acres south of Kokomo, and is making it into a commercial flying field. The government aviation station, Fagley Field, is to be moved from Howard County, and this young pilot feels that there will be a real opportunity for a commercial station. Two small buildings have been set up, and the new Shockley Field has been highly complimented by aviation officers. It is now recognized as a part of the Model Airway System for government ships flying between Selfridge Field, at Mount Clemens, Michigan, and Chanute Field, in Illinois. An average of one or two planes land at the Shockley station every day and get gas and oil, and, according to commercial aviation authorities, it is expected to develop into an important aërial unit in the mail and freight service of the United States. The place is cared for by a young assistant while Mr. Shockley is home doing his regular farm work.

But Clyde is primarily and fundamentally a farmer. He has spent practically all of his life on the home place, and he is doing a successful and profitable job of farming it. His system is general, as is his rotation of corn, oats, and clover, with occasional small fields of wheat and soy beans. One year he produced nine thousand bushels of corn, and it is not uncommon for him to raise and fatten 250 head of hogs a year. A few cattle are kept on the place, while last year he sold eighteen head of heifers at a round profit.

Shockley believes in the use of modern, time-saving machinery. In his buildings may be found a tractor, a corn-picker and other up-to-date farm machinery. Poultry plays an important part in the farm income—thanks to the efforts of Mrs. Shockley, he says. His labor is systematically arranged and he operates the two hundred acres with the help of one man hired by the month, and occasional extra help during the rush days.

The two Shockley children play about and in the ship with as much familiarity as the farm youngsters a few years ago used to climb over the old family surrey.

The story is told of how a visitor to the farm was about to 'phone for a taxi and return to Kokomo after a lengthy business call. "Wait a minute," interrupted Mr. Shockley, "I'll take you in as soon as we get this last load of hay into the barn." Ten minutes later Clyde and the visitor walked around behind an old cattle shed, now honored by the name of "hangar." The plane was quickly pulled out from among the empty feeding troughs, and they climbed into the two seats. In five minutes they had soared seven miles and were gliding down to the edge of Kokomo. When later telling of the incident, the visitor complained that he was sorely disappointed. The family did not come out to see them take into the air and no one paid any attention to their landing. It was just Farmer Shockley coming to town.

She Has Commanded River Boats for Twenty-Nine Years

THE watch is being changed. A stalwart, graying veteran in the pilot house of the big river boat relinquishes the steering wheel to a woman who has just entered. The woman is Captain Mary Becker Greene, master and pilot, the only woman to hold a master's certificate on the Western river system. The helmsman she has just relieved is Captain Gordon C. Greene, her husband and general manager of the Greene Line of river packets. The boat is the steamer "Tom Greene," out of Cincinnati, and Charleston bound, and has just made a landing on the Ohio River.

Captain Mary Becker Greene is rounding out her thirty-fifth year of steamboating on the Ohio River and its tributaries, and her twenty-ninth year as a master of steam craft. The steamer "Greenwood," of the Greene Line, which was recently rammed and sunk in the Cincinnati harbor, was her first command. At various times she has captained nearly all the boats of the line. She is the wife of a man who has been conspicuous for his success in river traffic and steamboat navigation since his early youth.

Captain Gordon C. Greene and Miss Mary Becker were married at Marietta, Ohio, in 1890. Since Captain's Greene's business kept him continually aboard boats, it was not long before they were making their home more on the boat of which her husband was in command than at their home on land. The young officer stood his watch at the wheel. His wife took a deep interest in the river and its navigation. As a result of the long hours of companionship in the pilot house, she began learning the tortuous channel, the shoals, and bars, the obstructions hidden from the untrained eye, and the numberless things a pilot must know to steer a boat safely where the channel is narrow and treacherous.

She took turns steering under her husband's direction until she became a skillful pilot. Mrs. Greene not only learned to steer in both fair weather and foul, but she also learned enough about the general operations of steamboats to make her a competent officer. In 1895, she appeared before the local steamboat inspectors at the port of Pittsburgh, and was given an examination in river navigation. She passed it with credit, and received a license certificate to pilot steam vessels. One year later, she again appeared before the board, and this time got a master's certificate. It must be considered that at that stage of the development of river craft, steam-steering apparatus had not been installed, and strength was nearly as important as skill in maneuvering a boat.

Captain Mary Becker Greene, master and pilot, has been steamboating on the Western river system for thirty-five years. She is shown with her husband, manager of a line of river boats. One of their two sons is a captain, the other a mate

Mrs. Greene helped to plan a part of the design for the steamer "Greenland," a handsome sidewheeler which was built and launched at Marietta, in 1903. It was this same boat that she commanded the following year, making several trips from points on the upper Ohio to the World's Fair, at St. Louis, carrying freight and visitors to the fair.

In a life filled with romance and adventure, some notable experiences stand out in Mrs. Greene's career, proving, in addition to her industry and business ability, extreme courage and resourcefulness. Soon after the "Greenland" was placed in commission and was plying the Ohio and Kanawha rivers between the ports of Marietta and Charleston, when near the junction of the two streams on the Kanawha the boat collided with a floating theatre during a storm. Mrs. Greene's coolness and skillful command of the situation averted a panic. From the bridge of the "Greenland" she directed the maneuvers of her own craft, meanwhile shouting orders to the floating theatre which brought orderly action out of chaos, and prevented some of the frightened people from leaping into the river.

Mrs. Greene is of average height or less, dark, and with features inclined to the rugged. Her appearance is commanding and her manner gracious. Her voice is soft and well modulated. She spends as much time on the river as in the handsome Greene home, at 3534 Shaw Avenue, Hyde Park, Cincinnati. The Greenes have homelike and commodious quarters on the steamer "Tom Greene" and live together there much of their time. Their youngest son, Tom, second mate of the steamer which bears his name, is now twenty-one years old. He was born on the steamer "Greenland" and reared on the river.

While at present Mrs. Greene does not have a regular command, she is available in the absence or illness of her husband, and will be ready to take charge of a new steamer if Mate Tom has not secured his master's certificate by that time. The other son, Chris Greene, twenty-four years old, is master of a fine steel steamer which bears his name.

Mrs. Greene shines as hostess aboard her boat; her gracious and charming manner makes the passengers feel at home, and she never fails to look after their comfort, or for their entertainment, for from her reading and study she knows the history of every settlement along the river back to Revolutionary times.

Mrs. Greene was admitted to Harbor Twenty-five, Masters and Pilots Association, at the port of Pittsburgh in 1896, and was for many years chaplain of the association. She is a member and worker in the Knox Presbyterian Church, at Cincinnati.

They Call Henry Field the Most Neighborly Man in Iowa

ONE of the best-known men in Iowa is Henry Field, owner and announcer of KFNF, the "friendly farmer station," at Shenandoah, a town of about five thousand people.

Incidentally, Mr. Field is the head of a family of eleven children and president of a large mail-order seed house. His business is capitalized at half a million dollars, and he keeps more than four hundred employees busy the year 'round. Because he saw in broadcasting a chance to get acquainted with more people, about four years ago Henry Field installed a radio station in his seed house.

"It comes sort of natural to be neighborly over the radio," he said. "For years, I had been sending to my customers pictures of my family in my catalogue, 'Seed Sense.' In the same way, I sent them friendly letters about how to raise better crops and prettier flowers. I saw that the radio would give me a chance to talk direct to these folks, and to any others who wanted to 'tune in'."

A tryout of his idea over an Omaha station preceded Mr. Field's decision to install a station at the seed house. A lot of people, he thought, would like to hear "old-time fiddling" and family music and hymns, such as used to be heard around the parlor organ. He arranged such a program. Congratulations on the program made the responses on regular programs look like the proverbial drop in the bucket. Henry Field decided to build his station.

"We are just a friendly, neighborly bunch of everyday folks," he tells his visitors as he sits at his desk, or meets them out in the seed house. "The broadcasting plant is owned and operated by the seed company; but it is used for the general good of Shenandoah and southwestern Iowa."

The truth of this statement is shown by the variety, community interest, and general usefulness of his programs. For instance, in an "old fiddlers' contest" one night, there may be entries from Iowa, Missouri, Nebraska, and other nearby states. Maybe the home folks aren't interested in the outcome!

The next night, the retail merchants of Shenandoah may put on a program of local talent, or perhaps a "marrying parson" comes down from a neighboring city and talks. Still another program will feature a family orchestra from Nebraska, a Scotch trio from Omaha, a college chorus from a Missouri college, or the National Pullman Porters' quartet. Again, you may hear a program prepared by the employees of the Henry Field company, a talk on the next Sunday-school lesson, a community hymn singing, a pipe-organ recital, or a talk on gardening or cooking. In short, anything that might prove of interest to Henry Field's corn-belt neighbors can be heard over KFNF.

Requests to broadcast messages of interest in the district always get attention at KFNF. During the evening on which I was a guest at the Field station, a man came in and said that his horse had strayed away from home. Immediately, a call went out over the air to help locate the animal. The same evening, several local entertainments were announced. Not long ago, a Montana youngster wrote Henry that his pup had been run over by a car. The message went out, and now the lad has an Iowa pup.

Be it news of a criminal who may be caught through broadcast descriptions, an announcement of a community picnic, a play-by-play report of a nearby college football game, or how to make many blades of grass grow where none grew before, Henry broadcasts it if he thinks the item is of interest to his neighbors.

Hearing Henry talk of gardening or farming over the radio is just like meeting him out in the corn field. You can almost see him leaning on his hoe as he talks to you. City listeners tune in and write that it is just like going back home for a visit. Applause messages often carry gardening or flower questions and orders for seeds.

Field's customers are his friends. His station is at their disposal, and so is Henry. Twenty thousand neighbors cranked up the family flivver during August and went down to see the "voice" of KFNF. Shortly after Mrs. Field's death, listeners had a pipe organ installed at the station as a memorial to her. In response to a recent anniversary program, Henry Field received more than two hundred and twenty-five thousand messages of congratulation.

Henry Field, veteran seedsman of Shenandoah, Iowa, in his office, which is also the official home of station KFNF. Mr. Field installed his radio four years ago for the use of his neighbors and himself. In response to a recent anniversary program, he received more than 225,000 messages of congratulation. Henry Field started his career as a seedsman when he was five years old. He is now fifty-four, and his business is capitalized at half a million dollars

When I asked Mr. Field how his employees can take time to be friendly with so many visitors, he said simply, "Awful busy sometimes, but never too busy to see our friends. I have two million friends and neighbors on my mailing list," he added, "and I want to keep 'em. In the cities, people seem to do business as coldly as possible, and then duck away. Here is one place where business isn't going to be done that way."

It was a neighbor's helping hand that started Henry Field in the seed business.

"My ambition to become a seedsman began when I was about five years old," he told me. "At that time my dearest possession was an old seed catalogue published by James Vick, the father of the mail-order seed industry. I can remember begging my mother to read its pages aloud to me. Indeed, I insisted that my mother write to Mr. Vick and tell him that I had decided to follow in his footsteps.

"In reply, the dear old gentleman wrote me a personal letter, which I carried around until I wore it out. All that summer I saved seed from everything in Mother's garden. But, to my intense disappointment, when fall came I could not find anybody who would buy my wares.

"Finally, out of the goodness of her kind old heart, Aunt Martha Long, an elderly neighbor, gave me an order for fifty cents' worth of flower seeds. I worked several days making the envelopes in which to enclose the seeds. Aunt Martha lived to see me well established in the business, and she was a good customer to the day of her death."

At eight years of age, young Henry was walking two miles to town to sell his garden stuff. At fifteen, he was learning the retail seed business in Des Moines, Iowa, and at twenty-one he was married, doing market gardening for himself, and putting up seeds to sell to neighbors.

"I had to turn the front room of our little four-room home into an office and the barn into a seed house," he smiled. "I made it a point to sell good, dependable seeds at a reasonable price," he went on, "and I always tried in every possible way to help my customers to make them grow."

The soundness of Henry Field's business principles is proved by the rapid growth of his seed company. Last year, his firm paid out more than $120,000 for postage alone.

C. M. McMILLEN

Mrs. Andrew is President of a Big Anvil Factory

SHE is down in the city directory of Trenton, New Jersey, as Mrs. Harriet Fisher Andrew. But in the Eagle Anvil Works of that city she is "the boss," to everyone from the superintendent down to the youngest apprentice.

For twenty-five years, Mrs. Andrew has enjoyed the distinction of being, so far as she knows, the only woman anvil manufacturer in the United States. Under her direction, the company of which she is president has grown to be one of the largest producers of vises and anvils in the country.

And, to add still a third distinction, she is a member of the American Manufacturers' Association.

All of which sounds very fine and rosy. But just sit down and talk to Mrs. Andrew for ten minutes, and you will realize that all these good things weren't handed to her on a silver platter. She earned them for herself.

She admits quite frankly that of all the titles which she has achieved, it's just plain "boss" that she likes best.

"Perhaps that is because I had such a hard time proving that I really was the boss," she explained to me. "You see, in the beginning the whole trouble started because the men in the factory objected to what they called 'petticoat rule.'

"When my husband, Captain Clark Fisher, died, many years ago, he left me his anvil factory in Trenton. What I knew about business could have been put into a thimble. My early training had been in polite finishing schools, where I studied music and learned how to do fancywork.

"But, despite my ignorance of the business world, I gathered up my courage and assumed the presidency of the company. And right then my troubles began. The first morning I went down to the office, the foreman and the superintendent, both of whom had been in the organization for thirty years, quit flat. A number of the workers immediately followed suit. They all declared that they were not going to work under a woman.

"Then and there, I realized that if I was really going to be boss in my own factory, I would have to learn the anvil business from the ground up. I started in at the very bottom, in the forge room. And for a year, the only time I saw a white-collar job was when I went up to the office once a week to sign the pay roll checks.

"I chiseled anvils, molded rail joints, operated huge cranes, and molded vises. What's more, I never once asked 'how' of any man in the factory. In short, I used my eyes and ears instead of my tongue.

"The men did everything in their power to get rid of me. They even tried to scare me out. One day when I was in the forge room, I heard a great commotion, and looked up to see the men making for the exits as fast as they could, while hot, molten metal flooded over the floor.

"Quick as anything, I had a flash of intuition, and I knew that it wasn't an accident that had spilled that hot steel on the floor. The whole thing was done deliberately—for my benefit.

"I jumped up on a chair and yelled with all my might at the men choking the exits, 'The first one of you that leaves this room, leaves for good! If you want to stay, get your shovels and go to work on this metal.'

"In five minutes, they had the leak plugged with sand and clay, and the metal which had escaped was covered until it hardened sufficiently to be handled. After that, they gave up trying to scare me out.

"At the end of a year, I could take crude metal and shape it into an anvil just as well as any man in the factory. About this time, the men began to realize that I meant to see the thing through."

Upon the death of her husband, twenty-five years ago, Mrs. Harriet Fisher, of Trenton, New Jersey, became president of the anvil factory of which he had been head. Under her management, the plant has become one of the biggest of its kind in the United States. About twelve years ago, Mrs. Fisher married Lieutenant S. A. Andrew, now associated with her in business

Inside of four years after Mrs. Andrew assumed control, the business grew so prosperous that the floor space of the factory had to be doubled. When word went out that the Government was calling for bids on the contract to furnish anvils for construction work on the Panama Canal, every anvil manufacturer in the country went after the job. They were all pretty much chagrined, therefore, when a woman won the coveted contract against men who had been in the business three times as long as she had.

In 1912, while negotiating with the Argentine Navy on an anvil contract, she met Lieutenant Silvano Alfredo Andrew. Subsequently they were married, and he has since that time been associated with her in the business.

In pre-prohibition days, when most of Saturday's pay was spent in the saloons, Mrs. Andrew instituted a change which forever gained her the friendship of the families of her employees. She moved the pay day from Saturday to Tuesday and thus lessened the temptation to spend money on holiday sprees. At first, the workers themselves did not in every case approve the idea as heartily as did their wives. But gradually the men themselves came to see the wisdom of Mrs. Andrew's way.

The workers now consult Mrs. Andrew on every subject, from the price of steel to the training of their children. They bring their domestic troubles and their financial difficulties to her.

Every hot delicious plateful contains fifteen tempting vegetables !

SOUP

and success

"SUCCESS is largely a matter of habit," wrote a very successful man. Just as truly he might have said that health is largely a matter of habit. For success, socially or in business life, goes hand in hand with health.

Science is teaching us as never before that good health depends mostly on a few simple fundamental rules, certain to bring the wished-for results, if only—and this is the all-important fact—if only these simple rules are followed habitually from day to day. Sleep, exercise, the open air, the right kind of food!

Eating soup and keeping well go hand in hand. Soup is one of the foods the experts tell us should be eaten every day. Soup appears in the daily menus for the family table as recommended by the leading dietitians and teachers of domestic science. Soup is a hot, liquid food which has a special place and usefulness in the daily diet, well recognized by the authorities. So do not think of soup as simply a delicious dish to be served or omitted as your fancy pleases. For soup belongs in the daily diet and should be eaten regularly, not just occasionally.

AND HERE are the reasons: Soup offers to your appetite a variety of tempting and delightful flavors you cannot get in any other food. Soup stimulates the appetite, arouses the desire for food, not only satisfies you but makes you keen for your other food as well. Soup causes the digestive juices to flow more freely. This has a favorable effect both on appetite and digestion. The food is assimilated into the body tissues more thoroughly.

Let this be one of your daily habits that go so far toward the building of health and success. Let no day go by without its plateful of hot, nourishing, delicious soup. You will enjoy it so much and it will do you so much good. So easy and convenient, too, with all the charming soups to choose from at your store! 12 cents a can.

on earth Mother kept me in good schools on what she made in those early days is still one of the unsolved mysteries to me.

"By the time I was fifteen, I was a pupil in an exclusive, fashionable boarding-school just outside of New York. During my second year there, I suddenly decided that I wanted to get out into the world. My secret ambition at this time was to be a fashion sketcher. As I had no technical training, I made up my mind to enter Pratt Institute, in Brooklyn, where I could acquire the necessary foundation.

I studied at Pratt two years, and got along splendidly in everything except drawing! It was a great blow to my pride when I failed to pass the examination in this subject. However, I'm glad enough to-day that I did fail. Otherwise, I might now be sketching for other houses instead of being a business woman on my own account.

"I now decided to leave school and go to work. My decision almost broke my mother's heart, but when she saw that returning to school would make me actually unhappy she gave in. With my recent humiliating experience fresh in my mind, I realized that it was not so much a question of what I wanted to do as it was a question of what I was equipped to do.

"One lovely spring morning, I was walking down Fifth Avenue trying to decide just what sort of job I dare apply for. But I found that I couldn't do much consecutive thinking for looking at the hats encountered—most of them were so obviously chosen without any consideration of the relation between the hat and the wearer. Before I realized what had happened, I was back at my old game of making 'let's pretend' hats that would really belong to the people who wore them.

"I pictured all sorts of hats for all sorts of faces. I dreamed hats that would throw tired lines into deep shadow. I visualized hats that would send the light just where it ought to go, on a mouth or a lurking dimple. And then, quite suddenly, I knew that I ached to make hats, in the same way that some people ache to make music, or to dance.

"THE very next day, I started out to look for a job as saleswoman in a good millinery shop. I picked an exclusive place just off the right side of Fifth Avenue for my apprenticeship. It was owned and run by the one man in New York from whom I thought I could learn most about the retail millinery business. I realized that, in addition to his exquisite taste, he had genuine creative imagination. A job in his shop seemed to me the logical first step in the realization of my dream.

"After walking up and down in front of the place for fifteen minutes, I finally mustered up my courage and went in. 'I believe,' I said boldly to the proprietor, 'that I could sell more hats for you than any girl you now have. And I believe that all the people to whom I sell will come back for more.' He looked me up and down. 'All right,' he said briefly, 'come back two weeks from to-day and we'll see what you can do.'

"I went out treading on air and hardly daring to believe my marvelous luck. It had all been so incredibly easy!"

BUT when Peggy Hoyt went back at the end of two weeks, she was told that the only place open was a job in the workroom. She swallowed her disappointment and took it. But as she struggled with stiff buckram frames in the hot, cluttered loft, she thought longingly of the salesrooms, with their soft rugs, beautiful hangings, and rose-shaded lamps. And she thought, too, of the customers on whose heads she wanted to place just the right hats.

"For over a year," said Miss Hoyt, "I worked in that loft. One season I stitched oilskin hats on a machine every day from nine to six. It was harder work than bending over a washtub. My hands were never clean and my nails were always broken. But I stuck. By this time I realized that I had been lucky to get the job I hadn't wanted. The man for whom I worked knew his business, and I was learning to make hats. That was what counted!

"My wages at this time were seven dollars a week. However, before I had been on the job two months, I was reduced to six dollars, in the hope that the cut would make me quit. This is what had happened:

"One night I carried home some hats to finish. The next morning, as I was coming in with a big box full, I ran into the manager, who asked me what I had been doing with the hats. When I told him, with a frankness more honest than wise, that I sometimes took work home at night because I wanted to learn the trade so that I could later go into business for myself, his pleased expression underwent a lightning change. The following Saturday night, my envelope contained one dollar less than usual, and I was curtly forbidden to take home work.

"But I knew what I wanted and I wouldn't quit.

"Toward the end of the year, I was unexpectedly called to the sales-rooms to help out in an emergency. I took off my apron and obeyed the summons with a fast-beating heart. When I entered the attractive place with its velvet rugs, its gleaming mirrors, its pretty sales girls in their unobtrusively smart costumes, and, best of all, its charmingly gowned, well-groomed customers, I made up my mind to stay there for the rest of my apprenticeship. It was child's play for me to sell hats, for I knew when I had found the right hat for a customer. Before the day was over I had decided to open my own shop.

"I had now mastered the technique of construction. The chic part of millinery—that is, the artful placing of a bow or ornament, or the effective tilting of a brim—I never had to learn. It was instinctive with me. When I discovered that it was easy to sell hats, I thought that the time had come for me to go into business for myself. With the optimism—and the ignorance—of youth, I could see no obstacles ahead that looked formidable enough to discourage me.

"Naturally, I hadn't saved much out of the money I had been making. However, Mother, still disapproving but always a good sport, said she would lend me three hundred dollars. And although she was greatly upset by the heavy debts I was making, she agreed to start me with a few wholesale millinery firms by acting as my reference for credit.

"The first thing I did was to rent a little cubbyhole of a room 'way up in a good building on Fifth Avenue. I held out for Fifth Avenue, because, at that time, the kind of hats I wanted to make would be bought by the kind of women who shopped almost exclusively on the Avenue. To-day, for a similar reason, my shop is located on a smart side street in the East Fifties. The people who are interested in my wares now hunt mostly for their treasures in the small exclusive specialty shops rather than in the larger department stores.

"In any business, especially one in which something is sold, location is a factor of prime importance. It would be folly to open a shop like mine in a district where people want to buy five-dollar or even ten-dollar hats. There are hundreds of places in New York where hats selling at these prices would 'go,' but upper Fifth Avenue is not one of them.

"EVEN with the tremendous advantage of the right location, plus my boundless enthusiasm, I wonder if I could have made the grade that first year if it hadn't been for the friendship of a fashionable tailor across the street. He was a successful man, and he numbered among his clients some of the wealthiest people in the city.

"For several years, while we lived in Brooklyn, he had been our neighbor, and he had always shown the liveliest interest in what he was pleased to call my 'artistic bent.' I remember that when I was twelve years old, he gave me an order for a dozen place cards. And when they were done, he not only praised my work highly, but he also paid me handsomely. That was the first money I ever earned.

"When I told him that I had decided to open my own shop, he encouraged me in every possible way. Day after day he sent me customers. The wives of his clients often came with their husbands to his shop. And every time they did, he would insist that they must run across to my little cubbyhole and try on my hats. He told everybody that some day I would be the most distinguished milliner and dressmaker in America. If a woman appeared the least bit backward about taking advantage of this 'tip,' he would take her by the elbow and personally conduct her to my tiny shop, where he frequently remained to see that she made a purchase.

"Of course I could not have kept the customers he sent me if I hadn't been able to design and make hats that pleased them. It is a great satisfaction to me that I still have practically all the clients who first came to me at my little Fifth Avenue shop. I have rarely lost a customer, and never a valuable employee.

"In the beginning, every woman who walked into my tiny shop was a challenge. I studied her build, her hair, her complexion, her eyes, and even her expression. And I did my best to make a hat that would belong, yet which would not look too different.

"The majority of women, even those who are conspicuously well dressed, do not want too much originality in their hats and gowns. They want clothes such as those worn by other smart women, particularly those worn by women a bit smarter, wealthier, and more beautiful than they.

"As a matter of fact, women are so sophisticated about clothes nowadays that designers no longer create styles in the same sense that they did even fifteen years ago. The world is on wheels; at least one woman in every small town in America has been to New York, to London, or to Paris. As a consequence, she knows what smart women are wearing. And it is the women of fashion who themselves set the styles. The most dictatorial designer in the world can only take the silhouette of their choice and individualize it. The dressmaker who gives to the prevailing mode a little lovelier treatment than her competitors succeed in doing is the one who achieves popular favor.

"I WAS quick to realize that, before I could be known as a creator of fashions in hats, I would have to number among my clients a sprinkling of women who were recognized leaders in smart dress. That is why I early made an effort to include on my list of regular patrons a few outstanding women in New York society, and several popu'ar actresses noted for their perfect taste in dress.

"One actress whose name now blazes in brilliant electric lights on Broadway was struggling along in a 'bit' in a musical comedy wholly unsuited to her wistful charm when I first saw her ten years ago. I believed in her. I believed she could act, and I knew she had the personality to 'carry' clothes, if only she had the right sort of clothes. I went to her and offered to give her all her hats and gowns if she would let me make them in accordance with my ideas of what was becoming to her. She agreed. It may be vanity on my part, but I honestly believe that the success which began to come to her almost immediately was largely due to the fact that the clothes I made for her revealed her true possibilities.

"In my first little shop on Fifth Avenue, I had no help, not even an errand girl. Mornings, I rushed out and bought materials, always returning breathless with anxiety for fear that a customer had chanced to drop in during my absence. There would be days at a stretch when I wouldn't get a single order. Then there would come a hectic day when I would be swamped with a dozen rush orders. That meant that, night after night, I would have to sit up until two or three o'clock in the morning making the hats I had contracted to deliver at a certain time."

YOU would think at this stage of the game, when her business was constantly trembling on the brink of failure, that Miss Hoyt would not have dared refuse a commission for a hat. But she did, many times over.

"I never promised what I could not see my way clear to perform," she said. "If I named a day upon which a hat would be delivered, it was delivered on that day. I have never deviated from this policy, and it has come to be one of my important business assets. I will tell you why.

"In the first place, it has helped me to hold old customers and it has brought me many new ones. Suppose two women are discussing hats for a coming event. One of them says doubtfully, 'Well, Madame X swore she would have my hat ready, but of course you never can tell,' and the other one replies with confidence, 'I know I'll get mine on time. Miss Hoyt said I should have it, and she always keeps her word.' And, naturally, if my hat appears at the event and the other milliner's does not, I stand a mighty good chance of filling the disappointed woman's order for the next time.

"If for some reason not under my control, such as the failure of a wholesale house to supply promised materials, a hat or gown cannot be delivered at the hour promised, I immediately telephone or telegraph my client, explaining the situation, and offering to release her from her order.

"Keeping my word about deliveries has made it possible for me to establish a system which goes a long way toward insuring prompt payment of bills—something which has always been regarded as practically impossible in the millinery and dressmaking business. If I keep my word, a customer feels guilty about not keeping hers. If I fail to live up to my end of the contract, she could salve her conscience much more readily. 'That milliner kept me waiting for my hat,' she can say; 'I'll just let her wait a while for her money.' And when you come to think of it, that's pretty fair logic!

"However, if I had to name the principal reason why I was able to keep my head above water, while all about me other young milliners, equally as ambitious and hard-working, went under, I would quote another iron-clad rule to which I pinned my faith from the beginning. It is this: Never, if I can possibly help it, do I allow a woman to buy an unbecoming hat in my shop.

"Sometimes this is a delicate matter, as a customer not infrequently sets her heart upon a hat which I cannot 'see' for her. But I know that if I don't tell her the truth every frank friend she meets will do it for me. And then I have not only lost a customer, but I have also made an unfavorable impression upon a dozen women who might have become customers.

"The short-sighted policy of urging upon a customer something he doesn't want or need is what puts many a business in the hands of receivers. Even when I didn't have the money to meet my bills for materials, I stuck to my rule. And in order to encourage my saleswomen to do the same, I refuse to allow them commissions on sales. I make up for this by paying them proportionately higher salaries.

"But I'm getting ahead of my story.

"At the end of a year, I took a larger room in the same building in which I had started. I also hired an assistant, a bright young girl, whom I began to train in my own methods. She is with me today as one of my valued forewomen.

At the end of the third year, I had completely outgrown my new quarters, and I was ready to move again.

"It was at this point that I came to the conclusion that fashionable folk were doing more and more of their shopping on the side streets just off Fifth Avenue. I took the house which I still occupy, a beautiful old private residence in the East Fifties. I fitted up the ground floor as a reception-room and exhibition salon, where my models are shown, a few at a time. The fitting-rooms are on the same floor. The millinery is on the second floor and above are the workrooms and a lunch-room for my girls. Recently, I have taken a part of another house in the neighborhood to provide additional workrooms.

"When I moved into my new home, I had space and facilities with which to realize another dream that had been lurking around in my subconscious almost since the day that I started making hats. This was to design whole costumes. But let me finish talking about hats before I get off on my dresses.

"BUYING a hat is a highly individual business," declared Miss Hoyt; "but there are certain general principles which it is well to keep in mind. A woman with a long, thin face must avoid with equal care a very wide brim and a hat that is brimless. But, above all things, she must steer clear of a high crown, no matter how fashionable it is. A softly draped crown, perhaps a little higher on one side than the other, and a medium-sized brim with irregular lines is nearly always best for this type of face.

"The woman with a generous figure and a head that is inclined to be small should choose a fairly wide brim, if she is to keep her head from looking insignificant. In general all stout women would do well to wear hats with some brim. The same is true of a small woman if she has a large face. Only the girl or woman with regular features and a classic profile can get away with the challenging severity of the sailor type of hat. The nearly brimless hats are usually at their best when they frame young faces with dainty features. Do not forget that your turban is a sophisticated piece of headgear. But, no matter how sophisticated she is, a woman with prominent features should never attempt this style of hat.

"The best piece of hat advice that I can give you is this: Find your hat and stick to it! In my business, I must average a new hat every other week. At present, I own perhaps a dozen that are wearable. And yet, as a matter of fact, I have worn the same hat for the past seven years. Of course, from year to year, and even from hat to hat, there are variations in color, tilt, and trimming, but fundamentally the lines of the hat remain the same.

"Nowadays, it is not how much, but how little, you can get on a hat. Line is the thing. In the street hat and in the business hat trimness is absolutely essential. Even dress hats are usually very simple, depending upon color and curve for their effect. Often a single artfully placed flower or ornament is the only trimming on the hat reserved for the most elaborate occasions.

"Ten years ago, the wealthy woman bought forty or fifty hats a year, ordering them in lots of a dozen, as one orders handkerchiefs. This wholesale sort of shopping is a thing of the past. Even the woman of great wealth who is a leader in smart dress now purchases only a few hats at a time. But she shops for them at much shorter intervals. This is because the fashion designers now recognize six distinct seasons in clothes.

"In addition to our old familiar standbys, spring, summer, fall, and winter, we now have midwinter and midsummer styles. The woman who goes to Florida in January and to Switzerland in August must have at the same time both summer and winter clothes in her wardrobe. This explains why one sees in smart shop windows woolly coats when the thermometer is ninety-nine in the shade, and flower-trimmed hats and sheer organdies when icicles are dripping from the eaves.

"MOST women still buy too many dresses," said Miss Hoyt. "This is almost as true of the woman with a moderate dress allowance as it is of the woman with an unlimited checking account at her disposal. We are constantly recommending to our clients that they concentrate on a few carefully-thought-out costumes at the time. Three wisely chosen frocks a year are better than a dozen bought because they happen to appeal to the eye of the shopper, or because they strike her as 'bargains.' Nothing, no matter how cheap, is a bargain unless it fits in with your particular wardrobe scheme, or fills some special need.

"One of my friends recently came home from a shopping orgy, proudly proclaiming that she had bought a hundred-dollar dress for twenty-five dollars. In the end, that 'bargain' cost her more than the original price of the frock.

"To begin with, the dress was an unusual shade of green which required a new hat in exactly the same tone. New gloves and handbag followed, because her old accessories were a gray that did not 'go' with this particular shade of green. A few days later, my friend ran into a spring coat which she thought would be heavenly with her new green frock. She couldn't resist the temptation to buy it. And now, having gone into green, she can't get out of it!

"One of the biggest mistakes that the average woman makes is to start a season's shopping without a definite color scheme in mind. The smartly-turned-out woman, whether she pays two hundred or two thousand for her wardrobe, always gives an ensemble effect. She does this by confining herself to one or two tones of the same color, or to two harmonizing colors.

"If you will look closely at the most effectively dressed woman in any gathering, nine times out of ten you will find that, from hat to shoes, she has stuck to the two-tone effect. If a third shade or contrasting color is used, it is simply a touch for emphasis. Often this emphatic note is a flower, a colored stone in a pin, or a string of beads. Several colors in combination tend to break up the lines

Beard Softening Explained

"Small-Bubble" lather the secret . . . softens base of every hair. Stubborn whiskers come off easily and quickly

THE success of Colgate's Rapid-Shave Cream lather is due to the smallness of its bubbles. The smaller the bubbles, the more water and less air they contain, as the lather-pictures below prove. And science asserts that it is the water in the lather that is the real beard-softener.

How Colgate Lather works: The moment Colgate lather forms on your beard, two things happen:

1. The soap in the lather breaks up and floats away the oil film that covers each hair.

2. With the oil film gone, millions of tiny, water-saturated bubbles bring and hold an abundance of water down to the base of the beard, right where the razor does its work.

Because your beard is properly softened at its base, your razor works easily and quickly. Every hair is cut close and clean. And your face remains cool and comfortable throughout the day.

ORDINARY LATHER
This lather-picture (greatly magnified) of ordinary shaving cream shows how large air-filled bubbles fail to get down to the base of the beard; and how they hold air, instead of water, against the whiskers.

COLGATE LATHER
This picture of Colgate lather shows how myriads of tiny moisture-laden bubbles hold water, in direct contact with the base of the beard, thus softening every whisker right where the razor works.

A Week's Better Shaves—FREE

Once you try this unique "small-bubble" lather, we believe you will never go back to ordinary shaving methods. Prove this for yourself—at our expense. Clip the coupon. We will send you a generous trial-size tube—free.

SOFTENS THE BEARD AT THE BASE

and to destroy whatever individuality of coloring a woman may possess in her own right.

"In building a correct and useful wardrobe, the wise woman starts with her shoes and accessories, such as hand bag, gloves, and hose. These should be of the same color, or in harmonizing shades of the same color. I find beige and gray especially good foundation colors. Even if one does not stick to the two-tone ensemble, it is possible to choose hats, frocks, and wraps of several colors which will harmonize or contrast effectively with either beige or gray.

"IN CHOOSING a color for a dress or hat, you must first analyze your own coloring as expressed in your hair, eyes, and skin. The object is to decide on a shade which will emphasize your good points and minimize your poor ones. Most people find it wise to 'dress to their eyes;' but there are some whose chief claim to beauty or distinction lies in their perfect skin, or striking hair.

"In general, fair women with high coloring should avoid reds, rose, fuchsia, orange, and all pinks except the very delicate shades. These colors tend to cheapen a blonde; but, on the other hand, blues and grays and certain shades of beige and green lend her distinction. However, if a blonde has a tendency to look 'washed-out,' she will have to stick principally to blues and to pastels.

"There are certain types of brunettes who look lovely in warm browns with a touch of henna or orange; but usually it is the woman with rather neutral coloring who can wear the rich, warm shades to advantage. But look carefully to your skin before you go in for muddy browns, taupe, purples, and some of the darker, harsher grays. Unwisely chosen, these colors can add ten years to a woman's apparent age.

"Contrary to popular opinion, black is not a safe color refuge for those of advancing years. As a matter of fact, only the comparatively young can stand the severe challenge of black, and then only when they have flawless skin and good coloring. As a rule, the older woman looks much better in colors. If she is fortunate enough to have that lovely white hair with a blue glint in it, she can wear combinations of gray and blue and gray and rose that are marvelously flattering. One of the most stunningly beautiful women in New York is a dowager of sixty-odd who dresses to her wonderful white hair.

"Here is another good tip: Unless you are decidedly the type for it—and that usually means a raving beauty—don't go in for 'picture' effects in dress. Nothing is more likely to call attention to weak points. The whole object of dress is to make an unobtrusive background against which your own personality has a chance to appear at its best. And remember this: A really good dress cut along distinctive but conservative lines never goes out of style. Like your hair, or your eyes, it is a part of you.

"One of my most valued clients, a wealthy and very chic young matron who appears at all the important functions in the world of society, was seen at a smart restaurant the other night in a dancing frock I made for her three years ago. She told me that she intends to wear that dress

"Can a DENTIFRICE Only CLEAN?"

. . women ask . . and then, when they learn that Colgate's quickly brings dazzling white teeth, a healthy mouth, because it is designed only to clean, they—

AT first people are inclined to express their surprise when we say that Colgate's is designed solely to clean teeth.

"What curative properties has it?" they sometimes ask.

And then they hear from their dentist that the only thing any dentifrice can do is to clean; that charm of smile, brilliant whiteness of teeth, sweet health of mouth and gums, come only when teeth and mouth have been made scrupulously clean.

Finally, they realize why Colgate's works towards a permanent and fascinating dental beauty at each brushing . . . because its single purpose is to bring an unequaled cleanness.

Colgate's even smells clean as it expands into a bubbling, sparkling foam in your mouth. In this remarkable foam is calcium carbonate—a finely ground powder that delicately scrubs, whitens, polishes each tooth, removing harmful foreign matter, bits of clinging food.

Then, through a detergent-washing agent, this foam bathes in washing waves the entire inner mouth. Simple, isn't it? The causes of decay are first swept free—then washed away.

That is why Colgate's is designed only to clean. And why the ordinary tooth paste that pays half-hearted attention to cleaning—and tries to cure an imaginary gum trouble or tooth disorder—can never achieve the Colgate goal of complete cleanness.

until it drops to pieces, because it is so emphatically hers.

"It may interest you to know that a Paris label no longer has a hypnotic effect upon American women. They no longer buy French dresses simply because they are French. The modern American woman buys what she wants where she finds it, no matter whether it is in Timbuktu, or in Paris. And usually for the street she wants something along sports lines. Three fourths of all the daytime clothes shown everywhere show the influence of woman's interest in outdoor life.

"Nowadays, a woman wants to look slim and straight, because these are the lines of youth. In her effort to achieve the youthful silhouette, she sometimes becomes a trifle too masculine in effect. On the other hand, while a man also likes the slim, simple lines, he demands the feminine touch on a frock.

"Which reminds me to tell you that I long ago came to the conclusion that men are the best judges of what looks well on a woman. A woman frequently gets lost in details; a man nearly always gets the general effect. In working out a new dress, I am guided almost entirely by my husband's reaction to the finished garment.

"AND while we are on the subject of dress, let me suggest that velvet is not good form before luncheon. It is a bad choice for the woman with a limited income, anyway, because it calls for luxurious accessories and it soon shows wear.

"Satin shoes are also out of the picture in the forenoon. For that matter, they are not good street shoes unless one has a motor. Leather is more sensible, and I think it is smarter for street costumes.

"For this reason, elaborate dress is always in bad taste in an office or a place of business. If a business girl has a dinner engagement, and is unable to return home to make a change, she can wear a simple afternoon frock but never a dress that suggests evening.

"Women have grown amazingly younger-looking in the past ten or fifteen years. I think this is because a larger number of them are becoming more and more active physically and mentally.

"And, of course, the modern woman dresses to look young. As a matter of fact, there is no 'old' and 'young' in clothes today. With the necessary modifications for the individual figure, I use the same silhouette for grandmothers and débutantes. Two generations ago, the woman of forty was frankly middle-aged. She wore blacks and browns, and upon the appearance of her first gray hair she discarded hats for 'bonnets,' which definitely classed her as an elderly lady. To-day, the woman of forty is a very youthful person—and she looks it!

"Finally, let me emphasize this point: No dress in the world can lend an effective appearance to a poorly groomed woman.

"You remember what Barrie says about charm in 'What Every Woman Knows:' 'Oh, it's—it's sort of a bloom on a woman. If you have it, you don't need to have anything else. If you don't have it, it doesn't matter what else you have!'

"And after that shining light of the soul which comes from within, grooming stands first in those things which make for charm in a woman!"

A difficult problem solved!

At last you can have smooth Ford starts and stops without adding to carbon troubles.

NOW you can have in your Ford car the two benefits every Ford owner is seeking.

1. Smooth starts and stops.
2. Almost complete freedom from carbon.

Until recently these two benefits were contradictory. Smoother starts and stops meant greater carbon formation. An oil that quieted the transmission bands would not correctly lubricate the engine.

The solution came with the new Gargoyle Mobiloil "E," produced by Mobiloil Engineers after five years of engineering study and experiment.

This new Mobiloil "E," placed on the market several months ago, has had a phenomenal success. It has been tested by Ford owners in every part of the country. And the most enthusiastic users of the new Mobiloil "E" are the ones who have compared it most closely with other oils for the Ford car.

You do not want carbon in your motor. An engine choked with carbon cannot deliver its full power. It knocks on the hills. The cost of opening up the engine is no trifle.

Here, at last, is real freedom from carbon plus real smoothness in Ford starts and Ford stops. Here is real freedom from overheating. Here are all the good points of the old Mobiloil "E" plus new ones. In perfecting an oil which was correct for the Ford transmission bands, the Mobiloil Engineers never lost sight of the major problem of providing correct lubrication for every frictional surface of the Ford engine.

GARGOYLE

Mobiloil "E"
for* Fords

Worth proving

A gallon can of the new, improved Mobiloil "E" will just fill your Ford crankcase. Drain off your old oil and refill with genuine Mobiloil "E."

New smoothness in starting and stopping, more power and quicker pick-ups in traffic will immediately be apparent. As the mileage mounts you'll experience marked freedom from the expense of carbon removals, band replacements and repair bills.

A nearby Mobiloil dealer has the two new home garage containers of Mobiloil "E"—the handy 5-gallon Tipper Box, and the newly designed 10-gallon drum. These containers offer real convenience in handling oil in your own garage.

You expect great things of him

Is he getting every chance? Even a little thing like this counts much

What a long hard stretch he has ahead of him—that boy of yours! Years of study, of growing that will require every bit of mental and physical energy he has.

He needs all the help you can give him. Not only in big obvious ways but also in little things, often overlooked.

For instance, school authorities are pointing out to mothers today one of these important little things.

It is the school day breakfast. They have proved in country wide tests that the kind of breakfast your child eats has a sure effect on the way he grows and learns.

This is now taught in every school health program. As the Breakfast Rule it is displayed on 42,000 school room walls:

"Every boy and girl needs a hot cereal breakfast"

Only a hot cereal breakfast provides the mental and physical energy your growing children need for the strain of school.

It is easy enough to understand why nutrition authorities advise a Cream of Wheat Breakfast as the best preparation for a good morning's work.

First, a generous dish of Cream of Wheat is just full of energy substance—the mental and physical energy your child must have. Second, it is in such a simple form, so easy to digest that he gets all the energy it contains. And children always love its rich creaminess!

Remember that even such a little thing as the cereal you give your children counts much in their development. Tomorrow morning give them the one children's specialists have recommended for 30 years. Cream of Wheat! Your grocer has it.

This boy can knock it out of the lot. One reason is that every morning he eats a hot cereal breakfast—Cream of Wheat

To mothers and teachers

Do you want to get the enthusiastic interest of your children in forming the hot cereal breakfast habit? If so, send for attractive colored poster to hang in your child's room. Posters are designed to make a "personal success" appeal both to boys and to girls of different ages. There is a 4-weeks' record form which the child keeps himself by pasting in a gold star every morning he eats a hot cereal breakfast. We will send posters and gold stars free, also booklet on children's diet, "The Important Business of Feeding Children," and sample box of Cream of Wheat to mothers. Quantities for school room use free to teachers. Mail coupon to Dept. P-5, Cream of Wheat Co., Minneapolis, Minn.

Ben!" replied Franklidge, suddenly espying Hettie and Rose as they rode in upon the lawn.

At that juncture, the first cowboy reached Ben, to blurt out:

"Boss, Jim Lacy's here! He's just killed Dillon!"

Ben Ide leaped straight up in sudden, ungovernable fury. He clenched his fists high above his head.

"Killed! My best man! Where's this Jim Lacy?"

"He's settin' on the cook-house porch," put in Raidy. "Handcuffed, sir. . . . The sheriff's put him in irons. An', Boss, Tom Day has rid in with his outfit. They wanted to lynch Lacy. But Tom roared at them like a mad bull. Reckon you'd better hurry down."

Ina came running from the house. "Ben, what—in the—world's happened?"

"Ina, this is no place for women," returned Ben. "Dillon has been shot by that bloody rascal, Jim Lacy."

"Oh, how dreadful!" Then Ina caught sight of Hettie and Rose. She ran to them. "Hettie, what has happened to you? And who's this girl with you?"

"Rose Hatt. Marvie's friend," replied Hettie, bending down. "Oh, Ina, I've—"

Ben, striding away with his men, turned to call out, "Ina, stay back; an' keep those girls with you!"

BUT Hettie did not heed him. "Listen, Ina," she said wildly, "there are not enough men in Arizona to keep me away!" Then she bent down over Ina to whisper, "Jim Lacy is Nevada!"

Ina put a hand over her mouth to stifle a scream. "No!"

"Yes! I've known it a long time. And I met him to-day. . . . But I—I can't talk now. Come!"

Hettie, with Rose on her left, rode at the heels of the striding men. Ina ran beside Hettie, clinging to the stirrup.

They reached the crowd of cowboys and men strange to Hettie.

"Open up here," shouted Ben, in loud, hard voice. "Spread out. . . . Let me see this man!"

The crowd split in a hurry, leaving a wide V-shaped space, at the apex of which sat the prisoner on the edge of the porch. The dead man lay on the ground covered with a blanket.

Hettie recognized Nevada, though his head was bowed and his sombrero hid his face. His hands, in irons, hung over his knees. What a strange, pathetic figure! Hettie's heart failed her. What mystery was here? The moment seemed charged with indefinable and profound portent.

Macklin, the Winthrop sheriff, advanced a stride, with pompous gesture.

"Wal, Mr. Ide, here's your man. I've got him in irons," he boomed.

Ben advanced, his gaze passing from the dead man on the ground to the shrinking prisoner.

"Jim Lacy!" he called, sternly.

There was no movement from Nevada. Nobody else stirred. The air was fraught with tragic suggestion, with inscrutable

When Parents Fail

THIS is a clumsy world for children. They are constantly running into the barbed wires of our grown-up principles and conventions. Every year thousands of them get into trouble which brings them before the Juvenile Courts for punishment or wisely tempered mercy. Rarely are these unfortunate youngsters really bad. Nearly always the hidden cause behind their waywardness is lack of training or proper guidance at home. Oftentimes, physical conditions cause their abnormality. When health is restored the vicious tendencies often disappear.

© 1927 M. L. I. Co.

Warm-hearted men and women in all parts of the country are doing splendid work in helping to salvage these bits of human driftwood. Organizations have been formed which send volunteer representatives to the Juvenile Courts to take boys and girls on probation and so save them from slipping into lives of crime. The kindly folk who do this work are "friends at court" to these youngsters.

Delinquent children are by no means found to come only from homes of poverty. From well-to-do and even rich homes have come children with tendencies toward crime which have amazed their parents. Too late these fathers and mothers learned that in reality they never had known their sons and daughters.

May Day—Children's Day

May First has been set aside by the nation as a day on which mothers and fathers, philanthropists and public-spirited men and women, interested in America's future, join in one great purpose—the big, important work of checking up the health of the children of this country.

It is a great forward step to set aside a definite day to have eyes, ears, noses, throats, and teeth examined for possible physical defects. But why stop half-way? Examine minds just as thoroughly for possible mental troubles.

In May, then, after you good fathers and mothers have found out whether or not your children are sound and healthy, physically, you will want to have an old-fashioned, heart-to-heart talk with the youngsters and learn what they are thinking about, who their companions are, and where they spend their time.

More especially will you want to do this if you have ever spent a few hours in a Juvenile Court where you will have learned that the young offender, in nearly every instance, lands in court because of bad companions or want of proper home training.

Lacking a friend at home, a child may need a friend at court.

Each year more than 200,000 children are brought before the Juvenile Courts charged with more or less serious offenses. Seventy-five per cent of all adult offenders begin their criminal careers before reaching the age of 21. The steps are fast from petty thieving to murder.

In the three year period, 1923, 1924 and 1925, the homicide mortality rate in the United States mounted to the highest point ever recorded.

In 1926 there were approximately 10,000 homicides. In recent years our homicide rate has been 600% greater than that of Canada and 1400% greater than that of England and Wales.

Even the best of children develop tendencies hard for parents to understand. These faults, if uncorrected, may produce serious consequences. As Judge Arnold of the Juvenile Court of Cook County, Illinois, says, "The first job of a parent of a boy is to understand him, not only physically and morally, but emotionally."

The Metropolitan has prepared a booklet, "The Mind of the Child". It may help you to deal fairly and wisely with your children in solving the many vexing problems that come up in connection with them. Send for it. It will be mailed without cost.

Millions of men buy Mennen for a reason. It gives them a quicker, smoother, easier shave. It soothes, tones up and conditions the skin. The Mennen process—dermutation—does more than just soften the beard. It flattens the tiny "mounds" around each hair. This prevents any scraping and nicking of the skin—therefore eliminates the usual smarting and soreness after shaving. Buy a tube of Mennen. Try it a week. If your face doesn't feel better and look better, we'll return the cost of the tube.

Once you know the luxury—the deep soothing joy—of a Mennen shave you are ready for Mennen Skin Balm after shaving. It's a super luxury. Cool, refreshing, antiseptic. Has a "zip" to it you'll like—and a fragrance that's distinctly masculine. Only 50c a tube. As a finishing touch, use Mennen Talcum for Men. It's a man's powder made for a man's face. Tinted so it doesn't show.

meaning that yet transfixed the onlookers.

"Lacy, I'm goin' to hang you!"

Still no response from this notorious gunman, whose daring, whose cold nerve had long been a subject for camp-fire gossip.

"Stand up. Let me look at you!" ordered Ben suddenly.

With a violent wrench the prisoner jerked out of his dejected posture, and stood erect. He ducked his head, removing the sombrero, which fell to the ground. Composed and pale he faced his judge.

"MY HEAVENS! . . . Who . . . is this . . . man?" Ben Ide faltered.

There was no answer. The crowd of onlookers gazed spellbound.

"Who are you?"

"Wal, Ben, I'm shore sorry we had to meet this heah way," came the reply, in the old slow, cool accents. "But I reckon it had to be."

"Nevada!"

With the hoarse, wondering cry Ben leaped forward to clasp his old friend in a close embrace, and held him so a long moment.

Hettie saw Ben's face in convulsion, his eyes shut tight, his expression one to bewilder the staring bystanders. To her it was beautiful and somehow soul-satisfying. Her eyes were dim, her heart pounding.

"My old pard! Found at last! . . . Thank God! I thought you were dead. . . . All these long years! . . . It's too good to be true. I reckon it's a dream. Say somethin' to me. . . . Nevada!"

Ben held him back, hands on his shoulders, oblivious to all but that lean, stone-gray face.

"Yes, Ben; Nevada to you; but to all the world—only Jim Lacy."

Ben's transition to reality was swift and passionate. Suddenly white, with blazing eyes, he tore at Nevada's handcuffs. "I don't care who you were. You're Nevada to me—my friend—my pard. An' so you'll be forever! . . . Macklin, unlock these irons!"

"But, Mr. Ide, he's my prisoner," protested the sheriff. "He's wanted for rustlin'. He killed your foreman. The law—"

"To thunder with your law!" interrupted Ben fiercely. "Unlock his irons! Quick. Before I throw my gun on you!"

His hand went to his hip. Tom Day stepped out to get between Macklin and Ben.

"Easy now, Ben. Let old Tom have a word," he said, in his big voice, now full and resonant. "We've had enough gunplay for one day. . . . Macklin, give me the key to these irons."

The sheriff, red of face, flustered and intimidated, complied, with poor grace. Day unlocked the irons, removed them, and cast them at Macklin's feet.

Nevada rubbed his wrists, and then looked up to smile at Day.

"Put her thar, Texas Jack," boomed the old rancher, with a wonderful smile on his rugged face. "We're shore from the old Lone Star State. Let me be the first to shake the good right hand thet did for Dillon."

"Wal, Tom, shore you needn't rub it in," drawled Nevada, as he yielded to the vigorous onslaught of the older man.

"Come heah, Franklidge," called Day,

They have learned the way to keep the radiant MOUTH of YOUTH

THE dazzling whiteness of your teeth, the sound healthy hardness of your gums are lovely charms of youth.

You can have them always if you keep your mouth glands active. These are the real guardians of your whole mouth.

But these vitally important mouth glands slow up.

Modern diet, with its soft, easily swallowed foods, restricts the natural fluids which the mouth glands should produce. Without hard chewing to exercise them, your mouth glands falter. Even in childhood, discoloration and decay begin, gums soften in disease.

To correct this, Pebeco was especially perfected. Its principal ingredient renews the normal action of the mouth glands, keeps them vigorous day and night. You can taste the important substance in Pebeco that does this. As you brush your teeth, you get its sharp, clean, pungent tang.

Your whole mouth feels wholesome, sweet. Even where the toothbrush cannot reach, Pebeco protects and purifies.

Made by Pebeco, Inc., a division of Lehn & Fink Products Company. Sole distributors, Lehn & Fink, Inc., Bloomfield, N. J.

How breathlessly enchanting you seem to others now!

Your gleaming smiles, your joyous laughter, win the admiration of all who know you. You know you are more charming when you use Pebeco.

"Pebeco is more than a tooth paste," so many users say. "It is necessary to perfect and complete care of the whole mouth. Its very taste is assurance of its help and protection."

Where the mouth glands begin to slow up even in childhood . . .

Often before we reach our teens, soft foods have caused the mouth glands to produce less and less of their natural fluids. Gradually they cease to wash away food deposits, to counteract day and night acids forming in the mouth. Pebeco contains the special ingredient that ensures active mouth glands, shown by the numbers, three on each side. This is the way to renew each day the smiling, healthy Mouth of Youth.

It's spring out-of-doors —are you foot free?

AS free as a gay little brook, laughing its way across the spring countryside, are feet that wear flexible Cantilever Shoes. What better time of year, than now, to free yourself from the fetters of ordinary shoes and discover the comfort that Cantilever Shoes can give your feet.

Have you seen the smart, new Cantilever Oxfords? The springy, flexible arch laces up snugly to the undercurve of your foot. This gives your arch a wonderfully buoyant type of support that does not restrict its natural action. Your whole foot can exercise. Walking becomes easier. The result is that the muscles holding the twenty-six bones of the foot in arched formation, can keep their strength or regain it. That is why thousands have overcome arch weakness by wearing Cantilevers.

The natural shape of the Cantilever Shoe allows it to harmonize closely with every curve of your foot. You will be delighted with the way this shoe fits. The modishly rounded toe, the graceful high arch, the nice snug heel and the smart up-to-date designs make the Cantilever as pleasing to look at as it is to wear. Two of the new oxford models are illustrated at the right. A pair of these shoes will help you every day and add to your happiness all during spring and summer.

COMFORT THROUGH FLEXIBILITY

MEN · WOMEN · CHILDREN

AT the Cantilever store in your locality you will find intelligent salespeople who have been trained to fit shoes properly. In most cities only one store shows Cantilever Shoes. If the local Cantilever store is not listed in your telephone book under the name "Cantilever", the Cantilever Corporation, 402 Willoughby Avenue, Brooklyn, New York, will be glad to send you the address.

beckoning to the judge. "I reckon it's aboot time."

Ben Ide stood motionless, his eyes expressive of an incredulous wonder that he could not voice. His feeling was surely shared by others there. As for Hettie, she seemed to feel her blood and brain whirl madly. Texas Jack! That warm, splendid smile of the old rancher! Judge Franklidge moving forward with dignified step and grave, kindly face!

But the other black-garbed sheriff intercepted him.

"Mr. Ide, these are sure most extraordinary proceedings," he said authoritatively.

"Thunder, yes!" burst out Ben. "But it's an extraordinary case!"

"The law must take its course. Even if this Jim Lacy was an old pard of yours, he's now a criminal. Reckon his gun-play was always on the level. But he's a cattle an' hoss thief. We set out to hang the leader of this Pine Tree rustler outfit. Sure, Lacy is him. His killin' of Dillon proves that. If his is no hangin' case, it sure is one for jail."

"Struthers, I hired you to come up here," returned Ben, deliberately. "I admit I wanted Jim Lacy shot or hanged. But I've changed my mind. He's my friend. There's some mystery—some mistake here. That's for me to learn, an' not for you."

"All right. But I'll take Lacy to Phoenix for trial," replied Struthers.

"If you do, it'll be over my dead body. Take care, Struthers. This isn't Phoenix. You're up in the brakes."

Thus Ben Ide answered to his few months in Arizona. The situation looked grave again. But Judge Franklidge interposed to push Struthers back.

"YOU have no jurisdiction here, unless I give it," he said. Then he turned to Ben. "My son, don't distress yourself further. Just have a litt'e patience."

Judge Franklidge advanced to place his left hand on Nevada's shoulder, and extend his right, which Nevada quickly met.

Judge Franklidge turned to indicate in slight gesture the dead man on the ground.

"Dillon, of course, was the leader of this Pine Tree rustler gang," he asserted. "Otherwise you would not have risked revealing yourself here?"

"Wal, reckon I wouldn't," replied Nevada, with a smile that held no mirth.

"Dillon!" boomed Tom Day, his eyes rolling at the dead man. "Who was he, Jack?"

"Ed Richardson, late of New Mexico."

"Richardson? Lincoln County War hombre? Billy the Kid outfit?"

"That's the man, Tom."

"Wal, I'm a son-of-a-gun!" ejaculated the old rancher. "I begin to see light. Dillon was thick with Stewart. An' Stewart never worked the same for me after Dillon became foreman heah at Ben's. This mawnin' he was gone. An' he knowed where we was bound for. . . . Jack, what you make of thet?"

"Stewart was one of the three Arizonians that Richardson took into his New Mexican outfit."

"Ahuh! Who's the other two?"

"Burt Stillwell an' Cedar Hatt."

"Stillwell! . . . Jack, didn't you—meet thet hombre just lately," queried Day, "with fatal results to him?"

LaSalle

a companion car to Cadillac

CARRYING FORWARD the policy of a quality car for every purse and purpose, General Motors saw the need for Cadillac's developing a high grade automobile which would be as socially acceptable as Cadillac itself, but with a slightly varying field of usefulness.

For this congenial task the Cadillac organization was invited to draw freely upon the entire resources of General Motors, including the Research Laboratories, the Department of Purchases, the Fisher Body Corporation and the Proving Ground.

The result is now revealed in Cadillac showrooms—LaSalle, a fine motor car built wholly within Cadillac's plants, but, in the widest sense of the term, a "product of General Motors."

Those who travel much in Europe have realized that there was an opportunity to introduce a Continental style in the appearance of an American car. LaSalle has realized upon that opportunity. It is radically unlike any other automobile; yet the poise and the breeding of Cadillac are there!

Never was a car so rigidly tested in advance of its presentation to the public as LaSalle has been tested at the General Motors Proving Ground. It is a new car to you; it is a tried and proved car to us—as distinguished in performance as it is different in appearance. We present LaSalle with very great pride and invite you to view its six models.

"Yes. It was Stillwell who stole Ben's horse, California Red. I made him send Red back. Reckon that riled Stillwell. . . . An' Marvie Blaine shot Cedar Hatt to-day. So the Pine Tree Outfit is shore broke!"

Ben Ide, in bewildered state, crowded closer to the speakers.

"MARVIE BLAINE shot Cedar Hatt?" ejaculated Judge Franklidge.

"Good lord!" added Day in his booming voice. "What next? Spill it, Jack. Tell us aboot Marvie!"

"I happened on Cedar Hatt to-day," replied Nevada. "He was ridin' down in one of the brakes an' I was on top. Wal, I soon saw he was trailin' someone. So I worked ahaid an' got down off the Rim. There I happened to run on Marvie an' his girl, Rose Hatt. I was lookin' for Cedar, an' I knew Cedar was lookin' for them. So I kept quiet. Pretty soon, Cedar slips up, right onto them. An' he begins to rave. Rose talked back, an' shore Marvie showed spunk. Cedar knocked him down, an' then Rose too. That riled Marvie an' he tore into Cedar. It looked bad, with Cedar pullin' at his gun. He got it out, but Marvie fought him for it. . . . An', wal, in the fight Cedar dropped the gun, an' Marvie, quick as a cat, snatched it up. Usin' both hands he throwed it on Cedar an' shore bored him twice."

"Whoop-ee!" yelled one of the cowboys at the back of the crowd.

"By thunder, I'd whoop myself if I had any voice left," returned Tom Day. "Where's Marvie? Come heah, you gun-slingin' kid!"

"Come here, my lad," called Judge Franklidge, beckoning.

Marvie slipped off his horse and stalked forward to confront the three men. What a moment for Marvie Blaine!

"Son, what's this we heah?" asked Day, bluntly. "Did you shoot Cedar Hatt?"

"Reckon I did," replied Marvie. "Here's his gun. It happened just about as Nevada told you."

"Who's Nevada?"

Marvie laid a hand on his friend.

"Oho! You mean Jim Lacy heah?"

"No, I mean Nevada," replied the lad, stoutly. "That Jim Lacy handle doesn't go with me."

"Marvie, you speak for me," interposed Judge Franklidge. "He may indeed be Nevada and Jim Lacy. But for me he will always be Texas Jack. He has worked for me for two years. And before that for Tom Day. We found him to be the best cowboy who ever threw a rope for us. And more—a splendid, honest man whom it is my privilege to call friend, and whom I would be happy to take into my cattle business."

"Hey, you sheriff rustlers," boomed Tom Day, with loud satisfaction. "Did you heah that? Wal, listen to some more. Texas Jack volunteered to clean up this Pine Tree Outfit. He had my backin'. He had Judge Franklidge's office behind him. He had free hand to become a rustler an' thief, to drink an' gamble an' shoot his way into the secret of the Pine Tree Outfit. And there wasn't any raid over the Rim. The judge's men have got the rustlers an' the cattle, too, by this time. Do you savvy? Or are you wearin' your hair too long? There won't be any

The first picture of that "knock"

This is the "knock" in your motor

This shows photographically what occurs in the engine cylinder as carbon forms, when straight gasoline is used. The increased heat and pressure created by the carbon cause the gasoline to explode too quickly, with the result that there is an accumulation of high pressure heat waves which strike against the cylinder walls so violently as to produce an audible metallic sound. The bumps in the line are that "knock."

This is how "ETHYL" knocks it out

And this shows photographically what goes on in the same cylinder under the same conditions when straight gasoline is treated with "ETHYL" fluid. Note the absence of "knock-bumps"; the evenness of the pressure changes. The "ETHYL" fluid has neutralized the heating qualities of the carbon deposits and by maintaining the normal combustion rate of gasoline has turned the increased pressure due to carbon into increased power.

THESE PHOTOGRAPHS were made possible by a special instrument invented by General Motors Research Laboratories to find out what goes on in an automobile engine's cylinder when "knocking" occurs.

That invention led to the discovery that what you may call an "engine knock" or a "spark knock" is in reality a fuel knock. It is due to the tendency of a straight gasoline to explode too quickly as carbon forms and increases temperature and compression (pressure).

Having determined the character of "knocking," General Motors developed "ETHYL" fluid, a patented chemical compound which when added in very small quantities to straight gasoline forms Ethyl Gasoline, the most effective "anti-knock" fuel yet known.

Ethyl Gasoline transforms carbon deposits from a liability into an asset. It produces more power on hills and heavy roads. It gives a faster "pick-up," reduces gear-shifting, lessens vibration and engine wear and tear; and saves the trouble and expense of carbon removal.

Ethyl Gasoline has increased the motoring satisfaction of hundreds of thousands of car drivers. It is destined to play a still more important part in the automobile history of the future. TRY IT.

arrest here. There won't be anyone danglin' on a rope!"

HETTIE lay upon her bed, face to the open window, with the cool, sweet, sage-laden wind blowing in upon her. Dusk had fallen. The last rose and gold of the afterglow of sunset lingered in the west. She never knew how she had got from Ben's courtyard, home to her own room. Dimly she remembered faces, and murmuring voices that had no meaning.

The door opened—closed. Ben knelt beside her bed—took her hands—kissed her face.

"Hettie, I came as quick as I could get away," he said, with deep agitation. "I was knocked off my pins. But, happy—oh, girl, never so happy before, except on the day Ina married me! . . . When I could think, I remembered you. So here I am."

"Oh, Ben!" she whispered, and clung to him, her overburdened heart lifting painfully.

"Hettie dear, joy never kills," he replied tenderly.

"If it were—only joy!" mourned Hettie.

"Child, there's nothing but joy," he rushed on. "It was a terrible shock to find our old Nevada—was Jim Lacy. But we always knew he was somebody bad. No, not bad. But somebody wild an' great. You knew, Hettie. . . . An' now he's turned up. He had given up the old, wild life. He had found honest work, an' had lived clean an' fine. As we knew him in those happy days at Forlorn River. So you see all your love an' faith an' hope were justified. He was worth it. Thank God I never lost—"

"Hush! You're killing—me!" gasped Hettie, writhing from his embrace.

"Hettie! Why, sister, this is not like you," he expostulated, in anxiety. "You're overcome. It has been too much for you."

"Not the joy, not the excitement," she returned. "But I have failed him so terribly!"

IT CAME out then, gradually, sometimes incoherently, the story of her meeting with Nevada; and Hettie, in her self-abasement, magnified all the bitter invective and woman's scorn which she had flung into his face.

Ben drew her head back to his shoulder and smoothed her hair.

"He . . . will . . . never . . . forgive me," she sobbed, with the relief that came through his sympathy, his championship.

"Nevada? Why, that fellow would forgive anythin'."

"I . . . can never . . . forgive myself!"

"Hettie, it will all come right. You're just overwrought by this sudden crash. Please, Hettie. Brace up, an' see it through. I swear to you Nevada will be just like I am now. On my knees to you!"

"Where is he?"

"I left him in the livin'-room playin' with Blaine. The kid took a shine to him pronto. An' Nevada! Lord, no one would ever dream of him bein' what we've learned to understand by the name Jim Lacy. He's just himself now, as we remembered him. He's Nevada, that's all!"

Hettie lay awake many hours and when she fell asleep she dreamed vague, unreal, distorted dreams. But she awoke to a

A.C. Package for adapting Radiola 28 for use with Loudspeaker 104 on 50-60 cycle, 110 volt A.C. lighting circuit . . $35

RCA has made radio not only greater—but simpler

The new RADIOLAS that are such remarkable MUSICAL achievements are at the same time the SIMPLEST of musical instruments.

EVERY RCA Radiola shows this trend toward simplicity—combined always with new achievements in performance.

Consider the eight tube super-heterodyne, Radiola 28. It is the culmination of twenty-five years of radio development—a remarkable instrument of music and of radio. Yet it stands as a simple, charming piece of furniture, and captures the magic of distant music with the turn of a single control!

In the RCA Radiolas of today, single control has been tried and proved . . . . it is no experiment. With these same Radiolas, operation from the lighting socket has had many months of testing and perfecting. They have shown the remarkable musical possibilities of radio when hooked up with the power of the lighting circuit.

The high sweetness of the violins carries the theme; the deep drums beat the rhythm; a great symphony holds a million audiences in its spell.

And practically every new feature that is heralded in radio today was first developed by RCA engineers—or by their associates in the General Electric and Westinghouse laboratories. In RCA Radiolas, modern radio has had the "road test" of experience and there is nothing to compare with them in tone or in performance.

They have made the old type radio obsolete, and have brought a new conception of radio—and of music—to thousands of homes. Whatever price you plan to pay for radio, be sure to hear the RCA Radiolas. From the least expensive Radiola to the most remarkable "electrical" model, each represents the most advanced radio of today—and the most thoroughly tried and proved.

You may "kid" the "cold-bath liar"

but you envy him one thing

YOU know him—the "cold-bath liar." He brags, offensively, about the bracing, stimulating, zestful feeling he gets when he tumbles out of a nice warm bed and jumps under the icy shower. Yes—you may dislike him because you think he's lying half the time, but one thing you envy him. He gets by with a reputation for being antiseptically clean.

How about yourself? Have you recently shoved your own familiar face up close to a truthful mirror for a good honest look? Try it. You are due for a surprise and a couple of shocks. You are going to discover that your face is really not quite clean.

That off-color, almost-but-not-quite-clean look about your skin is caused by ordinary, unpleasant dirt. It comes from the air. The U. S. Weather Bureau estimates that there are 115,000 swirling bits of dust and grime in one cubic inch of city air. These bits of smoky grime are so small that they are invisible. They collect upon your face, in tiny wrinkles and open pores. Once there, they resist every effort of soap and water to get them out.

You can get clean—and stay clean. A Pompeian massage in your own home takes only seventy seconds—no more time than a hot towel and rinse. Use this invigorating massage cream after shaving, for that stimulating, zestful "feel." Use it to get clean, stay clean, then absorb some of the glory that gravitates to the cold-bath enthusiast. Above all, use it for the grand and glorious feeling that, by gosh! you really are clean!

Make this convincing hand test free!

Wash your hands thoroughly. Dry them. Rub a little Pompeian Massage Cream into the back of your hand until the cream first disappears, then comes out again. Notice this—the cream goes in pink and comes out black! The black is dirt that you could not remove by washing. Now use this pleasant massage cream every day to give your face that clean and healthy look of the successful man. 60c at all drug stores.

new day, new as the bright morning, and with a dawning hope, like the gold and blue of the Arizona sky.

She had no time for her own thoughts. Marvie rushed in upon her, in the kitchen, to be followed by Rose, shy, sweet, modest as the wild flower for which she was named. Already they had been out in the woods, and now they were hungry as bears. They wanted to go to Winthrop. Would Hettie go? Rose must have clothes and books and things. How Marvie's face glowed under his freckles! And Rose was in a transport. Had she forgotten that sordid home down in the brakes?

"Not to-day," replied Hettie, to their importunities. "To-morrow, maybe, if Ben consents."

"What has Ben Ide to do with my affairs?" demanded Marvie loftily. "I'd like to have you know I can ride for Franklidge or Tom Day, or any other big rancher in Arizona."

"Marv, boy, of course I know," she said. "But you must use some sense. Rose is to have a home with me. And I shall take her to San Diego for the winter. I should think you would want to be near her this fall, and also go to San Diego, at least for a while."

Marvie wilted under that.

"Well, if Ben crawls to me I'll consider comin' back," replied Marvie, condescendingly.

AFTER breakfast Ben came to her so utterly abject that he was funny.

"Now, what?" queried Hettie. "You needn't come to me for sympathy."

"Aw, Hettie, that's what Ina said, an' she stuck to it," said Ben. "But I've got to tell somebody. An' Nevada is moon-struck or somethin'. He never heard me."

"All right, Bennie," smiled Hettie, relenting.

"You know, I fired Raidy; well, of course I had to go to him an' ask him to come back. Reckon the old fellow was hurt deep. He didn't rub it in, but he was sure cold. For a long while I apologized, made excuses, swore, an' did about everythin' before he would take back the old job. But at that he was nothin' compared to Marvie Blaine."

"Indeed? Yes; I remember you fired Marvie too," said Hettie.

"You would have died laughin' to see that kid," went on Ben ruefully. "I sent for him. Did he come? Not much. He sent word back by my messenger that if I wanted to talk to him I could hunt him up. So I had to. An' I'm darned if I don't believe he watched me an' kept dodgin' me.

"Well, anyway, I found him at last an' asked him to forget our difference. Whew! . . . Say, he's expanded in this Arizona air. He had an argument that floored me. It was logic, though I wouldn't admit it. He made me crawl. You know I love Marvie, an' I could never let him leave Ina an' me, till he's grown up.

"Well, after he got his job back at a higher salary he put on the screws some more. He actually hit me for the reward I offered for any clue leadin' to the apprehension of the Pine Tree Outfit. That reward was a thousand dollars. Marvie claimed Rose was his clue. The cheeky little rooster! But Nevada backed him up. An' as a matter of fact, 'most every-

"A grocer's simple advice made my son a healthy boy"

"FOR FIVE MONTHS last year my seven-year-old son was so sick I didn't know what to do.

"Indigestion—terrible intestinal pains—frequent nausea. He suffered misery—looked so sallow and pale.

"And worst of all, nothing seemed to help.

"One day my grocer said to me, 'Why don't you give Fleischmann's Yeast a trial?' It could not possibly hurt, I thought, so I told him he could deliver two Yeast cakes every day along with the other groceries.

"That was on August 15th. Jimmy began taking them right away and in two weeks' time he was showing an improvement. His food began to digest. Soon his stomach gave him no more pain. He has got back his white skin and rosy cheeks. Today, thanks to my grocer's simple advice, he is a healthy, robust boy."

MRS. JOHN GUINEY, San Jose, Calif.

THERE is nothing mysterious about Fleischmann's Yeast—unlike medicines, yeast is simply a living plant—a fresh, corrective food.

To keep well the digestive tract must be kept clean and active. That is exactly what yeast does. It tends to counteract intestinal putrefaction, preventing the absorption of dangerous toxins by the body. It stimulates the sluggish muscles of elimination, gradually bringing complete release from constipation.

Start today to eat your way back to health, to rid yourself of constipation and its attendant ills—indigestion, pimples and boils, and that constant feeling of weariness.

All grocers have Fleischmann's Yeast. Buy several days' supply at a time and keep in a cool dry place. Write for a free copy of the latest booklet on Yeast for Health. Health Research Dept. J-40 The Fleischmann Company, 701 Washington St., New York.

"SOME SIX YEARS AGO I became an airplane pilot. Sitting long hours in my plane, irregular meals, the constant strain of the work—told on me. After the first year I began to be bothered with constipation. My system seemed to become more and more poisoned. This lasted for five years—in fact, until I began eating Yeast. In three weeks after I started with Yeast my system began to function regularly. After six weeks I experienced no more heartburn. Today I consider Yeast a part of my daily food." R. F. KNOX, Ft. Wayne, Ind.

BELOW

MME. DOROTHY JARDON, prima donna mezzo soprano of the Chicago Opera Company

"THE DARK SIDE of operatic and concert work is the constant wear and tear on one's complexion. Long train trips, changes in food—all had their damaging effect. Loss of color and that sallow look became most alarming. I was panic stricken. At this period a relative suggested Yeast. I ate it daily and my digestion showed improvement—and naturally this was reflected in my face. My old energy returned. Now, when that sallow look threatens I use Fleischmann's Yeast."

DOROTHY JARDON, New York City

This Easy Natural Way to feel yourself again

Eat 3 cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast regularly every day, one before each meal: just plain in small pieces, or on crackers, in fruit juice, milk or water. For constipation physicians say it is best to dissolve it in hot water (not scalding) before meals and at bedtime. (Be sure that a regular time for evacuation is made habitual.) Dangerous purgatives will gradually become unnecessary.

A Thousand Men to Help You Choose a Career

ONE of the principal reasons why there are so many near-failures and half-successes in every line of business and industry is because there are too many "square pegs in round holes."

Most men just drifted into the positions they hold today. When they first started to work, they took the first position offered. They were young and inexperienced and they did not stop to consider that the choice of a career is one of the most important decisions a man can make. Seemingly there was no one to help them analyze their own particular talents and find the line of work that would be best for them.

Today you will find them struggling along in occupations for which they are not suited—failing, not so much because of lack of natural ability, but because they neglected to make the most of that ability before it was too late.

For many years, the International Correspondence Schools have been cognizant of this situation and their representatives have been doing a really great work in helping men to choose the right careers.

There are more than one thousand of these I. C. S. representatives and they are service salesmen in the best sense of the word, trained to sit down with you in the quiet of your own home and talk over your problems.

They are men of character and ability. They are recognized as substantial business men in the communities in which they live. By the very nature of their work they are familiar with the needs of industry. As a part of their training they are required to study a thorough course in Vocational Counseling.

They offer you not one course, nor six, nor twelve, but the choice of more than 300 courses covering almost every technical subject and every branch of business. Consequently they are under no temptation to sell you a course that is not suited to your particular needs.

Because of this, we urge you to get in touch with the representative of the International Correspondence Schools if you are ambitious to achieve a satisfying career in business and in life.

Fifteen minutes—thirty minutes—a single hour spent with the I. C. S. representative today may be worth thousands of dollars to you in the years to come.

thin' came through Rose. So I promised it to him. . . . Now what do you say?"

Hettie leaped up gladly. "Good for Marv! Now, Ben, run over and crawl to Ina. Then we—you all can be happy again!"

"Ahuh! I get the hunch that 'you' aren't included. I'll bet before this day ends you'll be as crazy as Marv, an' mum as his little wood-mouse Rose."

STILL Hettie was not to have any of the solitude she craved. No sooner had Ben gone than Judge Franklidge appeared.

"I've come over to bid you and Mrs. Ide good-by," he said, in his kindly way. "It has been a rather staggering time. But we're on our feet again, and 'ridin' pretty' as the cowboys say."

Then, leaning closer to Hettie, he continued in lower tone: "You recall one day at my home, when you said somethin' mysterious to me then, but pertinent now. It was about—Nevada."

"I remember, Judge Franklidge," murmured Hettie, trembling.

"Well, would I be correct if I—sort of put two and two together—or perhaps I should say one and one? . . . Nevada and Hettie, for instance?"

His persuasive voice, deep with understanding, and his linking together the two names, quite subdued her poor and rebellious resistance. She dropped her head, murmuring a faint affirmative.

"I'm glad I hit upon the truth," he said, with eagerness. "I watched you yesterday, and I believe I saw then something of your ordeal. And I see now in your face the havoc that tells of your pain. It is my earnest hope to soothe that pain, Hettie Ide.

"It has been a terrible shock for you to find in your Texas Jack—or Nevada as you call him—no other than the infamous or famous Jim Lacy. This is natural, but it is all wrong. I've met, and trusted, no finer man than this same Jim Lacy. But I did not come to eulogize him. I want to make clear in your mind just what such men as Jim Lacy mean to me.

"I have lived most of my life on the frontier, and I know what its wildness has been and still is. There are bad men and bad men. It is a distinction with a vast difference. I have met or seen many of the noted killers. Wild Bill, Wes Hardin', Kingfisher, Billy the Kid, Pat Garrett, an' a host of others. These men are not bloody murderers. They are a product of the times. The West could never have been populated without them. They strike a balance between the horde of ruffians, outlaws, and the wild life of a wild era. It is the West as any Westerner knows it now.

"And we could not be pioneers, we could not progress without this violence. Without the snuffing out of dissolute and desperate men, such as Dillon, Cedar Hatt, Stillwell. The rub is that only hard, iron-nerved youths, like Billy the Kid, or Jim Lacy, can meet such men on their own ground. That is all I wanted you to know. And, also, that if my daughter cared for Jim Lacy I would be proud to give her to him!"

"Thank you, Judge Franklidge," replied Hettie, lifting her head to look straight into his eyes. "But you misunderstand my—my case. I do not mind—that Nevada has been Jim Lacy."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

"For heaven's sake, then, why all this—this—I don't know what?"

Hettie glanced away, out into the green, black-striped forest.

"I scorned him. I believed him lost to—to— I failed in faith. And I am afraid he will never forgive me."

"Hettie Ide," returned Franklidge, with solemn finality, "this Texas Jack won't even know he has anything to forgive!"

BEFORE Hettie could recover from this ultimatum, Marvie waylaid her. He hauled Hettie off the porch, and out under the trees.

"Hettie," he whispered in her ear, "I fixed it for you."

"Marvie! Are you— Oh, if you—"

"Keep in the saddle," he interrupted, shaking her. "Nevada just told me he was dyin' of love for you. . . . There now, Hettie, don't look like that. I'm dead serious. Cross my heart! . . . Didn't you make my Rose happy? Why, I'd go to torment for you. An' Nevada knows it. He's sufferin'. He thinks you ought to send for him, if you can forgive him for bein' Jim Lacy."

Hettie could only cling mutely to this glad-eyed boy who was torturing her.

"So I fixed it. You run out there across the bench," he went on, pointing with eager fingers. "You know. There among the pines where I always find you. Go now. Nevada is watchin'. He'll come. I swore I'd get you there, if I had to pack you. An' I will!"

Hettie kissed his brown, lean cheek, then ran wildly into the shelter of the pines. First, she meant only to escape Marvie, and all of them. But an irresistible magnet drew her to the secluded nook, where she went so often alone, to gaze out under the low cover of green to the purple sage and the changing radiance of the desert.

Nevada was there—somehow, the Nevada of old. Hettie ran into his arms.

"I—love—you! I love you!" she cried imploringly. "Forgive me. I'll never, never fail you again!"

Hours passed, and sunset again widened its golden effulgence down over the sage hills to the rolling slopes. Purple clouds like ships sailed in a sea of gold and rose.

Hettie and Nevada sat, backs to the great pine tree, their cheeks together, their hands clinging.

"Ben sprung somethin' on me," Nevada was saying. "Why not all of us rustle down to San Diego? Shore, it floored me. . . . But I'd like you to get away from heah just now, for a little. . . . So, darlin' Hettie, would I be asking too much if, if—"

"No. Ask me anything," murmured Hettie.

"If I'd ask you to marry me?"

"If! . . . Do you?"

"Shore. I reckon I'm darin' to."

"No," said Hettie.

He accepted that in startled silence.

"I mean no—you are not asking too much. . . . Oh, Nevada! Yes! Yes!"

The last golden flare of sunset burned from over the darkening range.

"Arizona is smiling at us," said Nevada, gazing at the sunset glow upon her rapt face.

"Nevada is smiling down upon me," she replied. (The End)

Today's dandruff

may mean tomorrow's baldness

a simple pine tar method to prevent it

THIS is not a "before and after" picture. To show you how subtracting hair adds years, the artist has simply sketched a young man with and without his hair.

Do you know that practically all cases of baldness trace back to dandruff? Foresight, as well as a gentleman's natural distaste for dandruff, suggests that we do something definite about it.

To stop dandruff, special care with a special soap is advisable—with a soap, like Packer's Tar Soap, made especially for hair and scalp.

How pine tar helps

Packer's contains pine tar. Practically every well known authority recommends pine tar in the treatment of common hair and scalp ills—especially dandruff. And leading physicians for over 50 years have been prescribing Packer's Tar Soap in the care of the hair, scalp and skin.

The dandruff treatment below lets your scalp enjoy all the soothing, healing properties of the Packer pine tar lather. It clears the gland openings; helps them to perform all their normal duties. It helps start the scalp toward renewed health.

The Packer Method

When you wash your hair, do this: Wet the hair with warm water, apply Packer's Tar Soap and pile up the rich, piney lather. With the finger-tips massage three minutes. Rinse. Lather again, repeat the massage, then rinse thoroughly.

In severe cases of dandruff, repeat this every other day for one or two weeks. (In milder cases, every third or fourth day may be sufficient.) Gradually decrease the frequency of the shampoos as your scalp clears. Then keep up the treatments regularly once a week to prevent the dandruff from coming back.

In most cases, this simple method will soon rid your scalp of dandruff and restore your hair's normal, healthy vitality.

Send 10c for Sample and Manual

For 10c (stamps or coin) we will send you a generous sample of Packer's Tar Soap and a copy of our new Manual, "The Care of the Hair." This profusely illustrated 28-page book has recently been re-edited to present the most scientific thought on the care of the hair. It contains dozens of authoritative suggestions for keeping your hair healthy and young-looking. Fill in the coupon, clip and mail today.

HOME from her friends . . . and so glad to get home she could weep! The annoyance she'd endured! The embarrassment! The home she'd been visiting was a veritable artist's dream of loveliness. Vine-covered. Beflowered within and without. Altogether charming. But oh, that terrible bathroom!

Faucets that had taxed to the utmost her dainty fingers to turn. Old-fashioned contrivances they were—gripless and slippery—that hurt her hands—that refused to be turned on or off. And a tub and a lavatory quite as inadequate—whose slow drawing, slow draining waters invited anything but freedom of indulgence.

No wonder she was glad to get back to the luxury of her own Mueller-equipped bathroom—to those faucets and fittings, lavatory and tub, that always behaved so well. No more antiquated, obsolete, one-cylinder bathrooms for her! How can anyone stand the trials and the tribulations of an indifferently equipped bathroom? And with Mueller faucets, fixtures and fittings so altogether desirable, so dependable and so easily attainable, why should they?

With Mueller equipment almost any bathroom can be turned into a veritable model of beauty and convenience at a cost that is surprisingly low. For the bathroom of a new home, no finer equipment can be found.

How about your bathroom—are you entirely pleased with its equipment? Why not look it over. If it isn't all you could ask, get in touch with your merchant plumber. Let him give you an estimate on Muellerizing it.

Bear in mind Mueller service includes vitreous ware as well as faucets and fittings for every outlet all through the building—whether residential or otherwise.

MUELLER CO. [Established 1857] Factories: Decatur, Illinois; Port Huron, Michigan
Canadian Factory: MUELLER, Limited, Sarnia Branches: New York, San Francisco, Los Angeles

When, 70 years ago, Hieronymus Mueller founded this institution for the manufacturing of brass goods it was with the determination to build up to an ideal—not down to a price. Today Mueller faucets and fittings are second to none in quality and are accepted as such by the trade. Mueller vitreous ware, too, measures up to Mueller high standards, and because of modern production methods and established trade outlets, it is, like the brass goods, priced most reasonably. Before committing yourself to any plumbing appurtenances, look into Mueller. Ask your architect, plumber, or public service man about it.

The Supreme Court on Books gives its verdict for The World Book

THE American Library Association, whose business it is to determine the actual value of books through reports of librarians, is considered the Supreme Court on Books. In its official publication, The Booklist, it gives The World Book unqualified recommendation and calls it "best of its type."

The Elementary School Library Committee of the National Education Association, in preparing the "Graded List of Books for Children," gives The World Book first place.

These—and State Boards of Education, Textbook Commissions, Parent-Teacher Associations, State Courses of Study, have virtually authorized The World Book into almost every public library and school in the United States.

William McAndrew, Superintendent of Schools, Chicago, says: "The World Book outclasses them all. It is used more than four times as much as any other book in our library."

Your boy and girl use The World Book. But school sets are limited in number. School hours are short. There is only one local library—and the children can't go there every night. They need The World Book at home . . . need the ten compact, beautifully bound volumes on the library table, handy for easy digging! Watch them refer to The World Book again and again in preparing a single lesson. This humanized world-knowledge fills in, alluringly, authentically, the outlines of their lesson assignments.

Encyclopedic in content—yet different . . . The World Book contains hundreds of correlated subjects of cultural interest never before in a reference work. Every article is an entertaining story; human, richly illustrated, strictly down to date . . . concise and more pleasing than the similar article in an ordinary encyclopedia.

Under the leadership of Professor M. V. O'Shea, University of Wisconsin, a staff of prominent educators and nationally known authorities compiled The World Book. Their purpose was to supply all the reference material demanded in both the grade school and the high school curriculum. The result is the most surprising, delightful, inviting reference set ever devised. Completely accepted by the highest educational authorities.

Such professional men and women as librarians, teachers, superintendents, are the exclusive representatives of The World Book. Through them you obtain it. Ask us for full information.

right, madam; go ahead and cross." She drew the baby carriage closer to her and shook her head in the negative. I repeated my invitation, but she continued to shake her head and look very dumfounded. Finally, I drove on. Am certain my show of courtesy completely baffled her.

Those entries show how it goes. Pedestrians don't expect any consideration from automobile drivers any more. A gesture of fairness knocks them quite bowlegged.

The same is true as regards the attitude of motorists toward one another. So accustomed has each motorist become to having the other fellow hog it, that a sudden display of etiquette completely flabbergasts him. Driving out the Jamaica Turnpike one afternoon recently in heavy traffic, I noticed a gentleman, who was coming in the opposite direction, stop to make a turn into the side street. In order to do this, he had to wait for an opening in the line of traffic. He tried to edge ahead sufficiently to make some of the drivers give way, but none did. As I neared the crossing, I came to a full stop and nodded to him to make the turn. He was so surprised that he stalled his engine!

When I waited while he started it again, he seemed thoroughly stunned, and when I last saw him he and his party were looking back at me as if they couldn't believe their eyes. This show of courtesy did not meet with the hearty endorsement of the drivers of cars behind me, as a riotous tooting of horns served notice.

It seems to be the ambition of most drivers to see how close they can come to the other fellow's car without actually taking off a fender, headlight, or bumper.

"Hew to the line, let the parts fall where they may!" is their slogan.

ONE of my consuming ambitions is to have money enough some day to have made for me an all-steel car, the fenders of which will be of extra heavy steel and sharpened to a cutting edge. It will be traffic proof. I am continually being crowded to the curb by taxicab drivers and truckmen. The taxicab drivers have nothing to fear, as their cars have been damaged so much that a few extra nicks wouldn't matter. The truck drivers are hardhearted because they know that in case of a crash the smaller car will take all the punishment.

Now, with my all-steel car with the sharp fenders, I figure that I can hold to a straight course relentlessly and unafraid, knowing that if a taxicab crowds me its fenders will be shorn off like so many hangnails, and that any truck that grazes me will be sliced up like so much bologna. I'm not joking about this; some day I hope to have such a car and try it out.

As a rule I believe the bark of the taxi-

"Getting a line on cotton" is a job for more than a day. Charts for raw material price tendencies help our buyers decide when to go marketing.

Where the price charts leave off, the work of testing begins, to assure a quality worthy of telephone standards.

All in the day's marketing - - -

TELEPHONE poles. Lead pencils. Cotton. Conduit. Many and varied are the purchases which find their way into the market basket of Western Electric. As buyer for the Bell Telephone System this company carries on what is probably the biggest job of its kind in all industry.

To do this task right, Western Electric must study market conditions, past, present and future. This practice develops judgment in knowing when and where to buy to advantage.

Couple that with centralized mass purchasing, made possible because the materials and supplies have been standardized as to type—and you have important reasons why Western Electric purchasing registers substantial economies, which contribute to make your telephone service the cheapest in the world.

Pipe Smoker Enjoys Can of Tobacco Sixteen Years Old

Of course, all good tobacco is aged before it is packed, but here is a case of "aged in the can."

On the strength of Mr. McDonald's letter we certainly owe our packing department a vote of commendation. For no tobacco could retain its flavor and goodness lying in a dark musty corner for sixteen years unless it had been properly packed in an absolutely airtight can.

So while someone was deprived of this particular can of tobacco for sixteen years, it did provide smoke enjoyment for an appreciative railroad cashier when it finally came to light.

Mr. McDonald's letter is reproduced below:

Waxahachie, Texas
May 18, 1926

Larus & Bro. Co.
Richmond, Va.
Gentlemen:

The agent while going through his plunder stored in our baggage room came across a can of your tobacco, and on account of his not using a pipe he made me a present of this tobacco.

You will note the revenue stamp and your memo which was inclosed. The tobacco was put up in 1910, sixteen years ago. But it was in good shape, of remarkable flavor, and was greatly enjoyed by me.

Thought you would be interested in knowing how your tobacco held out in these days of fast living.

Yours very truly,
(signed) Gordon McDonald.

To those who have never tried Edgeworth, we make this offer:

Let us send you free samples of Edgeworth so that you may put it to the pipe test. If you like the samples, you'll like Edgeworth wherever and whenever you buy it, for it never changes in quality.

Write your name and address to Larus & Brother Company, 3 S. 21st Street, Richmond, Va.

We'll be grateful for the name and address of your tobacco dealer, too, if you care to add them.

Edgeworth is sold in various sizes to suit the needs and means of all purchasers. Both Edgeworth Plug Slice and Edgeworth Ready-Rubbed are packed in small, pocket-size packages, in handsome humidors holding a pound, and also in several handy in-between sizes.

To Retail Tobacco Merchants: If your jobber cannot supply you with Edgeworth, Larus & Brother Company will gladly send you prepaid by parcel post a one- or two-dozen carton of any size of Edgeworth Plug Slice or Edgeworth Ready-Rubbed for the same price you would pay the jobber.

[On your radio—tune in on WRVA, Richmond, Va.—the Edgeworth Station. Wave length 256 meters.]

cab or truck driver is worse than his bite. He is not as destructive as he would have you believe. Probably he is almost as much concerned about an accident as you are, but he knows the psychology of the heavy threat.

Knowing that his own brakes are in good shape, he has it figured out to the inch how close he can come to your car without hitting it, as he dashes out of a side street when you are crossing his path. If you pay no attention to him, the chances are he will come to a grinding halt and surrender. The slightest sign of fear or hesitancy on your part will, however, cost you the right of way.

In other words, it is all a question whether you scare easily or not. As I have a dread of repair shops and service stations, I scare very easily. Any taxicab or truck driver with a stern expression and a "follow through" method of driving can cow me any time.

He who hesitates is bossed.

Occasionally I try to scare the other fellow, but it is no go. At the crucial minute I think of the nice luster on my mudguards, and of what a shame it would be to scratch the varnish. This is fatal. My bluffing average is something like .0005 for the season.

Sometimes I try to bluff another driver who is of the same temperament, and then a most embarrassing situation ensues. We tie up traffic for hours.

I ought to have more sense; but even if driving no place in particular and with no restriction on my time, I become extremely impatient if some motorist directly ahead of me on a narrow road drives leisurely. Once I get ahead of him, I am in no haste whatever; but I must get ahead of him. I seem to labor under a delusion that this position means a sterling silver cup or something.

A few years ago I had a small coupé. To me it was the last word in automobile construction. Nothing exasperated me more than to be rudely tooted out of the road by some high-priced limousine, the occupants of which would give me a look of amused disdain as they flew by. To-day I have a dossy limousine, and I often so far forget myself as to be quite intolerant toward the small car ahead.

Human nature is that way.

WHEN a man gets a motor car, he comes to regard scenery as something that is best appreciated when thoroughly scrambled. He gets so he can't enjoy a beautiful landscape unless it appears to be going over his shoulder at forty miles an hour, or better. He can't respond to a beautiful sunset without a desire to telescope or sidewipe it.

A stretch of purpled hills looks good to him only if seen while he is going around a sharp curve on two wheels. Nature is to him only grand when it spatters.

It's that way with me. I can't enjoy a small patch of country any more, I have to see miles of it to get a kick; and it mustn't keep me waiting. I demand at least thirty-five vistas to the gallon. There was a time when it was a treat to see one range of mountains and a couple of waterfalls a week. Now I feel cheated if I don't see a half-dozen per hour. And the appreciation isn't lasting any more. All my scenery goes in one eye and out the other.

The highways and byways are packed with millions of people who think they're enjoying the beautiful scenery, but who pass each field so fast that the grazing cows look like greyhounds in the whippet races, and the faemers at the plows flash by like ice hockey players in a last-period rally.

Barney Oldfield used to be something of a horrible example to automobile drivers. To-day he strikes the average motorist as too conservative. Fifty-passenger ten-ton motor busses go faster through crowded city streets to-day than Barney used to go around enclosed tracks. The great trouble with our licensing system is that it compels a man to pass an examination to prove he knows how to drive. He should be compelled to pass an examination to prove he knows how to wait.

Anybody can drive a machine fifty miles in an hour, but very few men know how to wait at a street crossing forty-five seconds with grace and composure. The States revoke a motorist's license for intoxication, recklessness, and physical disability. They should be able to revoke it for impatience, ill manners, and flightiness.

WHY not compel an applicant for an operator's license to fill out the following blank:

Name.....
Age.....
Address.....
Do you believe in the Golden Rule?.....
When exasperated do you mutter, growl, or grunt?.....
What is the color of your temper, light or dark?.....
Do you consider that the loss of ten or twelve seconds makes any great difference in a man's life over a span of sixty or seventy years?.....
Have you ever read the Book of Etiquette?.....
Do you use violent language moderately or to excess?.....
Have you ever been accused of habitual irascibility, acerbity, or wrathful indignation?.....
How thin is your skin?.....
Do you ever try biting your thumbs when annoyed?.....
If you drive through a pool of water without splashing mud on more than a dozen pedestrians, does it break your heart?.....
How do you cool your temper?.....
Do you think one horn on an automobile is enough?.....
Do you scoff at all women drivers as incompetent?.....
How many truck drivers have you killed with a look?.....
Give the total number of taxicab drivers shriveled by the fire of your withering contempt.....
List the names of three responsible persons who will swear you are the kind of man who will not become cantankerous, choleric, pugnacious, churlish, petulant, testy or waspish toward fellow motorists or pedestrians.....

It is of much more importance that the State have a record of these tendencies than merely to know that an automobile owner has blue eyes, light hair; is five feet eleven inches tall; has never been arrested for any crime, and has driven an automobile for eight years.

I sigh for the old days of the horse and carriage. It was slow going then, but I didn't spend most of the time leaning out of the buggy cussin' at perfect strangers.

suddenly expanded to the most prodigious proportions in Uncle Ed's brain before it ever got started anywhere else.

With the money subscribed, and partially paid in, Uncle Ed was taken with a brilliant idea about the cans themselves.

"I'm going to have the best can on the market," said Uncle Ed. "There's been a great improvement in cans in the last ten years—cans and can-opening devices—but they haven't got the Ideal Can yet!

"Well, I'm workin' on it! I'm hard at work on it! I'm making the drawings! Right from the start, I figure, it will double our sales. Yes, sir, that Ideal Can of mine will give us a monopoly of the canned goods market inside of five years. There's millions in that Ideal Can of mine—hundreds of millions!

"DO YOU know how many people there are in America to-day eating at least half their meals from cans? No, you don't! But I do! Well, I'll tell you. . . ."

Uncle Ed always knew such things; and his figures were always prodigious, promising millions at a glance.

"As soon as the Ideal Can is on the market, that number will be doubled," said Uncle Ed, with triumph in his eyes. "And don't think of America alone! Think of the world! Do you know what the total population of the world is? Well, it's one billion four hundred million peop'e, that's what it is!

"But we have got to be conservative—we have got to be conservative on this proposition right from the very start. We've got to figure that only half these people will eat on an average of two meals a day from the Ideal Can, year in and year out. And let's leave a margin—I always believe in leaving a margin; it's more businesslike and conservative. We got to be hard-boiled about this! Let's say six hundred meals a year for each one of seven hundred millions of people. You multiply that out—six hundred times seven hundred million—and see what you get. Well, that's a conservative estimate of how many of our Ideal Cans will be consumed every year. I tell you, our Ideal Can is the biggest thing in the world."

Dad, at this point, got a little worried by Uncle Ed's vast figures and vast enthusiasm. "Aren't you," he suggested, "losing sight of the little local canning factory we planned?"

"No, sir, not at all!" cried Uncle Ed. "No, sir! After we get the cans going, we'll just naturally expand that original factory along with it. Why, that little first factory of ours will absorb the entire canning industry of the world. I tell you, they have got to have the Ideal Can! And any concern that hasn't got it will be just simply absorbed by us. Yes, sir, absorbed!"

And never after that could any of Uncle Ed's backers get his mind back to the modest little local industry originally projected. And after some months of experimentation with his Ideal Can, Uncle Ed was surprised and shocked and saddened when his backers refused to subscribe more capital to continue the experiments.

"Why, the Can, the Ideal Can, was the corner stone of the whole enterprise," said Uncle Ed, "and there's millions in it!

"The whole thing has expanded since I talked to you fellows. The Ideal Can will take in not only fruits and vegetables, but gasolene, oil, and, in fact, every manufactured product on the market that needs a container. Do you fellows know how many gallons of gas and oil are handled every year in this country alone? No, you don't. Well, I'll tell you. . . ."

And he told them the astounding figures, continuing:

"And now, with this enormous market opening up, right in our faces, you fellows want to close the door! You want to kick those millions away, for the sake of a few dollars! I can't understand you! No vision; no vision!"

It developed that Uncle Ed had not got the patents yet on his Ideal Can. But he had drawings—bushels of drawings—and he had cans in his shop. For he had rented another shop for his preliminary experiments with cans, and he had a practical tinsmith on a weekly salary to help him tinker. That's what had happened to the money subscribed; for now he found himself without enough cash even to get a patent on his Ideal Can. And he was sure that he had the thing almost worked out!

Dad lost not only his own thousand, but also what his friends and neighbors had put in; for he felt in honor bound to pay that back. So he didn't contribute to Uncle Ed's silk-worm project the next year, and the scheme to make vegetable pearls out of oyster plant left him equally cold. He didn't get too sore at Uncle Ed; nobody at any time ever thought he was dishonest about anything. You couldn't look into his eyes and not trust his honesty, and his generosity and his unselfishness. Things like the canning project just happened to him, somehow. He was so eager to have everybody happy and successful and comfortable! You never doubted that if he had made millions he would have distributed them with a lavish hand.

And if he had only had a little more money, a little more backing, how easily he could have made those millions!

THE trouble with the silk worm was nothing inherent in the thought that silk worms might be cultivated in Uncle Ed's latitude and longitude. It was merely that Uncle Ed got to thinking that there really ought to be some sort of mulberry leaf for the worms to feed on that would increase their production. And he used up what capital he could get hold of trying to coax such a superior mulberry tree into existence.

"Yes, you may laugh at me," he said, while he was experimenting, "but you've got to remember that there were a lot of ignoramuses who laughed at Luther Burbank at one time, too. Well, they don't laugh now! All I need is a little more money to get this tree to going, and there's millions in it, millions in it! Say, do you know how many yards of silk there are manufactured and sold every year in the world? Huh? No, you don't! But I do. I'll tell you. . . ."

Never exactly sick—never entirely well

When even parties seem a drag and daily duties leave you listless and let-down—Auto-Intoxication may be wearing you out and sapping your strength.

Follow a woman through an average day. Think of her worries and cares, of her social obligations and the hundred petty duties that clamor persistently for her time and attention.

Borrowing tomorrow's energy for today's tasks, the busy wife and mother is a flagrant offender against the rules of careful eating, prudent exercise and those daily habits which she strives to implant in her family.

Such neglect of Nature's a-b-c's of health leads most frequently to stoppage of waste products in the intestines. And when waste materials do not quickly pass out of the body they ferment and set up poisons which are carried through the body by the blood—causing Auto-Intoxication (self-poisoning).

Self-poisoning shows itself in dull headaches, weariness, indigestion, irritability. It causes thousands of women to feel "never exactly sick, never entirely well."

To combat Auto-Intoxication, "stoppage" must be swept away. To do this Sal Hepatica is the safe and approved standby. Sal Hepatica stimulates the natural secretion of water in the intestines and flushes them clear. It is a delicately balanced combination of several salines with sodium phosphate, and the practical equivalent of the "cure" at the famous springs of Europe.

Dissolved in a tumblerful of water, Sal Hepatica makes a sparkling, palatable drink. You may take it on arising, or if you prefer, half an hour before any meal.

Send for booklet telling about Auto-Intoxication and its effect upon beauty and health.

And the figures as usual were astonishing. He continued:

"When I get this tree right, there won't be a yard of anybody else's silk worn in the world! The tree is the fundamental thing. And you've got to go right down to the fundamentals on a proposition like this, always. What I need is a little more money."

The unfortunate thing was that the silk worms which Uncle Ed invested in, for experimental purposes, did not seem to share Uncle Ed's enthusiasm. His silk worms seemed to be poisoned by the leaves which he insisted on their eating, those leaves which he had invented himself, you might say; with the most depressing regularity the poor insects curled up and died, without giving a single fiber of silk to the world. And once again Uncle Ed's public lost faith in him.

But Uncle Ed continued cheerful. And, as far as he was able, helpful. Cousin Jim Higginbotham was cashier of the principal bank of our town, and Uncle Ed would kindly spend hours lessoning Jim on the mysteries of high finance. If Jim had only listened to him, Uncle Ed often said, he could have told him how to get the best of those Wall Street sharks! Perhaps it is fortunate that Jim never did. Uncle Ed had ideas for the education of every child born into the family, and he turned up semiannually with a device for Al Siler, another family connection, to use in Al's coal mine.

AS THE years went on there were times when Uncle Ed seemed actually to believe that he had at one time made most of the millions which he was always planning to make—had made them, and lost them. He identified himself, in his daydreams, with the great outstanding successes of the world. He spoke of Henry Ford, and Marconi, and the Wright brothers, and J. P. Morgan, and Luther Burbank, as if they were old friends and associates of his. He was glad that they had succeeded. He was not envious. He was a little wistful over not having millions himself; but you could see that he had, in a way, the feeling that he had done a lot for the world too. Everywhere he looked he saw some idea in operation that was one of his own ideas, he seemed to think.

And I can remember the last speech I ever heard him make . . . a speech that made us all a trifle uneasy at the time. It was when the first radio was installed in our community.

"My idea," said Uncle Ed. "Absolutely, my idea! I'll leave it to Martha, here, or Tom. Didn't I say, a few years ago, when I first heard about the wireless telegraph making good, that the very next thing would be the wireless telephone? Huh? Well, here it is! And there's millions in this thing—but not for this family. No, sir! You wouldn't believe in Ed!"

THE truth is, that Uncle Ed had said it, and we all remembered his saying it; and we had laughed—because it was Uncle Ed that said it. Perhaps five millions of people had said it at the same time, and perhaps a hundred thousand of them were Uncle Eds. But, for all that, our own Uncle Ed had said it, and we had laughed!

"All I needed," said Uncle Ed, "was a little more money, to get my experiments shaped up, and my models and patents into working order. But you all laughed at me! Just the way people laughed at Columbus when he said he'd sail around the earth. Just the way they laughed at Doctor Langley when he made his experiments with flying machines—and then the Wrights came along and made good, and the laugh turned the other way. But you wouldn't any of you back me on my wireless telephone. No, sir, not with a cent! And I could show you the drawings for it now, if they hadn't burned up the time my shop burned."

It wasn't until the Family remembered the Ideal Can and the vegetable pearls and the silk worms and a score of other things that they began to feel comfortable again.

And yet, something of a doubt always will linger, too. For now and then, an Uncle Ed somewhere or other does make good. And we'd give anything again to hear the old boy enthusing and expanding, or see him fussing and puttering around some cluttered shop of his, explaining that there's millions in it! Yes, sir, millions in it for the Family—and then the twins can go to college, after all, and Gran'ma can have the things she's been wanting so long, and Ed himself will give a playground to all the kids in town! It is impossible to look back on Uncle Ed without a smile, but it is never an unkindly smile.

My Queerest Acquaintance

Prize Contest Announcement

AFTER reading "Your Uncle Ed," by Don Marquis, it's a hundred chances to one that you'll say to yourself, "That's just like Uncle Eph, or Old Man Jennings, or Gran'pa Potter."

Everyone has a "queer bird" tucked away among the family connections or among his acquaintances. We may feel a trifle uneasy about these individuals when we are all dolled up for a social occasion, or when we are entertaining friends with whom we want to put on a front, but, none the less, these same "queer birds" add a great deal to the sum total of human enjoyments.

Just think of the queerest person you know, and write a true word picture of him or her. Remember that we do not want to hear about insane people, but about human folks who are just a bit different from the ordinary run of their fellows.

For the best letter of not more than four hundred words we offer the following prizes: $30, first prize; $20, second prize; $10, third prize. Competition closes May 20th. Winning letters will appear in the August, 1927, issue.

Address Contest Editor, THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE, 250 Park Avenue, New York City.

Contributions to this contest, and any enclosures, cannot be returned, so you must make a copy of your contest letter and of any enclosures, if you want to preserve them. Manuscripts and inquiries not connected with the contest must be sent under separate cover to the Editor of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE.

Now a New Triumph in Music and Radio

Albert Spalding, Violinist, who finds Brunswick Electrical Records reproduced on the Panatrope the supreme medium for his art

THE FAMOUS BRUNSWICK PANATROPE

Combined in one beautiful cabinet with the 8-tube Radiola Super-heterodyne

HERE is by all odds the most remarkable musical instrument and radio known to the world. The marvelous Brunswick Panatrope . . . giving electrical reproduction of recorded music . . . has been combined in one beautiful cabinet with the 8-tube Radiola Super-heterodyne, unquestionably the finest in radio.

The Brunswick Panatrope reproduces music by an entirely new principle—the electrical. A principle different from that offered by any phonograph, old or new. A principle which gives musical results incomparably better than any other reproducing method ever discovered.

In this newest combination of the Brunswick Panatrope with Radiola Super-heterodyne, the most advanced discoveries in recorded music and radio are offered you combined as a scientific unit.

Everything in music or radio is yours to enjoy now right in your own home. You may hear great orchestras . . . priceless voices . . . as you never heard them reproduced before. Then, by pressing a switch, you may tune in with the finest receiver known on the choicest programs of radio, again obtaining musical results far beyond any you have known.

Unquestionably the Brunswick Panatrope with Radiola, Model 138-C, is the instrument you will want to own. It offers recorded music and radio of a musical quality obtainable in no other one instrument. It is so simple and scientifically perfected that a child can operate it. Hear this Brunswick Panatrope with Radiola and compare it with anything you can find. You'll agree there is nothing like it.

John Charles Thomas, Baritone, one of the greatest American singers . . . a Brunswick artist

Any Brunswick dealer will gladly demonstrate. Hear Model 138-C and the many other Brunswick Panatropes and Panatropes with Radiolas in his store.

Four world leaders in electricity and acoustics, Radio Corporation of America, General Electric Co., Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co., and Brunswick, collaborated in perfecting the Brunswick Panatrope

Winners in Prize Contest

Brunswick recently offered prizes totaling $5,000 for a name with slogan for a New Musical Instrument which reproduces recorded music by new and advanced principles of acoustical reproduction. This is an entirely different instrument from the Brunswick Panatrope. In this contest, which closed December 15th, over a million suggestions were received. After months of work, in which every contribution was given consideration, the appointed judges made the following awards:

First Prize: $5,000 to Miss Mildred A. Bux, 1212 Melrose Ave., Melrose Park, Pa. Name: The Brunswick Prismatone; slogan, "The instrument of colorful music."

Second Prize: $1,500 to Mrs. Herman Arky, 2003 Murphy Ave., Nashville, Tenn. Name: The Brunswick Philharmonic; slogan, "Many instruments in one, one instrument in many."

Third Prize: $500 to Mr. P. L. Dickerson, U. S. Coast Guard, Section Base 13, Port Angeles, Wash. Name: The Brunswick Synchromatic; slogan, "A new age, a new instrument."

ten or eleven years old, we moved to Chicago; I suppose because Chicago, rebuilding after the great fire, offered better opportunities in my father's line of work. He and I continued our walks, studies, and reading, and when the invention of the telephone was announced, and details were described in scientific journals, we made in play what I am inclined to believe was the first telephone circuit in the city. In Chicago, too, definite events gradually led on toward the profession I eventually adopted.

"For instance, one day we were walking on the prairie south of the city, about where Jackson Park is now; then it was wild. We carried a little box of bottles in which to preserve specimens; presently we met a man carrying a botanist's collecting kit.

"He introduced himself. He was Professor Bastin, head of the Department of Botany of the old Chicago University. He became interested in my interests, and eventually invited me to his laboratory, where, he promised, he would explain his collections, and show me how to prepare specimens properly for examination under the microscope.

"As it happened, I was not to have the privilege of a college training. Even my years in high school were cut from four to two. Therefore, the contact I had with Professor Bastin, and with others I met through him did much to make up for what I may have missed in formal training.

"A different sort of sequence led to my meeting Mr. Piper. As a house painter and decorator, my father made a careful study of his materials. He used to mix paints of different colors, and made up little books in which he recorded and exhibited the effects he got.

"ONE exacting customer was a man named Piper, one of the early handwriting experts, who used a brush himself, and also taught handwriting and drawing. Mr. Piper was so well pleased with the way my father handled his painting job that he talked with him and learned something of his special studies and attainments; incidentally, he learned of me.

"Mr. Piper invited us to his house. In the end, it was arranged that he should give me drawing lessons. It was from him that I learned how to draw objects under the microscope. I soon became somewhat expert at this, and as a result, at the age of fourteen, became a member of the Illinois State Microscopical Society. This was a men's organization. I was the only boy in it. Naturally, meeting men doing fascinating things, my enthusiasm for my own studies was quickened.

"Such things as my meeting Piper, and what it led to, are usually thought of as lucky accidents. I think they are something else. It was because my father cultivated a scientific interest in mixing paints and making artistic combinations that Piper took notice of him and, through him, of me. If my father's interest had not led to meeting Piper, I am confident it would have led to something else just as significant."

Mr. Hoskins traces his choice of career to another sequence of events.

"Two of my uncles," he said, "were engaged in selling mining supplies in California. They occasionally visited us. Through listening to them talk about mining, I decided I'd like to learn assaying and the chemistry of minerals, and make that my business.

"At that time, chemistry as a practical science was so little understood and valued that only three men in Chicago were attempting to earn their living at it. One of the three was a Mr. Mariner, who earned a somewhat precarious living by making assays, by teaching young fellows like myself, and in divers other ways.

"I studied assaying in Mr. Mariner's laboratory. Eventually, he offered me a position and an opportunity to learn more than the chemistry of minerals. He pictured in glowing terms the future he saw for chemistry, and the pleasures and opportunities in following it as a profession. I was convinced, and became his assistant at five dollars a week when he had money, and nothing a week when he had none.

"THIS was in 1880. The connection led to the finest things in my life; to my wife (I married Mr. Mariner's daughter); to my family; to my profession, in itself one of the greatest joys; and to my business—for upon Mr. Mariner's death, in 1893, I became the sole owner."

Not long after he became Mr. Mariner's assistant, Hoskins made his first invention of any consequence, and obtained his first patent. And here again he traces an interesting connection between apparently unrelated events.

"My father," he says, "used a blowtorch as a means of burning off old paint before applying new. It generated an intense heat in a small flame. I had seen him use it, studied how it worked, used it occasionally in small experiments, and put the knowledge away in some compartment of my brain.

"At Mr. Mariner's, one of our frequent jobs was to make assays for clients. The assay furnaces in the laboratory were big and heavy, being made of brick lined outside with cast iron. Charcoal was the fuel. On summer days when the temperature in the shade was ninety, the interior of our laboratory would often be close to one hundred and thirty, and practically unbearable. It was on such a day that I remembered regretfully my father's small-flame, intensely hot, blow-torch, and suddenly I wondered if it might not be possible to make a smaller, handier, and cooler assay furnace, replacing charcoal with a blow-torch.

"I remember very well how I carried home fifteen pounds of fire clay to experiment with my first furnace. My father helped me, and we worked chiefly nights and Sundays. The furnace, as finally perfected, was standard apparatus for

"Even those of us who are not dental cripples do not use our teeth vigorously enough"

Our modern food is soft—over-refined. Often it is eaten hastily—"on the run." These are the two chief reasons for the wide prevalence of gum troubles today.

So declares a famous dentist in describing the damage that soft food and hasty eating do to our teeth and gums.

As the four quotations on this page will briefly testify, dentists recognize the connection between our habits of eating and the present rise of troubles of the teeth and gums.

And bad as our soft and starchy foods are for our teeth, they are even worse, over a period of time, for our gums. For under our rich and creamy diet, with little or no roughage, our gums are deprived of stimulation—they become prone to softness, to bleeding, to ill health!

How troubles of the gums originate

To keep healthy, gums must receive work and exercise—the circulation of the blood within their walls must be quickened and stimulated by a brisk surface friction such as natural hard food once gave.

But these delicious things we eat are stripped of their fibre and roughage—they are cooked and refined to a soft consistency, to a creamy texture. They have no power to stir our gums to health. And all too often our nervous habit of hasty eating subtracts still further from the scant stimulation that our gums receive from our food.

And there you have, in everyday language, the reason why gums soften and weaken—why "pink tooth brush," the forerunner of worse troubles, is so widely prevalent—and why it is important for every one of us to care for our gums as faithfully as we clean our teeth.

How Ipana and massage will keep the gums in health

Happily, the remedy the dentists propose is not at all complicated or difficult to follow. They tell us to devote just a few moments, night and morning, to a massage of the gums—with the fingers or with the tooth brush—to restore to the gums the stimulation that our modern food denies to them, and to bring a fresh supply of rich, nourishing blood to the depleted tissues.

And thousands of dentists direct their patients to carry out this simple procedure with Ipana Tooth Paste, after the regular cleaning with Ipana and the brush. For Ipana contains ziratol, a valuable antiseptic and hemostatic which adds to the efficacy of the massage and aids in toning and rebuilding the gums to sound and sturdy health. That is why Ipana has enjoyed the profession's heartiest support since the first day it was put upon the market.

The full-size tube makes the best test of Ipana

The ten-day tube is gladly sent on receipt of the coupon—and it will prove to you Ipana's delicious taste and splendid cleaning power.

But the full-size tube from your nearest drug store—containing more than a hundred brushings—makes a better test of Ipana's benefits to your gums. So give Ipana the full thirty-day trial that may change your tooth paste habits for life!

How dentists condemn soft food—and advise gum stimulation

From a famous specialist:
"In our mouths, resistance to disease is very low. This is because we choose our food unwisely, eat hurriedly . . . . These factors contribute toward sluggish circulation of the blood."

From a radio talk by a well-known dentist:
"If you find that your gums bleed on touch, for instance, when you use a tooth brush—this is the time to take action. It is a signal sent to you by nature that something undesirable is taking place in your mouth. . . . . Pyorrhea is easily curable and preventable in its early stages."

From an article in a dental journal (describing massage):
"Beginning with the application of the brush, carry the bristles in between the teeth, pushing in such a manner as to make friction on the gum, and against the interproximate sides of the teeth."

Statement by an authority on gum disorders:
"I have long advocated the necessity of gum stimulation with the brush and have seen the beneficial results in the mouths of my patients for many years."

years. I made many of them myself, and sold them as far away as China and Japan; but I doubt if any of my customers ever had any inkling of the conditions under which the manufacturing was done.

"I was newly married, and by that time was earning fifteen dollars a week. We had bought a five-thousand-dollar house with a five-hundred-dollar down payment. It was in the basement of this house that I made my furnaces.

"We had only the crudest equipment. My father, who had picked up some knowledge of cabinet-making and carpentering along with his painting, made the molds in which the fire clay was poured. To make the completed furnace as light as possible, I mixed sawdust with the clay; under proper heat, of course it was burned out, leaving the clay porous. But I had no means of obtaining a heat sufficient to burn this clay properly. The best I could do was to dry and bake it thoroughly in the kitchen oven!

"Primitive as our methods were, however, I made enough money in that basement in odd hours to finish paying for the house."

AN EXPERIENCE Hoskins had while he was still drawing a meager salary from Mr. Mariner, shows how the whole course of a life may hinge on a single step taken, or not taken—a choice accepted, or rejected; a decision made, or neglected. He was offered what most people would have considered a fine opportunity.

"I used to buy supplies for my simple experiments," he said "from the Western Electric Company. They had a place on Kinzie Street, north of the river. I never had more than a few cents to spend, sometimes as much as a quarter. But the man who waited on trade got to know me after repeated visits, and one day he said:

"'Son, how would you like to take a job here?'

"The company in those days was very small, compared to what it is to-day; but, even so, it had enormous promise. Moreover, in the store were any number of glittering telegraph instruments, priced far beyond my purse, which my fingers fairly itched to touch. With a job in such a place, I could handle those telegraph instruments to my heart's content! I asked for a few days to think it over.

"During that week-end, I thrashed the thing out. I said nothing to my father, or to anyone else. And on Monday, having come to my conclusion, I told the man I had decided to remain where I was.

"Judging from most of the facts, my decision was bad. The Western Electric Company undoubtedly had a great future. A chance to start with such an organization on any terms was a splendid opportunity. On the other hand, the chances with Mr. Mariner seemed very precarious, and his was a one-man concern with very slight financial backing. Besides, Mr. Mariner was engaged in a profession that had hardly begun to establish itself.

"To-day, on my way to and from the city, I pass the great Hawthorne works of the Western Electric. I often reflect about that boyish choice. If it had been different, it is conceivable that I might now be president of that great company; it is also conceivable that I might be janitor. Nobody knows.

"But I do know this: If I had accepted, my life would have been wholly different. I would have entered a different profession. I would not have met and married the woman I did marry. My children would have been different. And I might, or might not have had the bully lot of fun I've had in the profession of my choice.

"It is a serious thing to give advice to a youngster at the outset of his career!"

The sequence of events that led to the development by Mr. Hoskins of the high-resistance wire which became, and still is, the essential part of all electrical heating appliances, goes back to the day when he was a boy in his early teens. In a scientific journal he read an account of an alleged way to make diamonds.

"Making precious stones," he pointed out, "has been a favorite dream for centuries. I performed the experiment described in the journal, using, I remember, some of my mother's jelly glasses to hold certain materials which had to sit in a dark place for two years. Fortunately, I avoided blowing up the house and family; but I did not make any diamonds. However, the idea stuck.

"Later, it came back as a desire to make rubies. Chemically, rubies and alumina are identical, the difference being that the ruby has been crystallized under extremely high heats.

"One day I read of the discovery of thermit, a material used in a process for producing extremely high heats; it is produced by chemical reactions brought about by introducing heat into a mixture of granulated aluminum and iron oxide. Here, I thought, was a good way to get a temperature high enough to fuse raw alumina and make rubies!

"I gathered magnetic oxide of iron laboriously from the sand of Lake Michigan, succeeded in producing the necessary granulated aluminum, and prepared about two hundred pounds of thermit, the largest charge, I believe, ever set off in this country up to that time. For my experiment I rented a blacksmith shop in an outlying district; above my workroom were living quarters occupied by a negro family.

"I put the thermit charge in a large crucible. Inside it, in a smaller crucible, was the raw alumina which I hoped to crystallize into a ruby.

"I set off the charge. In an amazingly short time, a terrific heat was generated. Things happened in a hurry. The negro family evacuated. The fire department came on the run. And I got no rubies.

"THE experiment was a failure; but it was not useless. Few things are. In due time there came a way to use the experience.

"A man named Marsh hunted me up. He was trying to build a thermopile, an electrical device in which a current is generated by applying heat at the junction point of different kinds of metals forged into a bar. Marsh was using an alloy of nickel and chromium as one of his metals, and a copper alloy for the other. He knew of no way to produce high enough heats to melt his nickel and chromium properly, and get a pure, carbon-free alloy. He had heard of my blow-torch assay furnace, and thought something like that might turn the trick. I knew he needed still higher heats, and here my experience with thermit came into play.

They don't know they're only half-fed

They're satisfied. Certainly! They eat three square meals a day. Who could ask more? But we'd better ask more, for our health's sake! So-called square meals often lack vitally important elements. And some of the body's needs must go unsatisfied!

A food—a crisp, delicious food— that helps you round out your diet

LUCKY the man who has learned what "plenty to eat" really means! . . . It isn't primarily a question of how large your meals are. It's a question of what those meals give you. Every day your body needs all the vital food elements, in proper quantities and proportions. Such diet—"balanced diet"—actually, actively, safeguards health.

Modern diet often falls far below the ideal because many foods lack certain essential elements. That is why Grape-Nuts was originated. This crisp, delicious food gives your body dextrins, maltose and other carbohydrates, for heat and energy; iron for the blood; phosphorus for teeth and bones; protein for muscle and body-building; and the essential vitamin B, a builder of appetite. A single serving of Grape-Nuts, eaten with milk or cream, supplies more varied nourishment than many a hearty meal!

You'll find Grape-Nuts an unusually delicious food. Its flavor is unique—nut-like, with a delicate suggestion of malt sugar. Your enjoyment will be increased by the tempting crispness of the food. This crispness is especially praised by dentists, because it benefits teeth and gums by giving them healthful exercise.

Grape-Nuts is made from wheat and malted barley. Prepared by a special baking process, it is one of the easiest foods in the world to digest. That's important. Lots of nourishment, without tax upon digestion . . . Try this famous food for breakfast tomorrow. It's ready-to-serve. Your grocer sells it . . . Perhaps you will wish to accept the following offer.

Two servings of Grape-Nuts and "A Book of Better Breakfasts", free.

Mail the coupon and we will send you two individual packages of Grape-Nuts, and an interesting booklet, written by a famous physical director. It contains valuable information on health and diet, and a series of menus for better breakfasts.

"The story of the experiments begun then is long and laborious. The job took us seven full years, and first or last we encountered every conceivable obstacle. A sample was the fact that the electric light company in Chicago would not permit us to use the quantities of electricity we needed for certain phases of the work. We had to go to Evanston, a suburb, and set up a special shop; but even there we were permitted to use the current only after ten at night and before four in the morning.

"We made hundreds of tests with different alloys, to discover which were best. Furthermore, we did it without any very clear idea of just what we were going to do with this perfect alloy when we got it; that is, if we ever succeeded in getting it.

We at length made a thermopile that satisfied us. We hitched it up with a series of lights, ran a quarter-horse-power motor with it, and threatened to use it to run an automobile—until somebody pointed out that, while we could probably make such an automobile run, no woman would ride on the seat with a blow-torch popping in the rear. We also thought of making a motor boat.

"All these ideas came to nothing of practical consequence until we discovered that our alloy offered extremely high resistance to an electric current. It occurred to me that we might draw it into wire, and sell it to powder manufacturers to replace platinum wire for setting off dynamite discharges.

We then had to learn how to draw this extremely hard material into wire. After many trials we succeeded in that, and before we were through we were able to draw off a wire one five-thousandth of an inch in diameter.

"IT WAS an easy step to think of the possible use of the wire in electric heating appliances—and that is where its great use has been. Until the patents expired a few years ago, a royalty was paid to the Hoskins Manufacturing Company on the heating element in every toaster, iron, or other device of the sort.

"So, to return to my philosophy of sequences, the development of this very widely useful material can be traced to a more or less wild desire to manufacture diamonds out of base materials!

"Thus things happen, when a start is made, the most important results often proceeding from matters that seem of least consequence.

"A friend of mine once, on a visit to Europe, gathered a little volcanic ash in the vicinity of Mt. Ætna and gave it to me. I analyzed it under the microscope, was interested, put the sample away, and, as far as I knew, the matter was ended Many years later I similarly examined specimens of the silicate rocks of southern Illinois, and was interested to note resemblances to the volcanic ash. But I thought no more about it.

"One day William A. Spinks came to see me. He was the professional billiard champion of California, and had just returned from exhibition games in Europe.

"'That,' he remarked, handing me a small lump of material, 'is the best chalk for billiard cues I have ever seen. I got it in France. I wish you'd analyze it, tell me how it's made, and show me a way to reproduce it.'

"I had never played a game of billiards in my life, and I knew nothing about the chalk used on cues.

"'You say you got this in France?' I asked.

"'Yes.'

"'That may be,' I said; 'but the materials it is made of came from Italy.'

"I had recognized my old friend, the volcanic ash. That turned my thoughts to the Illinois silicates I had examined more recently. I asked Spinks to tell me what would constitute an ideal billiard cue chalk. As a result, I prepared such a chalk from Illinois materials, which he liked even better than his European find. We secured patents and formed a company. Later, Spinks drew out. I am still president of the William A. Spinks Company, which manufactures the chalk and other billiard supplies, though I have left the management largely to one of my cousins. This business, you might truly say, traces directly to a bit of volcanic ash sent me as a curiosity.

"I HAVE often seen this law of sequences work out in other people's lives. I am a commuter, and on the train I used to meet occasionally a young man whom I knew slightly as a chemist; he had a brother who also was a chemist. Sometimes we sat in the same seat and talked. One day the conversation turned to his private affairs, and he said things weren't going any too well.

"'What's wrong?' I asked.

"He explained that he was doing merely routine work; that he didn't see much chance for bettering himself; that he wasn't earning much. All in all, he was pretty blue.

"'What you ought to do, it seems to me,' I said, 'is start something on the side that you could handle without interfering with your employer's interests. In time it might develop into something worth while.'

"He shrugged his shoulders: 'I haven't the capital.'

"'It might not take much. Let's see. Isn't there a vacant room at your house that nobody uses?'

"'No.'

"'A basement?'

"'No.'

"'A garage, then, or a barn?'

"He said there was a barn.

"'Why!' I exclaimed, 'you've got capital—first-rate factory space!'

"'But,' he objected, 'what can I do in a barn?'

"'I don't know, exactly,' I said; 'but here's an idea for a starter: The water up and down this railroad is very hard, as you know. You're a chemist. Why not get up a good water softener, and start a little business?'

"He insisted he thought it would take a lot of capital, but said he'd think it over.

"I did not see him again for several months, but when we did meet he wore a cheerful grin.

"'We broke even last month,' he announced.

"'On what?'

"'Water softener!'

"Then I remembered.

"He and his brother, he explained, had taken my hint, were making the water

How to select a perfect Timepiece

THERE is no mechanism so fine as a perfect timepiece; there is none called upon to perform such unfailing service. Prompted to purchase a watch because of its utilitarian purpose, only too often in the final selection beauty alone influences the choice. And yet how quickly that beauty fades when the watch fails to perform its duty—to tell time on time faithfully throughout the years!

Those artisans who build each BULOVA movement are inspired by a great ancestry who, too, were true craftsmen in the watchmaker's art. Each BULOVA movement symbolizes generations of painstaking effort. Its supremacy, its accuracy, rests upon such a background as this!

The design of each case, like all works of art is authentic. Time cannot antiquate it. Whether it be a simple watch for $25.00 or one adorned with jewels for $2500.00, true artists conceived it, true lovers of beauty will choose it.

In selecting a watch, then—influenced by beauty and by accuracy, one should choose a BULOVA—a timepiece that is truly the Aristocrat of Beauty—Autocrat of Time!

Screen Doors Should Stay Closed

If they don't they are not screen doors!
Yet if they slam, they are a nuisance.

Yale No. 570 Household Model is made especially for screen doors and other light doors. You will be surprised at its modest price.

The Yale Door Closer is a door-closing power plant: perfect in action; made with the precision of a smooth-running engine; every part co-ordinated to the quiet closing of a door.

As the door is opened the power of a highly tempered steel spring is stored up waiting for release. As the hand leaves the knob, the spring unwinds, promptly starting the closing action, and at the right moment, controlled by a piston working within its cylinder against hydraulic pressure, the door gradually loses momentum and comes to a quiet stop as the latch-bolt clicks in the jamb.

softener in their spare time, and were finding a modest sale for it.

"'But,' he confessed, 'we're having the dickens of a time with our labels; we can't make them stick on tin cans.'

"'You're not the first,' I answered him, 'to have that trouble. Why, in the name of common sense, being a chemist, don't you get up some good paste that will make labels stick?'

"To cut the story short, he and his brother did develop such a paste. To-day, after several years, they own the largest concern of its kind in the Mid-West, making all kinds of pastes; they no longer have anything to do with water softeners. Their experience illustrates perfectly my idea of sequences. They made a start; and they ended up at a place they never thought of reaching.

"Wherever anything is wasted or unused, there is always opportunity. For example, in the near future it is probable that somebody will introduce radical innovations in methods of illuminating homes and other interiors. Present methods are frightfully wasteful. The ordinary indirect lighting fixture, for instance, is only about three per cent efficient. By that, I mean that something like ninety-seven per cent of the current passes through the bulb and gets away without doing a stroke of lighting work. And of the light produced, perhaps one half is absorbed by walls and furnishings. Therefore, a man trying to read gets on the pages of his book only about one and one-half per cent of the electricity he pays for.

"There are plenty of other opportunities. Look at this."

FROM a drawer of his desk Mr. Hoskins took a card on which were fastened several bottles containing what appeared in daylight to be simple white powders. These, he explained, were refined phosphors, finely-ground phosphorescent earths. Mr. Hoskins has made more thorough studies of phosphors, probably, than anybody else in this country.

"Watch the earth in this bottle as I turn it in the sunlight," he said. "First, it looks perfectly white. I turn it so the earth shifts to a new position, and along the new surface the color is—"

"Gray."

"Yes. And as I hold it still, it turns white again. That is the nature of this material. Now come into this other room."

He opened a closet door. Holding the bottles in the obscurity of the interior, each one glowed distinctly, with a light of its own—purple, yellow, white—like the luminous dial of a watch in the dark.

"The point about these materials," Mr. Hoskins resumed, "is that they are not radio-active, but phosphorescent. The light given off in darkness is due to an entirely different force than radio-activity. I can use these materials as one constituent of a paint, which I put on the walls of my bathroom, and at night, no matter how dark it may be in other rooms not similarly painted, I can see my way perfectly well without the electricity. The light is not sufficient for reading; but it saves your shins!

"We need to know more. Investigations must be carried further. Some way should be found to produce these phosphors very cheaply. With them, or with something similar, it may be that in future we can have our rooms always lit with a cheerful twilight or sunny glow, on even the darkest night. Such a paint would at least dishearten burglars; it might do much more.

"In pursuing this idea, who knows what else it may lead us to? Let's dream a little: Suppose these phosphors are produced cheaply enough to mix them with cement. Suppose our concrete highways in the future are constructed of that cement. Then, it is conceivable that on the darkest nights every highway may be self-lighted, and automobiles may run without headlights night or day.

"It's a dream; yes! But impossible? No! Who would have said, ten years ago, that we would have such a thing as radio in universal use to-day? The most 'practical' scientific man always must be something of a poet, a dreamer. I call my laboratory a 'rainbow factory.' It is just that. Men who care and dare to live, following the trail along such frontiers of thought, can have the most satisfying, thrilling adventures of which I have any knowledge.

"HOW, you may ask, does this philosophy apply to the ordinary man; to a clerk, we'll say, in a big department store? Let's say he is selling ribbons. All right, I'll tell you how it applies to him.

"This ribbon clerk is one kind of man, we'll say. He doesn't care two hoots about ribbons, hates them, hands them out mechanically to customers, does as little as possible for as much pay as he can get, in order that he may have money to spend in leisure, which he wastes futilely. He makes no starts to become interested in ribbons or anything else. He will end his life a ribbon clerk, or something less, as surely as the sun goes down.

"But suppose he is another kind of clerk. He is interested in ribbons, either because he likes them or because he sees in them a means to some end in which he is interested. He studies how ribbons are made; where they come from; the kinds of materials that make the best ribbons. I don't know what will happen in the life of that young man because of that interest; but I know, as surely as two plus two is four, that *some*thing fine will happen. It may be he thinks of a new way to make ribbons, sets up a business, makes a fortune. It may be something wholly different.

"There are sequences in finance and commerce, just as in science and production. The sequence for him may be advancement to a position as buyer, to managership of a division, to general managership, to presidency—all tracing back inevitably to an interest in something beyond the day's routine.

"The truth is, no one of us can foretell how things will be done ten years hence.

"No! Not all the chances have vanished—not all the ideas have been thought of—not all the opportunities have been seized—not all the great businesses have been built—not all the fortunes have been founded.

"I think we have gone only a little way. The future is so full of things to be done, of trails to be broken, that I, though I have lived sixty-five years, wish I could look forward to sixty-five more for 'rainbow chasing'!"

Lasting Cleanliness

with this paint enamel

Ordinary Flat Finish White Paint

Barreled Sunlight Gloss Finish

The microscope shows the difference

These photographs of paint surfaces were made through a powerful microscope. The astonishing contrast shows why Barreled Sunlight is so easy to keep clean. Smooth, unbroken and non-porous, it resists dirt and washes like tile.

WHEN the "Wet Paint" sign is taken down, behold the beauty of clean white walls and woodwork! But for how long?

If it's ordinary paint, it will soon become hopelessly dirty. But if it's Barreled Sunlight, occasional washing will keep it spotless for years. For this satin-smooth finish can't hold dirt embedded.

Handsome as the finest enamel, but costs less and completes a job with fewer coats.

Guaranteed to remain white longest.

Quantity for quantity, Barreled Sunlight covers a larger area. And it is so easy to apply with brush or spray that many labor-hours are saved.

In Gloss, Semi-Gloss and Flat. Cans and drums. Where more than one coat is required, apply Barreled Sunlight Undercoat first.

Beautiful tints can readily be obtained by adding oil colors to Barreled Sunlight. Ask about the new easy-mixing Barreled Sunlight Tinting Colors in tubes.

CORONA

has helped this salesman double his earnings

TWO years ago his wife gave him a Corona for Christmas. Now he credits Corona with 100% increase in his monthly earnings. Here are just a few of the ways it has helped him.

1 Letters to customers he expects to see later in the week. Many times a buyer will hold over an order, knowing this man is on his way.

2 Little notes of appreciation for orders just received or a reminder of some point omitted during his call.

3 Reports to the Home Office about conditions in the territory, credits, etc. All his reports are neat, legible and concise. Several salary increases have been the direct result of this.

Think of the ways you could use Corona to make the most of your job, whatever it is! Mail the coupon now! You will receive, free, a valuable new book, The Writer's Guide.

"He hadn't considered that. Few of us do. The standards of the past generation can't be considered in gauging activities of the present. Where we live, and how we live, and what we are physically, are the factors which determine our capacities."

Doctor Wharton's business at the University of Pennsylvania is largely that of determining human capacities. During his thirty years there he has examined and rated thousands of young men, graduates who have come back to him for advice, and friends whom they have sent to him. An entire morning we sat together and discussed this work.

"Suppose we begin with the heart," he suggested. "No two hearts are exactly alike in capacity. For classification purposes here we give the heart three ratings: A, B, and C. These might be likened to the horse-power ratings of automobile motors. The 'A' motor, let us say, is of 90-horse-power; the 'B' motor of 60-horse-power, and the 'C' motor of 30-horse-power. Each is a good, sound, dependable motor. There is absolutely nothing wrong with it. But give the 30-horse-power motor (or heart) a task which it takes a 90-horse-power motor (or heart) to perform, and it will simply refuse to perform it. You wouldn't think of putting a little 4-cylinder engine into a 5-ton truck; but because nature occasionally does this very thing with hearts, we've got to be on the lookout for the inconsistency.

"Then take the nervous system. A highly temperamental, tightly-strung, excitable-natured boy will burn up several times the energy that would be used by a phlegmatic, easy-going, unexcitable type of boy. The first may become a sprinter, and a star at it. The second may become a cross-country runner, and star. But let them change places, and you need little imagination to picture their failures.

"I recall twins who were students here. I never saw two men more exactly alike in appearance. Yet they were no more related as to capacities than the ox and the deer.

"WHAT we do here is to try, not to find out what men are when they are sitting calmly in a chair, but to find out what they are in action, under stress. Your daily life is a series of strains which come to you in work, in exercise, in amusement. How much of this daily round can you stand, and what rest should you get properly to stand it? We try to find that out about our students. It is a good thing for anyone to know about himself.

"The fault with the old-fashioned physical examination as given by the average doctor in the past was that it didn't take capacity into account. You went into the doctor's office and sat down quietly in a chair. He then listened to your heart, measured your pulse, ascertained your blood pressure, performed his entire examination while you sat at your ease.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

"But in active life you are not at ease. That is why we have devised tests that show the individual's reaction to strain.

"Most of the students who come to the university wish to engage in some form of sport. Our object is to direct them to sports to which they are mentally and physically fitted. We get at the facts concerning their capacities in a way that your family physician could be asked to do for you.

"First, we examine the student physically while he is lying down and relaxed. In this position he is under practically no strain. A record is made of his heart, pulse, and blood pressure, on an individual card which is preserved throughout his stay at college.

"Second, he is asked to rise suddenly to his feet, an action that at once introduces a strain. Immediately, as he stands, the effect of this strain upon his heart, pulse, nerves, and blood pressure is noted, and the time ascertained that it takes him to return to his normal.

"Third, the student is directed to go through the motions of running, a process we call 'pumping him up.' After a moment or so of exertion, say, twenty or thirty running steps, he is stopped, and his heart, pulse and blood pressure are again noted, with the time required for a return to normal. If this test is satisfactory, he is directed to greater exertion of the same kind, checked up at the end of it as before, and the performance repeated until we have reached a fair estimate of the physical capacity of the man.

"As I said before, these tests can be given by any good physician who is equipped with the proper medical instruments. The more thorough his knowledge of you, the more satisfactory will be his examination. For this reason the family physician is preferable.

"AT THE close of the examination especially I keep my eye on what the boy does. If he simply takes the test as a part of the day's work, and saunters away without a question, the chances are that he won't be particularly successful in sports. At any rate, he lacks the enthusiasm and eager interest that are essential to leadership in any endeavor. But the boy who waits, watches his chance, and asks, 'Doctor, how did I make out?' is in earnest, and that is a point in his favor.

"In the end, we have a good preliminary estimate of a boy's mental capacity and attitude, of his nervous capacity, his heart capacity, and his muscular capacity. We have an idea, gained by casual questions, of his likes and dislikes; and, by direct questions, of his ancestry, of his parentage, and his medical history. This information is supplemented by further observation during his stay at college. All facts are recorded on his individual card according to points.

"The highest number of points to be made under the scoring system that we use is 18; but not five men in a hundred will score that total. Ten points or below indicate danger somewhere, and the particular danger is recorded. Thus, we are in a position to guard against his weakness and, if possible, to eliminate it. Usually, we are frank with the boy, not in order to frighten him but in order to win his coöperation. Remember, you only "YOU quickly form the habit of answering letters immediately on first reading. This gives them your best thought and gets them off your mind. You don't wait until several accumulate, 'So it will pay to call a stenographer,' and then waste your stenographer's time and your own while you re-read the letters to refresh your memory.

"That is, you gain all these advantages if you use The Dictaphone," says Byron W. Moser, President of the Security National Bank, St. Louis.

"In our offices," he continues, "Dictaphones save our executives so much time ordinarily wasted in running about, in conferences and in other ways that none would think of doing without them.

"I think any business man makes a mistake if he does not use Dictaphones in his offices all down the line."

To business women, the testimony of Mathilde M. Woltjen, Secretary to Mr. Moser and Manager of the Women's Department of the Bank, is hardly less impressive. She says:

"Today I seldom do transcribing myself. I should not be holding my present position if I had not been a Dictaphone secretary. The Dictaphone gave me time and opportunity to show that I could handle many duties and thus become more valuable to the bank.

"We simply couldn't get along without The Dictaphone in my department. I always advise business women to use Dictaphones."

"Cheer up, Ed; a couple of years ago I changed four tires at once and I haven't had any tire trouble since."

"What—changed four tires at once?"

"Yes, for a set of Kelly-Springfields."

waste the time of your doctor and yourself if you are not willing to follow his advice.

"At numerous times we have had proof of the efficacy of our rating system. We sent a relay team to England, for instance, to compete in a race there. Before the team left, I subjected each man to examination. The first made 17 points; the second and third 14 points each, and the fourth and fifth 13 points each. The men finished, as to time in the race, exactly in that order. They showed reaction to the ocean voyage and climatic change in that order.

"A RATHER remarkable story is connected with one of the members of this team, which indicates how capacity may be intelligently developed and increased. Upon examining the man when he entered college, I discovered that a heart valve was undersized but without any sign of disease. I explained to him that his condition wasn't serious, and that if he worked along with me faithfully we probably would be able to correct it.

"I'm a great believer in letting folks do what they most want to do, a thing which they go at with enthusiasm and enjoyment. I asked him what he most wanted to do.

"'Ever since I was a kid,' he said, 'I've wanted to become a cross-country runner.'

"It was about the last sport, under the circumstances, that I wanted him to suggest. It was far beyond the capacity of his heart, handicapped as it was by the under-sized valve.

"But he stuck to his assertion.

"'Very well,' I said finally. 'Provided you will do exactly as I tell you to do without question, I'll make you a cross-country runner. But it's going to take time.'

"'I'll do just as you say,' he promised eagerly.

"I sent him over to the gymnasium, had him put on running trunks, and walk around the indoor track as the starter for his training. Gradually, I let him increase the pace of his walk. Presently I let him jog about the track easily, then a little faster, and still faster. This training went on for months, during which the boy was kept under regular observation. The heart valve, slowly, surely, began to enlarge a trifle.

"A year went by, and as yet he had not even entered a race of any kind. But he was better. I let him try the outdoor track, and, as he continued to improve, I permitted him to enter a cross-country race.

"'But you're not going to win this race,' I instructed him. 'You are not even going to try to win it. I simply want you to jog along as you feel like it, at your own pace, without making any effort to keep up with the rest. And, remember, you're to quit the moment you get tired.'

"Well, he entered every cross-country race of that year. His repeated entries in the face of failure became quite a joke among the students.

"'Let 'em laugh,' I comforted. 'Next year you'll start to show 'em something.'

"He dragged in miles behind the slowest. But no man ever obeyed orders more faithfully. As soon as he tired he stopped and rested.

The choice of thousands on these five vital features

Women particularly like the Whippet because of its unusually roomy and comfortable interior. There is actually more leg room than in any other car of this size or type.

THE great nation-wide popularity of the Whippet is of interest to every man, who is going to buy a car this year. It is a story of success without parallel in American motor car experience. Before you invest your money in any automobile you are entitled to know the facts . . . The Whippet isn't just an old car brought up-to-date. It is completely new—designed and built scientifically to correct modern traffic and driving difficulties that cars of this price class do not adequately meet. A car without precedent—yet with a background of 18 successful years of engineering experience.

Into 100¼-inches of wheelbase are concentrated every major engineering lesson of the past decade. You get speed—55 miles an hour is all we claim—but Whippet owners frequently tell us they get better than 60—faster than many light sixes—and in safety and comfort.

You get economy—we claim 30 miles on a gallon—Cannonball Baker, one of the world's most expert drivers, averaged 43.28 miles on a gallon in a drive from Los Angeles to New York this past winter. You get riding comfort that no other car can equal—a yardstick will prove this beyond all doubt—the Whippet actually has more leg room than any other car of its size or type.

Just imagine what this saving will mean to you in a single year. "30 miles on a gallon of gasoline"—well over 1,000 miles on a gallon of oil, with remarkably low upkeep expense.

And finally you get the necessary safety and protection of 4-wheel brakes. We say necessary advisedly. The whole trend is that way. At the 1925 Automobile Show 44.3% of the chassis were equipped with 4-wheel brakes. In 1926, 63.2%. And in 1927, 86%. Surely, no car is modern without 4-wheel brakes today. A year from now its resale value is bound to suffer.

Low-swung, graceful, distinctive. The Whippet's height and length are in true symmetrical proportion. It will park at a 14-foot curb. Gabriel Snubbers add to your riding and driving ease. Clear vision corner posts enable you to see both sides of the road.

To body engineering has been brought this same creative viewpoint. The Whippet sounds a new note in its low roof lines, the smart taper of the hood, the full sweep of the body, the low gravity center. Out of the crowd of cars you see on American highways, this one stands out. Smart, distinctive, colorful. Whippet-driving has become the vogue.

The Whippet is now available in six distinctive body styles—at new low prices that millions can afford. Touring $625; Roadster $695; Coach $625; Coupe $625; Sedan $725; Landau $755. Prices f. o. b. factory. Prices and specifications subject to change without notice. Willys-Overland, Inc., Toledo, Ohio. Willys-Overland Sales Co., Ltd., Toronto, Canada.

4-wheel brakes enable the Whippet to stop in 51 feet from a speed of 40 miles an hour. They provide 192 square inches of braking surface—far more per pound of car weight than any other light car built today.

"At the end of the third year he was finishing among the leaders. The heart valve had grown almost to normal. No longer did he need to stop for rests. And when the trials were held of candidates for the relay team that was to be sent to England, he qualified by coming in second!

"I SAID something a while ago about how seldom we exceed our working capacity, though overwork is one of the accepted modern excuses for a nervous breakdown. I return to that because of another case which comes to mind here. It shows very clearly how easy it is to dissipate energy by modern living.

"A man I have in mind was in his fifties, and a famous breeder and trainer of horses. One day while at his work, which was performed largely on horseback, he collapsed. The physician who was summoned hurriedly diagnosed his illness as a nervous breakdown due to overwork.

"After a period in the hospital under the most careful treatment, he was sent to a health sanitarium for rest. Next he visited famous baths and health resorts. For months he was under the care of doctors. Eventually, when he was returned home, still a wreck of his former vigorous self, he was under strict orders never to mount a horse again, to avoid doing this and that, to eat only certain prescribed foods, and to keep away from all excitement.

"One day a mutual friend called my attention to the man. We were at a horse show. The invalid was on foot. He walked like a man of advanced age, spoke in a weak voice, and appeared literally to be dying on his feet.

"'Can't you do something for him?' asked the friend. 'I think he's dying of a broken heart.'

"I asked him to explain.

"'The one thing he loves most in this world,' he replied, 'is a good saddle horse. And he has been ordered, if he hopes to live, never to throw leg over a saddle again. That knowledge of never riding again has broken his heart.'

"The sick man and I got together shortly and had a long talk. I persuaded him to be frank with me, to tell me everything about his old life before the breakdown. I discovered that he had not been doing an unreasonable amount of work, and that he had worked because he loved it. He was never happier than when on a horse and directing horsemen.

"But he smoked entirely too many cigars. He was an inveterate coffee drinker, consuming a dozen and more cups of coffee a day. He was socially popular, and his evenings were a continual round of social engagements—bridge parties, theatre parties, dance parties. He had seldom got to bed before two o'clock in the morning. At six he was up and out for a morning ride, after which he started his day's work.

"He had not broken down from overwork. He had been broken by overpleasure, by too little sleep, by too many stimulants! He had not played fifty-fifty with nature.

"We formulated a program. It embraced a re-creation of his old life in mod ration. 'You may ride,' I instructed; 'but don't ride as much or as hard as you did. You may smoke; but your limit henceforth is three cigars a day. Keep just a third of your social engagements; but go home before eleven. Sleep until you wake up. Let nature take care of the amount of sleep you get. Eat what you like, but don't overeat.' And I advised him how to restrict his diet and still enjoy his food.

"Within a year he was doing almost as much work as he had ever done, and he insisted that he 'never had felt better in his life.' He looked well, slept well, ate well, was happy. In fact, he felt in such fine fettle that he began to revert to his former life.

"'I'm all right now,' he argued. 'Why should it hurt me?'

"'It wouldn't,' I warned, 'if you were still young. Youth would give you recuperation. But you're no longer young. Your previous excesses have burned you out, lessened your capacity. If you step over the line beyond moderation again you'll crack, and the next time that happens you won't be able to come back.'

"Understand, he was once more doing almost as much work as he had ever done, but he was indulging in only a fraction of his old pleasures. And under this program he stayed in excellent shape, considering what he had been through. But as soon as he went back to the full round of pleasure, as he did go back, he lasted only a few months.

"WHEN a man comes into this office and tells me he is not getting on well in his work, that his work tires him out, and that he fears he is over-working, the first thing I want to know is what he is doing with his time outside of working hours. Every activity dissipates energy. Play dissipates it as surely as does work. You can't keep late hours, smoke, drink, and eat to excess, and play to excess, and then charge resultant aches up to work.

"The secret of health is moderation, not in one or two things, but in everything. Lack of health, lack of happiness, or lack of achievement invariably is a warning of immoderation. Too much rest is just as bad as too much of anything else.

"'How many hours of sleep do I need?' is a question frequently asked.

"That is a question that each individual must determine for himself. It is governed by the amount of energy he expends when he is awake. If you are tired and sleepy when you arise in the morning, don't blame it on the hour necessity compels you to arise, but put the blame where it belongs—on the hour that you went to bed.

"It may surprise you when I say that we can't get too much sleep. If you don't believe this, shut off the alarm clock, hang a do-not-disturb sign on your bedroom door, and turn in. Nature will awake you when you have slept enough. She is an unfailing alarm clock. For myself, I need ten hours' sleep nightly. I am of a nervous disposition that burns up that amount of energy each day. But I don't make up those extra two hours by lying abed in the morning; I go to bed two hours earlier at night.

"Most folks believe that they can rob sleep to-night and make it up by an extra-long stretch to-morrow night. Unfortunately, that can't be done. Sleep once lost is lost forever. It can't be made up. That part of your vitality, or energy, given you to cover your lifetime has been expended beyond recall. It is just so much taken from your storehouse. You may not miss it now, but you will when you pass the sixty mark.

"TO-DAY there seems to be a fad to be thin.

"Many people in middle age and beyond are the worst and most serious offenders in the matter of reducing," continued Doctor Wharton. "Nature intentionally, with most folks, adds weight with years. The layer of fat that becomes most noticeable over the stomach is furnished for additional warmth and protection to vital organs, and to compensate for the fact that with age the body generates less warmth. A little fat, at forty, is no sign of physical degeneration.

"What should be your normal weight? The weight that is the result of normal living, of living that practices moderation and has due regard for capacity in everything.

"It is a good plan, about every six months, to subject yourself to an impartial analysis. As a starter, make a list of your most common activities, of the things which you do regularly; and don't overlook your meals, the stimulants in which you indulge, such as tobacco, coffee, tea, and the like, and your hours of rising and retiring. Now check over the list; stand off in judgment over yourself. Which of these activities give you the most pleasure? Which of them bore you? If you get up with a bad taste in your mouth, what thing that you did was responsible for it? Do you sleep well? Eat well? If not, scan that list most carefully, and before you conclude to blame the trouble on your liver, your heart, or some other physical deficiency, see if you can't find a clue to it from the list.

"Experiment with your routine, if this seems necessary. Cut down here, add a little there. You know, far better than anyone can tell you, which of your activities is most likely to be of harm to you. We humans are peculiarly sensitive instruments. Invariably, there is registered somewhere or somehow in our consciousness a warning that the things which are not good for us, as individuals, are not right. Have will power enough to stop when common sense, or instinct, or conscience, warns you that you should stop.

"Balance your activities as carefully as you can alone, with the resolve that, while you are going to continue getting a lot of fun out of life, you are going to be sensible about getting it. Next, visit your physician and see what he has to say about you and your program. The time to go to him is now, when you are well!"

FREE, gratis and for nothing, Ellis Parker Butler tells you next month "Ten Ways to Make a Fool of Yourself." From that time in zero weather, when little Ellis licked an iron pillar that held up a porch two stories above the street, he has been testing out a number of ways in which one can achieve asininity. Any one of these ten ways offered are guaranteed to give full and complete satisfaction.

A new, improved ignition service —within the reach of every motorist

The Moto Meter Spark Plug with its self-adjusting spark gap, represents the greatest advance in spark plug design in 20 years.

The advantage of a small gap for starting and a wide gap for running, now available in this plug, is recognized and appreciated everywhere. The ordinary spark plug must necessarily be a compromise because its set, fixed gap cannot vary its performance to treat two such dissimilar conditions as starting and running.

With the Moto Meter Self-adjusting Spark Plug easy starting and smooth running are assured because the original gap of 15 thousandths of an inch increases to 30 thousandths the instant the engine starts. When the ignition is turned off, the gap adjusts itself to the original small opening. Its performance is unfailing.

Being a Moto Meter product, the motoring public may safely assume that other features which contribute to its remarkable performance, such as its new process insulator, double threaded terminal post, gauge, anti-rust shell, etc., reflect the high standard of quality that has been identified always with the famous Boyce Moto Meter.

The Moto Meter Self-adjusting Spark Plug offers a super-ignition service at a cost virtually that of ordinary plugs. Install a set in your own car; enjoy the thrill of improved motor performance; we know you will agree it is a real achievement.

When you press your foot on the starter—why do the lights go down?

Night or day, when you press your foot on the starter, a great amount of current is used to turn the engine; as a consequence, very little finds its way to the spark gap.

While starting, a battery may be only 60% efficient—a reduced voltage, just when maximum power is most needed; logically with such a condition a small spark gap is essential, to insure quick ignition and prevent drain on the battery.

Sprayed Rubber producing plant on a U. S. Rubber Plantation in Sumatra

Why does Sprayed Rubber give so much more to the car owner?

SPRAYED RUBBER gives more to the car owner because it gives him longer wearing tires.

It is stronger, more uniform, purer.

It is made from a specially fine rubber latex. It is produced by a new and exact mechanical method —and without the use of either smoke or acid.

The United States Rubber Company invented this method specifically to make better tires. Just as they established the United States Rubber Plantations in 1909 to improve the quality of their rubber supply.

By creating finer rubber, new methods of producing the rubber and of building it into tires, this Company is creating better tires all along the line.

Will These Tests Make You Change Your Job?

analysis,' but I am convinced that we have found a certain relationship between body form and bulk as related to the length of the limbs, which at least gives us a hunch as to whether a man, especially under twenty-five, is an introvert or extrovert. However, I will tell you more about that later.

"While our complete introversion-extroversion examination covers forty-eight questions, I believe I can give you a good idea of how to score yourself on them and what the questions really signify, by discussing some twenty sample questions in detail. For instance, if you answer eleven of these questions with a yes, you tend towards introversion. If you answer thirteen of them with a yes, it shows you lean rather heavily toward introversion; and the chances are three to one that you would not make a good salesman or a good foreman. Of course, you might pull through; many introverts do pull through as salesmen or as executives, but they are never really happy at their jobs. These are not the jobs that give introverts one hundred per cent self-realization.

"If, on the other hand, you answer thirteen of these questions with a no, you are undoubtedly a decided extrovert, and the chances are three to one that you will fail as a college student. I mean by that, that among those who do fail as college students, three times as many are extroverts as introverts. Being a college student simply isn't their sort of job.

"Let us take an extreme example: We had a student who had plenty of intelligence, but who had the greatest difficulty with his college work. Finally, he dropped out and by hook or crook worked his way around the world. He came back to college but again did very poor work.

"I ADVISED him to try sales work or to get a job handling men. He answered a want ad and was soon selling washing machines from house to house in Utica. He instantly proved to be a 'whiz' and made one hundred and fifty dollars the first week. He jumped to New York with this stake, and secured a job soliciting advertising, where he hit a fast pace.

Within six months after he left school he went back to his native town of fifteen thousand people in central New York as manager of the daily newspaper, which was on the verge of bankruptcy. That was only a year ago. His newspaper is now on a substantial basis; he is a director of the Chamber of Commerce, a Rotarian, and the principal fellow in his town to get things done.

"Now, what a pity it would have been to force that extrovert boy through college! Of course, not all extroverts are going to do this well, but it indicates that our introversion-extroversion tests have some value, at least in keeping a man out of the wrong job.

"Let us discuss these twenty questions

Greater "Stopability" at Lower List Prices to Car Owners

AS A RULE, the leading product in its field is the most expensive. Thermoid is an exception to that rule. It is a better product which actually costs the consumer less.

Today Thermoid is better than ever. The outstanding hydraulic compressed brake lining. The type almost universally recognized by automotive engineers as the best for four-wheel brakes. And equally effective for two-wheel brakes.

Yet the hearty cooperation of the progressive garageman and our improved manufacturing methods make possible lower list prices to the car owner.

For your next re-lining job, look for the garage showing the Thermoid Service Sign. There you will get the dependable brake lining, installed right at the right price. Why pay more when you can get the best for less?

Thermoid Hydraulic Compressed Brake Lining is sold at 37% less than the old high list prices to car owners.
Thermoid Interwoven Brake Lining sells at 50% lower. Note these typical examples:

which I spoke of as good samples, in some detail. You might gather the idea at first that we are unfavorable to the introverts. That is not true. The introverts do just as big work as the extroverts. One class is also just as intelligent as the other. Some introverts are brilliant and some are dumb-bells. The same is true of extroverts. The tragedy is an introvert in an extrovert job or vice versa.

"My first question is this: (A 'yes' answer indicates introversion, 'no' indicates extroversion.)

(1) Do you shift jobs during the day?

"The extrovert plows right through the jobs of the day. The introvert is inclined to tinker with his car a few minutes, then look at the furnace, then putter around his back yard, and then get back to his car. The extrovert sticks at the car until he gets it running.

(2) Are you inclined to forget the feelings of others?

"Not long ago I was at a scientific meeting when a certain distinguished scientist was suggested to head an important committee. All present threw up their hands in horror, and said, 'If you put that man on the committee, it will be just one continual rag-chewing.'

"Now I know that man to be an extreme introvert. The introvert is much more likely to tell you the blunt truth. He doesn't understand the feelings of others. He should understand them, for while he is outspoken himself, yet his own feelings are more sensitive than those of the extrovert. It is a sort of incongruity. The extrovert may think something offensive, but he keeps it to himself. The introvert works well alone, but is not a good diplomat.

(3) Do you keep yourself in the background at social affairs?

"The introvert actually wants to be a wallflower. Even if he can dance, he prefers to sit it out. He will not reach out for friends, and expects the other fellow to make all the advances.

(4) In social conversation, are you usually a mere listener?

"Your introvert likes to think, especially to day-dream, but he doesn't care to put his thinking into words. He may think better and wiser things than the extrovert, but just doesn't say them. All youngsters, for instance, are more extrovert than old people. They have not yet become reflective and self-centered.

(5) Do you ever try not to lend things?

"Here is something very interesting about that: While women in general are more introvert than men, yet they are usually more free in making loans. Moral: When you want to borrow, borrow from your sister. This shows up in the way girl friends wear each other's clothes. Men do not wear each other's clothes.

"Your hard-headed cashier at the bank is usually an introvert. The man at the pay window, who has to be affable to every customer, is usually an extrovert. Yet while introverts are tighter about loaning money, they pay up more promptly than extroverts. Moral again: Borrow from an extrovert—lend to an introvert.

(6) When praised, do you work much better?

Leads the World in Motor Car Value

The Superlative Value of Its Field

With the Vital Advantage of a 7-Bearing Motor

From every viewpoint this new Light Six model completely outclasses any other car in its field.

It is the ONLY car of its type at less than $1,000 powered with a 7-bearing crankshaft motor—the world's smoothest type. This, alone, means absolute supremacy in power-smoothness and power-quietness throughout the full range of performance.

And added to such sensational performance-ability, this new car owns such rare distinction in appearance and such splendid equipment that its superiority is apparent at a glance. The body is noteworthy not only for its grace of line, but in its quality of workmanship. For it has the genuine wood-frame construction employed in the costliest cars of America and Europe. Doors are especially big and broad, and the front seats are of the luxurious parlor-car type.

Four-wheel brakes that are the most efficient known to the industry; 5 disc wheels; an oil purifier; an air cleaner; and many other important attractions are included in the amazingly low price placed on this model. (5045)

"The introvert craves praise, and often actually fishes for compliments.

"It is mostly a waste of time to pass out compliments to extroverts.

(7) In your daily actions, such as walking, talking, dressing, eating, are you usually deliberate and slow?

"The fellow who walks down the street, his heels thumping hard every time they hit the pavement, his coat tails flapping as he turns the corner, is probably an extrovert. It is an introvert characteristic to be reserved in action. When the extrovert gets under pressure, he hurries; the introvert often gets rattled and blows up.

"We had thought that the extrovert, being more rapid, would meet with more accidents. But our investigations indicate no difference. It may be that the introvert, plugging along at twenty miles an hour in his car, meets with accidents because he is day-dreaming; the extrovert gets his because he is going forty miles an hour.

(8) Do you usually work out things without asking help?

"When the introvert goes to repair his automobile, he likes to think it out himself. He would rather blunder along than ask his neighbor, who could maybe fix his car in a minute. He sometimes carries self-reliance too far.

"We found that the men in factories who make the delicate, fine tools are almost to a man introverts. They are thinkers and designers. They resent interference. It is common knowledge among factory executives that tool makers are a hard bunch to handle. They call it temperament, but that is just their name for introversion.

(9) In personal appearance, do you try to follow fashions closely?

"For instance, have you noticed that there are almost no men's fashion magazines? There are a number of women's magazines in this field. This is probably related to the fact that we have found women as a rule more introvert than men, and introverts follow fashions more than extroverts do. Of course problems of sex are also involved here.

(10) Do you keep your personal property in good repair, and give it close attention?

"When I see an automobile going down the street, all spick and span, I say to myself, 'That man probably tends toward introversion; I would not try to borrow money from him.' However, if he were a lawyer, he would probably be the kind I should like to have prepare a brief; or if an architect, the kind I should like to have plan and design the details of my house, but not the man to build it. In contrast, when I see a car rattling along about two miles ahead of the junk heap, with the driver wearing a face like a million dollars, I say, 'There is probably a good salesman or a good foreman—an extrovert.'

(11) Has the opposite sex proved uninteresting to you?

"Bachelors and women who do not marry are more likely to be of the introvert type.

"The introvert has a much harder time in throwing off his love disappointments than the extrovert. Your introvert falls in love more deeply. He builds his whole home and future around one girl. If he loses her, it throws all of his thinking out of gear. The introvert woman is the same way. The extrovert says, 'I should worry; there are plenty more fish in the sea.'

(12) When physical courage has been needed, have you been frightened?

"The introvert makes a poor policeman or fireman. In a tight place he loses his head. There is too much action for him. The extreme extrovert is also just as bad, because of his foolhardiness. Moreover, the automobilists who hog the whole road, regardless of other people, are mostly extroverts. It is not malice, but just the recklessness of their emotional lives.

(13) Do you like to speak in public?

"Nearly every organization has a few men who are always jumping up and making speeches and offering motions and resolutions. These fellows are extroverts. They like to hear their own voices. The introvert may think more wisely and cautiously, and in the end determine the safest action, but it is hard for him to speak in public.

(14) Do you prefer to work alone or with others?

"This is a relative of question eight. The introvert finds himself good company, while the extrovert craves companionship.

"Of course a good deal of introversion and of extroversion is probably acquired—due to habits, education, and circumstances. How much is due to heredity and how much to environment is pretty difficult to say. I know a famous woman who was extremely introvert. She found it was getting her nowhere and making her life unhappy. So she took herself in hand, and forced an interest in other people. She is now a pretty good extrovert and personally much happier. Any person can do wonders in educating his emotions and personal attitudes.

(15) Do you like delicate, painstaking work, rather than coarse, rough work?

"The man who polishes diamonds, or the surgeon who likes to perform delicate operations on the ear, eye, or brain tends toward the introvert type. In contrast, the man who builds his own garage in a half day out of rough lumber shows the extrovert type. The extrovert is the promoter, the man who is interested in bold strokes. However, he is a poor man to figure out the details of a financial promotion, such as retirement, interest, amortization, maturity.

"The typical extrovert is the ideal salesman; the introvert is a splendid man to write the advertising copy—he likes to play with ideas. Some great executives are ambiverts; they are strong both in thinking and planning and working out minute details, and yet are decisive in action. You might speak of them as intellectual, thinking extroverts—good both in thought and action.

(16) Do you enjoy arguing?

"When two extroverts meet, they sell real estate or something else. When two introverts meet, they start an argument.

"The introvert argues for the sake of arguing. He just naturally takes the opposite side.

"Your extrovert doesn't waste much time arguing; he is always going to do big things, and very often does. He is the

As Thrilling in Beauty as in Performance

In appearance and value, as well as performance, Hudson is the most talked of car of the year. It has captured public imagination as no other car ever shown. Its dramatic welcome rapidly swept to new sales peaks, far exceeding the greatest factory output Hudson ever produced. And this leadership is still ascending on nation wide acknowledgment of the new meaning which the released Super-Six principle gives to performance.

The Super-Six has the smoothness of an electric motor. Four years' development led to full release of its capacity in power, stamina and safety. Your Hudson Super-Six never extends itself. It always has reserve power for the approaching hill or for greater speed. And its four-wheel brakes with the flexibility of the motor permit a flashing nimbleness you will like.

Are 'Sales' Necessary?

This Merchant Doesn't Believe In Holding Sales—and He's Made a Big Success

HOW can this merchant do a yearly business that's bigger than many big-city stores—when his store is located in a town of only 2600?

What are the secrets of his success? And why is it that in spite of his big volume of business he's never held a sale?

He Tells—

This store's methods have been so successful that Farm & Fireside went to the man who owns it and asked for the facts—in order to make them available to retail merchants generally.

For this is the kind of information that every wide-awake dealer in the country is interested in today: How to increase sales—how to speed up turnover—and how to spread the influence of the store over a much wider area, just as this New York State merchant has done.

Big Farm Trade

One of the most striking bits of information this merchant gave us was that no less than 75 per cent of his total volume of sales comes in from farmers.

That means he has taken unusual care to cultivate this class of business.

But what of the merchandising methods he uses to pile up his profits?

How does he display goods, for instance — so that people just naturally can't help but come in and buy?

DEALERS: Send the Coupon!

Get the Secrets of this Store's Success

Farm & Fireside's interview with this successful merchant is presented in folder form — and you can obtain a copy FREE by returning the attached coupon.

All these facts—together with a dozen other vital merchandising secrets—are told in folder form as a result of Farm & Fireside's interview with this merchant.

Get this Story

For instance — you can know why he's able to draw farm trade from a 20-mile radius—how he handles time-payment selling—what he's learned about effective merchandise arrangement—and about the store alteration that resulted in a big, healthy increase in his sales volume.

This store's methods are all practical, workable, tried and proven by the test of time and results. Any retail merchant who wants to increase his farm trade can use them to advantage.

The facts are all available to you in this folder.

Part of Farm & Fireside's 1927 Service to Retailers

This is the second chapter in Farm & Fireside's 1927 service to the retailers of the United States. And it's a rounding out of the service which retailers who sell the farmer expect from this magazine—for three basic reasons:

1. Over a period of years merchants have come to look on Farm & Fireside as the farm magazine of national authority and influence.

   They know its circulation reaches more than 1,200,000 farm homes—an average of one for about every two farms of a hundred acres and over throughout the country. And this means it is read by the cream of every rural retailer's local trade.
2. Retailers know that Farm & Fireside has a highly personal character—and that it is read with warmer interest than probably any other farm magazine.
3. And finally because of these facts, they know that the advertising pages of Farm & Fireside are working every minute to build more sales for them. And they have demonstrated this over and over by holding local exhibitions of the goods advertised in Farm & Fireside—to show how Farm & Fireside readers BUY.

The proof of these three fundamental values is the growth of manufacturers' advertising in Farm & Fireside—a faster growth than that of any other magazine in the field.

So in meeting the obligation to retail merchants and advertisers, which such leadership confers—Farm & Fireside will make available the business methods which successful retailers have used in building farm trade—as in the case of this store that never holds a sale.

man who builds a house on five hundred dollars cash. The simon-pure introvert, however, doesn't begin to build until he has all the money, or more, in the bank.

"For all these reasons, your extrovert makes the best foreman. One of my former students, who is now superintendent of a brickyard, tried an experiment on this. He put an introvert in charge of one crew and an extrovert in charge of another—both crews doing the same kind of work.

"At the end of ten hours, the men under the introvert were on the verge of striking. Indeed, they agreed to come back the next day only after the superintendent promised them another foreman. But the extrovert kept his men in good humor and working hard.

(17) Are you cautious in making new friends?

"We have boys here who go through the whole four years of college, and hardly know a soul. We have others who know everybody by their first names the first month they land here.

"In some old Eastern towns, nearly all the extroverts have moved to the cities. The remaining inhabitants are uncommunicative. You know it is nearly impossible for a stranger to get acquainted in those places. I have often wondered what would happen if an introvert moved into an introvert town. He would probably remain lonesome the rest of his life.

(18) Are you inclined to choose associates who are below you in physical size?

"Nearly everyone wants to be a leader, and as a rule a leader is a big person physically, although not always. I have noticed that persons of extremely small stature try to show their leadership by choosing friends of much greater size than themselves. Also, persons of very small stature are likely to be introverts. This may be due to their being self-conscious of this one thing. They try to offset it by wearing high hats or clothes that make them look tall. We have also found that a noticeably small person tends to buy a big car. It gives him a sense of size, importance, and leadership.

"As an instance of this, we had a student, a decided extrovert, who went out to a Wyoming town to sell automobiles. They called him the 'Dude from the East,' but he outsold every competitor. One day one of his competitors had a car almost sold to a man who was scarcely five feet tall. Our 'Dude from the East' got the biggest car he had, and parked it by the side of the small car of his competitor. He then asked the short man to stand in front of the two. He instantly chose the big car.

"Now, this is all exactly in line with our work. This big car gave that man self-realization. And in one way or another we are all just like him. If we are not short on stature, we are short on something else, and we want the feeling of dignity, power, and greatness. The introvert takes his way of getting these things, and the extrovert takes his way. But if you carry either side to the extreme, you'll find it a severe handicap to your self-realization. Nearly all of us lean either toward the introversion end or the extroversion end of the scale, though few, perhaps, balance dangerously one way or the other. Whether these tendencies are inborn or

A SINGLE trip to the drugstore—a single bottle of Zonite on the bathroom shelf. And yet the whole family, through that one purchase, comes into possession of a well-equipped medicine chest plus a whole regiment of toilet necessities. Such a family may well feel thoroughly barricaded on all sides against disease.

Not that Zonite pretends to do many different things. Its wide range of usefulness simply means it does one thing extremely well, and that is: it kills germs. These germs naturally differ in character. Some enter through a cut or break in the skin, causing blood-poison. Some exist in drinking water. Others colonize on the mucous membranes that line the cavities of the body. For instance, the lining of the throat and nose is the favorite breeding ground for the germs that accompany colds, grippe, influenza and more serious respiratory diseases.

Besides its power to kill germs, Zonite has another important quality: it is harmless to human beings. And this is really what sets Zonite apart as the Great Family Antiseptic. Before its discovery, nobody dreamed of a powerful antiseptic-germicide that could actually be held in the mouth, if need be, without injury.

In a household containing little children, the harmlessness of Zonite amounts to a godsend, as contrasted with the caustic, poisonous nature of the old-time germicides such as bichloride of mercury, carbolic acid and iodine.

Fortunately, Zonite is now obtainable everywhere. Its fame as the Great War Antiseptic spread so rapidly that even in the smallest hamlet scarcely a druggist can be found that does not have the green-and-black label on display in his store.

For certain uses you can now buy the new Zonite Ointment, which gives a continuing antiseptic action; very grateful to the skin in cases of sunburn, and after shaving. Keep both Zonite and Zonite Ointment on hand at all times; they are household friends. Zonite Products Company, 250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

acquired makes no essential difference. The point is they represent inner necessities, and emotional needs which seek an outlet in work that gives to each individual full and complete satisfaction.

"We are now endeavoring to find out whether introverts choose introverts for their friends and extroverts choose extroverts; also, whether an introvert married to an introvert, or an extrovert married to an extrovert make the happier married couples. So far, our investigation indicates that like tends to choose its like in these respects, and brings the happiest results in friendships and in married life.

(19) Do you rewrite many of your letters before mailing them?

"We have found this a very good test of introversion-extroversion. For instance, not long ago I had a letter from a prominent New York editor who is a decided introvert in his thinking, although in his actions he tends somewhat toward extroversion. His letter was so full of interlineations, additions and corrections that it was evident his mind was still working on the letter after his secretary had finished it. Indeed, the letter was mostly rewritten. Introverts are always adding postscripts and afterthoughts to their letters.

(20) Do you talk to yourself from time to time?

"The absent-minded professor who walks about the campus, talking to himself and gesturing, is an example of the decided introvert. The introvert tends to live in an imaginary world. If it is carried to extreme, it develops into the form of insanity known as 'dementia præcox.' Extreme extroversion, however, is just as bad. It leads to the mental disorder known as 'manic-depressive insanity.' That is the kind of insanity where the afflicted person is hilarious and excited one day or one hour and depressed and melancholy the next.

"The introvert carries old grudges. He is still gritting his teeth and swearing under his breath at the traffic cop that bawled him out last week. The extrovert has forgotten the bawling out, and may have been arrested two or three times for traffic violations in the meantime.

"THESE twenty questions may seem very trivial. Each one taken by itself may not have great reliability; but when you score the whole twenty honestly with yourself, and especially if you extend them on to the entire forty-eight questions which Mrs. Laird and my students and I have spent five years in selecting and testing out on all sorts of people, you will find that they give a pretty reliable index of these large traits of your emotional make-up. They have no relationship that we can find to intelligence, that is, the introvert is just as likely to be a dumb-bell or a genius as the extrovert. But it does make a whale of a difference in your success or failure at your job.

"As a prime example of the usefulness of these tests, at least in keeping you from taking up the wrong job or profession, last year a big company put a new adding machine on the market and sent out a number of salesmen, some of them experienced and some of them new men. They all had about the same average intelligence and the territory was fairly allotted. We tested all the men with our introversion-extroversion battery. Some made a big success and some made a big failure; but among the failures there were three times as many introverts as there were extroverts.

"As I said in the beginning, we tested the students who have flunked out here in their college work, and we found that three extroverts flunk out to one introvert.

"AS ANOTHER evidence that these questions have real validity is that we find there is considerable relationship between the way you answer them and the size and volume of your body as compared with the length of your legs and arms. This comparison does not have much value after one is twenty-five, because so many people begin to put on fat after that age. If they do not, however, the comparison still has considerable reliability. Before that age the relationship we have found is very significant.

"What we measure is the sheer trunk volume—that is, the cubic contents of the body trunk—and then compare that with the length of the limbs. You can be easily deceived about this, as you are likely to think a person with short, full, bulky body has a great trunk volume. Sometimes this is true and sometimes not. But, even if so, it has no significance for our purpose except as you compare it with the length of the arms and legs.

"For instance, I have said that extroverts make the best salesmen. Yet, if you go to a convention of salesmen, you will see plenty of thin, skinny fellows that at first glance you would say were introverts. When, however, you come to measure the actual volume of their body trunk and compare it with the length of their legs and arms, you will usually find that they really have large body volume as compared with the length of their limbs.

"You will also find big, bulky-looking fellows who fail as salesmen because they are introverts. But you will discover, as a rule, that their big body bulk is due to fat, or else, when you size up their trunk volume, you will find it is small as compared with the length of their arms and legs. They really have what we call an introvert bodily make-up.

"We are finding that there is here a real anatomical basis for the general trend of one's temperamental characteristics. We have thirty measurements which we make with special instruments imported from Czechoslovakia by the Smithsonian Institution. They are the most accurate anthropometric instruments in the world.

"Speaking generally, the person who has moderate or small trunk volume in comparison to rather long legs and arms, tends to be an introvert; and those with large trunk volume compared to short legs and arms, are much more likely to be extrovert. President Coolidge is distinctly an introvert. He would certainly answer the question, 'In conversation are you a listener?' with a 'Yes.' He would probably say that in shorthand. Contrast him with such men as Roosevelt, Lloyd-George, and Mr. Bryan.

"Just look about among your friends, and think of the endless talkers and chronic visitors, and also study those who have the other introvert or extrovert characteristics which these questions, when given as a whole, bring out, and I am sure you will see that there is a tendency for them to fall into these two types of appearance and bodily make-up.

"We do not pretend to be able, by these tests, always to tell a man just what job he should go into, but we can tell him what job he should not go into. And this is just about as good, because if we can steer an introvert away from an extrovert job, he is bound to land in an introvert job. And the same is true of the extrovert. And why should a man go through the mental suffering and hardship and discouragement of trying to make himself over. The marked introvert should cultivate extrovert qualities, and the extrovert should take lessons from the introvert; but there is no use of the one trying to transform himself into the other, or to do the other's work.

"Intelligence is only a small part of our lives. The satisfaction of our emotions, our hopes, passions, inspirations and desires is the greatest thing in the world. As Robert Louis Stevenson said, 'To miss the joy is to miss all.' And our hope is that our 'Colgate Mental Hygiene Tests' have made a little step toward the time which Kipling prophesied, when every man should work for the joy of working. That time can come only when psychology and industry will be able to fit each man to his job and the job to the man. That is what I mean by the term self-realization. It means doing your best work and making the most of yourself at the same time."

NOTE: The score marks given in this table indicate only introversion. Therefore, if any of your crosses to the questions on the Personal Inventory are under numbers not given on this table, then you are an extrovert or ambivert on that particular question. For example: If your X mark on question 5 of Personal Inventory falls on 1 — 4 you are an introvert on that one question; if on 5 — 10 it signifies extroversion or ambiversion (according to the placement of the mark). If your X mark on question 33 of Inventory falls on 7 — 10 it signifies introversion; if on 1 — 6 extroversion or ambiversion is indicated.

As the totals of men and women have a different significance, women requiring a higher total to indicate introversion, extroversion, and ambiversion (owing to the fact that women are more likely to be introverts than men) two separate scores, for men and for women, are printed below.

Scores for Men

(1) If you are a man and have 15 or more crosses which fall under the numbers printed in the scoring table, you are introvert. You would probably find the greatest self-realization in one of the following occupations: proof reader, research investigator, accountant, inspector, die-making, jeweler, artist, and all similar occupations which require fine, keen careful attention and accuracy.

(2) If you have 5 or fewer crosses falling under the numbers in the scoring table, you are not introvert, but extrovert, and would likely be happiest and most successful in the following occupations: salesmanship, foreman, organizer, nurse, hotel clerk, politician, demonstrator, contract man, explorer, and similar occupations requiring plenty of contact with people and the outside world generally.

(3) If you have anywhere from 6 to 14 crosses (inclusive) falling under the scoring table, you are ambivert and would probably find excellent self-realization in the following: office clerk, general mechanic, store proprietor, minister, teacher, chauffeur, detective, manager, and those occupations which require a good many of the qualities of both the introvert and extrovert.

Scores for Women

The difference between the scores for women and for men is that a woman is introvert if she has 20 or more crosses under introversion, where men require only 15. She is extrovert if she has 10 or less under the scoring table numbers where men require only 5 or less in order to be extrovert. This shows how much more likely men are to be extrovert than women. A woman is ambivert if the total number of her crosses which falls inside the scoring table range from 11 to 19 inclusive.

A woman introvert, extrovert or ambivert, finds self-realization in occupations calling for the same sort of mental traits as fit the occupations assigned to the men of the same type.

HAVE you ever speculated about the vital changes that this country will undergo during the next twenty-five or fifty years? Changes that may decentralize industries, depopulate sections of the country, overcrowd the cities, cause the decline of certain localities, and build up new industrial sections and centers of culture. It's a fascinating speculation. But Dr. Joseph Russell Smith, in an amazing article next month, has done more than speculate about it. A rare knowledge of both economics and geography enables him to read the present signs and predict the future. And his predictions are based on deductions and observations made during years and years of close study of our industrial and agricultural facilities, our natural resources, our climate and our civilization.

"The supreme combination of all that is fine in motor cars"

POWER . . The soft purr of the Packard motor hardly hints its vast reserve power. Yet a touch of the accelerator and the great car leaps forward with the eagerness of a living thing.

In its swift response to the driver's will lies the promise of superb and sustained performance. Mile after mile through the starts and stops of the crowded city, hour after hour on the long pull of the mountain grade, the Packard proves superior to all requirements — Packard power now reigns supreme.

Packard design—widely imitated but never equalled—has long been recognized as an outstanding combination of smartness, beauty and comfort. And Packard power —now unsurpassed in any motor car— offers matchless traffic agility, hill climbing ability and, when emergency demands it, speed.

Packard distinction — Packard power! A combination of qualities which has restored to many thousands of new owners their waning zest in motoring.

goes to school. And the thing is—she's so grateful. I don't know what for, but it's—well—pathetic."

Again was Clare disarmed by his kindness to Lunella.

"If you'd care to come in until she's finished—" she said, not very cordially.

"Thanks!" said he eagerly. "Nothing I'd like better! You know, I enjoyed our little talk last night."

Our talk!

He sank into a chair with a sigh; but almost at once straightened up again.

"Look here!" he said. "Perhaps I'm bothering you. Perhaps you want to cook your dinner—something of the sort. . . ."

"I don't waste my time in cooking," said Clare. "Restaurants—"

"I'm so sick of restaurants I never want to eat any more!" said he. "But what a pretty little place you have here. Homelike. I tell you, it takes a woman—"

"No, it doesn't!" Clare interrupted. "It takes a little planning and management, that's all. I'm away from home all day, just as you are."

"Yes, I know. But it takes a feminine mind to think of all these things."

"I hope I haven't a 'feminine mind,'" she said, frigidly.

"But don't you want to have one?" he asked, in genuine surprise.

She did not trouble to answer this, and for a time they were both silent. Mr. Arthur was evidently thoughtful.

At last he began to talk, and now he showed a proper interest in her. Not in her work; he always evaded that topic; but he liked to hear what she thought about things, he liked to hear about her art school days; and she fancied that he rather liked to look at her. Because every time she happened to look at him, she caught him looking at her. And this did not especially annoy her, even if he did think she had a feminine mind.

IF LUNELLA knocked on the wall, nobody heard her. Two hours had passed when he sprang to his feet.

"After nine!" he cried. "That's too bad!"

"But it's been very nice to talk to you," said Clare politely.

"Yes, I know," he said; "but I had a lot of work to do this evening. I had no business to waste two hours."

Off he went, in a hurry, slamming the door after him. Clare sat down and picked up a book, a very interesting book.

"Beast!" she said to herself, in a trembling voice. "Rude, selfish beast! Wasting two hours—that's what he called it! Very well; I'm sure I don't care—"

The doorbell rang.

"Let it ring!" she thought. "I don't want to see—anybody!"

Another ring, and this time she opened the door. There he was.

"Look here!" he said. "I'm afraid I was a bit—abrupt, wasn't I?"

"It doesn't matter," said Clare.

"It does!" he insisted vehemently. "It does! Because I—I was so happy in there with you. I— Please! Look here! I'm sorry!"

In spite of herself she was mollified by this artless speech, and he must have read this in her face.

"See here!" he said eagerly. "Won't you take dinner with me to-morrow night? Anywhere you like—"

"You said you were sick of restaurants."

"Well, so I am. But with you—"

"Then come here and have dinner with me," said Clare suddenly, "and we'll have a home dinner."

SHE told herself the next morning that she was a perfect idiot. A home dinner, indeed! She had no time after her day's work to bother with anything of the sort.

"But as long as I've asked him, I'll do the thing properly," she said to herself.

At odd moments all through the day she thought of the various details of her dinner, and when she left the office she had her list complete.

She really enjoyed going to market, for a change. And the first thing she did when she got home was to ring Mr. Arthur's bell.

"Lunella," she said, when the little girl opened the door, "do you want to come in and wait on the table? Mr. Arthur's having dinner with me."

"Yes, ma'am!" said Lunella gravely.

There was a marked change in Lunella; not only was she wearing a new dress and new shoes, but her manner had become portentous.

"Mr. Arthur must have everything jist so," she observed, as she followed Clare. "Mommer always told me so, and now I can see it—"

"Nonsense!" said Clare briskly. "Now then, if you'll set the table, Lunella—"

Clare worked for an hour and a half over that dinner. The table was charming with a centerpiece of violets and lilies-of-the-valley; the room was so tranquil and pretty in the lamplight. She was glad to think that she could do this sort of thing well—when she wanted.

Mr. Arthur was very late; but, after all, no particular time had been mentioned, and Clare sat down with a book and waited. At last she heard him go into his own apartment, and she hurried into the kitchen for a final inspection of the dinner. Then she waited ten minutes, fifteen, twenty, half an hour—and she would have gone on waiting indefinitely if Lunella had not come to the rescue.

"I guess I better jist step around an' see what he's doing," said Lunella. "Maybe he got started workin' and forgot the time."

But as she was leaving Clare's flat she met her Mr. Arthur coming out of his own door. And Clare heard.

"Why, Mr. Arthur!" said the little girl, in a tone of stern surprise. "Ain't you goin' in ter Miss Clare's?"

"Yes," he said. "I did think I'd stop in, later. But I'm going out to get some dinner first."

"Why, you're eatin' there to-night!" cried Lunella, in horror.

"Merciful heavens!" said the young man; then, in a whisper, which Clare also heard, "Look here! Don't let her

Ingersoll
WRIST WATCH $3.50

For anyone who drives

YOU'D as soon be without a speedometer as a wrist watch—once you've worn one for a week.

And if you had time to test all the wrist watches in actual motoring use, you'd decide on an Ingersoll. For several reasons:

(1) Vibration and the jolts and jars of driving don't affect the timing dependability of an Ingersoll the way they do the higher priced, delicate watches.

(2) In case of an accident to your watch, you can get it repaired quickly and at nominal cost, by sending it to the INGERSOLL SERVICE DEPARTMENT at Waterbury, Conn.

(3) In case of loss or theft, it can be easily replaced, almost anywhere, at one of the hundred thousand stores that sell Ingersolls.

Price $3.50. Wrist Radiolite, tells time in the dark, $4.00. The extra 50c would be the second best investment you ever made.

know! Here's a dollar for you, Lunella!"

Clare retreated into the living-room, and when he appeared ushered in by Lunella, she met him with a perfectly polite smile. But she was angry and she was hurt, terribly hurt.

"Look here!" he said. "I'm so sorry I'm late! I'm—I'm so sorry!" He paused. "I'm so sorry!" he said.

And he apologized again and again, with such unnecessary vehemence, with such pathetically artless contrition, and he looked so tired, and he was so boyish in his clumsy efforts to conceal from her the fact that he had forgotten all about her invitation that her anger melted into a very genuine kindliness.

They sat down at the table together, and Lunella brought in the dinner, course by course. He kept on talking to her, in a much nicer way than he had ever talked before; but he neglected the dinner.

"You're not eating!" Clare protested.

"Sorry!" said he. "But I'm rather sick of this soggy, creamy stuff they send in from the restaurant!"

CLARE had no intention of being a fool. She admitted to herself that she had been in grave danger of being one; she had even gone so far as to cry, after that home dinner. But she had realized her folly in time, and it was over now. Absolutely over. For three evenings she had taken dinner down-town and stayed away from her apartment until it was too late for anyone to bother her.

"Because," she said to herself, on her way home in a taxi, this third evening, "what is the use of going on seeing him? Anyone who wanted to be—friends with him would simply have to play second fiddle. I don't believe he really means to be so overwhelming—but he is! He and his work. . . . It's not exactly selfishness; in fact, there's something rather fine about it. And he's very gentle and kind with Lunella. But—well—I'm not fond of playing second fiddle, that's all!"

As she put her key in the latch, her foot touched a package leaning against the door. She took it in with her, and in the living-room she opened it. Three wilted pink roses wrapped in brown paper, and tied to one of the stems, a slip of paper upon which was written in a neat hand:

"Compliments. From Mr. Arthur."

"But—how queer!" she cried, astounded. For, with all his tactlessness, Mr. Arthur had not impressed her as a man who would send a lady three wilted roses wrapped in brown paper, and with such a peculiar greeting.

"He must know better than that!" she thought. "It's—"

Then, without the slightest provocation, she began to cry, for the second time that week.

"I don't care!" she said. "It's pathetic! He is so blundering, and so dreadful, and so—"

She stopped crying suddenly.

"Nonsense!" she said to herself, a little frightened. "I must be overtired. I'll get into bed and read."

But first she picked up the outrageous bouquet and put it into a vase of water.

As she stood in the doorway, ready to turn off the switch, the most curious emotion came over her. That room, which had always seemed so charming, appeared to her now as the stupidest, primmest, most hateful room she had ever seen. Each chair in its place; the magazines lying on the table in a neat row, overlapping each other, those neat, polite flowers!

"It's—a nasty—detestable—old maid room!" she cried, with a sob, and snapped out the lights, to be done with it.

In the dark she remembered how it had looked with the chairs kicked aside, and ashes all over the floor, and the table in wild disorder. How—how human it had looked then!

Miss Payne, Clare's assistant, arrived in the office next morning with a traveling-bag and an air of suppressed excitement.

"I'm going back home to-night," she said, "to spend Thanksgiving on the farm."

"Thanksgiving!" Clare repeated. "That's to-morrow, of course. I'd forgotten."

Indeed, she had no especial reason for remembering it. She had no farm to go back to, no family; not even any particular memories of past Thanksgivings. The air of festivity in the office vexed and troubled her. The bookkeeper was garrulous about his turkey—a twenty-two-pounder, he said—picked it out himself in Washington Market—the wife always left that to him—said she couldn't do half so well.

"She only tells him that to humor him," thought Clare. But somehow the idea did not annoy her as it would once have done.

An odd, unhappy mood came upon her. She was reluctant to leave the cheerful office; she lingered, listening with unusual interest to other people's plans, to all this talk about family dinners, and homes and turkeys.

A high wind blew, a cruel wind. She buttoned the collar of her fur coat about her neck as she stepped out into the street, and set off resolutely to walk to Washington Square, where she would take a bus. She made a point of getting plenty of exercise.

"I take good care of myself!" she had said, with a smile, when Miss Payne had urged her to take a taxi.

And as she was fighting her way against the wind, those words came back to her.

"I take good care of—myself."

Yes, that was just what she did. And at the end, she would have the love and gratitude of—herself. And of nobody else; nobody else in the world.

A sort of terror seized her. She knew now what was the matter with her. She was horribly, unbearably lonely.

"I'll—I'll do something for Lunella," she thought, panic-stricken. "I'll help her—I'll teach her. I'll make her love me."

WHEN she got home, she gave the hall boy and the elevator boy tips that astounded them. "For Thanksgiving!" she said. And as she went up-stairs, she was at least followed by a hearty "Thank you" from somebody.

She had sent for her dinner from the restaurant again. It was early, quite early enough for Anybody to come, if anybody wanted. . . . The doorbell rang. And she was glad. She wanted to see him, she wanted to be kind, to be gracious, to hold out her hand to this stranger, in honest kindliness.

She opened the door, and there he stood, with two traveling-bags beside him. In his overcoat and soft hat he looked somehow unfamiliar, older and graver; but when he saw her, he took off his hat and smiled, and it was the same boyish and engaging smile.

"I've got the commission for the country club!" he said. "I thought maybe you'd like to know."

"Yes!" said Clare, unsteadily. "I'm very glad to know. Very."

And so she was; glad, and proud, and beyond measure touched, that he should come to her like this, so sure of her interest and her sympathy.

"They approved the plans this morning," he went on. "So that's that. It's been a bit of a strain—but I'm going back home to-night, to Boston, to spend Thanksgiving with my people. A rest!"

He too! And he never thought of asking what she was going to do; he was just going off, "back home," to "his people!"

"I hope you'll enjoy yourself," she said politely.

"Well . . . " he said dubiously.

He stood there, looking at her, with the shadow of a frown, and she fancied she saw in his eyes a troubled and unhappy inquiry. As if he were waiting. Those poor, poor little flowers. . . . He hadn't ever meant to offend her; she knew it; it was just his way. . . . He looked so tired, and he had come to her direct with his good news. . . . She could not let him go like this.

"Thank you for the flowers," she said very low.

"The flowers?" he repeated.

"Yes. I—I got them, thank you."

"But, see here!" he cried. "I never sent you any flowers! I—"

The front door closed smartly. He rang, but no one came. So he went away.

AT LAST Clare tried knocking. Ringing had had no effect, although she knew very well that Lunella was in there; she had heard her singing. And when she knocked, it was unmistakably the knock of one who intends to be admitted. It was effective; presently she heard footsteps come pattering along the passage and a stern voice asked:

"Who's there?"

"Open the door!" said Clare, and Lunella did.

"'Scuse me!" she said. "I didn't know it was you, ma'am. I—"

"Come into my flat, Lunella. I want to speak to you."

"'Scuse me!" said Lunella, again. "But—" She hesitated, squirming beneath Miss Clare's steady regard. "I—I got Baby here."

"Baby? What baby?"

"Mine!" said Lunella, beginning to cry. "I jist thought Baby an' me could sleep here while Mr. Arthur was away. It's so—so sort o' crowdy at home. An' I was goin' to give Baby a good bath 'fore I put him in the bed. . . ."

"Upon my word!" said Clare. "Very well! I'll come in and talk to you here."

This was a mistake. For a long time Clare had been sitting alone in her own apartment, and she had become convinced of Lunella's guilt, and filled with a just anger against her. But she was already half-disarmed by Lunella's tears, and when she entered Mr. Arthur's sitting-room, the last little bit of justice died in her heart.

Seated upon a carefully spread-out newspaper on the floor was a tiny, pale, blue-eyed baby, his head swathed in a bandage. At the sight of the stranger, he put his arms across his eyes, and gave a faint gasp.

Lunella yanked his arms down.

"Ain't you ashamed o' yourself!" she admonished. "Actin' like you're afraid o' Miss Clare!" She turned to Clare, apprehensive, yet proud. "He's the younges' o' seven," she explained. "An' every one of 'em dead but him an' me!"

"What will Mr. Arthur say?" asked Clare. But her tone was not so severe as she wished, because that baby was looking at her through his fingers.

"I acted for the best, ma'am!" said the tearful Lunella. "I didn't think he'd mind"—and added, with fine candor "—if he didn't know."

Clare was silent for a moment.

"LUNELLA," she said at last, "you put those flowers outside my door, didn't you?"

"I—acted for the best!" sobbed Lunella. "I jist knew Mr. Arthur would o' sent you flowers, if it had o' come inter his head."

"Where did you get them?"

"M-Mr. Arthur's key fits—your door. I jist took a few o' y-your own flowers. . . ."

"Didn't you know that was very wrong?"

"I jist acted for the best," said Lunella, still weeping, but resolute. "That time I saw you an' Mr. Arthur eatin' dinner together it was jist like one o' these here movies where there's a gen'leman and a lady so took with—"

"Never mind!" Clare interrupted hastily. She stood for a moment, looking at the two forlorn little intruders. "You can't stay here," she said.

"No, ma'am," said Lunella, with a trembling lip. "Only Mommer don't expect us back ternight. We said we'd stay here—an' she's went out. . . . An'—an'—I jist did want W-Willy ter git a nice, good bath for onct!"

"Oh, you poor little girl!" cried Clare. "You poor little thing! Lunella, I'll tell you what! We'll bring your little brother into my place and give him a nice hot bath, and you and he can sleep on the couch in the living-room. And to-morrow, Lunella, we'll have the best Thanksgiving dinner we can possibly buy. Just you and I and—" Her voice had grown a little unsteady. "Just we three, Lunella," she said.

"Oh!" cried Lunella. "Oh, you're jist like a nangel!"

So they all went, and the decorous quiet of Clare's flat was disturbed, at ten o'clock at night, by remarkable stir and bustle. Water running in the bathtub, Lunella's willing feet running back and forth, putting sheets on the couch, fetching plenty of clean towels, getting ready a bowl of warm milk and graham biscuits to revivify the baby when his unprecedented adventure should be over.

Lunella went to her bath first, quite pale with awe of this glittering room, this great, deep tub of water, this beautiful soap, this heavenly talcum powder, all this incredible luxury freely offered to her. And as the door closed after her, Clare picked up the baby.

It was a very, very good baby, quiet in that subdued way of babies who have learned that their tears will bring them no benefits; but it had an alarming habit of falling off things, and Clare decided that she would hold it until it was safely stowed away for the night.

She took off the bandage, and found a great bruise under its silky matted hair; she did not quite know what to do for this, but her heart suggested a very ancient remedy: she held the little thing close in her arms, and it lay there, quiet and content.

THE doorbell rang.

"No!" she said, half aloud. "I won't! I won't! I can't!"

Nevertheless, she had risen, and taken a step toward the hall when the bathroom door opened and out dashed Lunella, with crimson face and damp wild hair, wearing an old flannelette nightdress Clare had given her.

"Mr. Arthur!" she shouted. "It's him!"

And, stumbling over the long nightdress, down the hall she rushed, and flung open the front door. There he was.

"I saw a light—" said he. "So, I thought—"

"You said you were going to Boston," said Clare coldly.

"Yes, I know," he answered. "I know. But—I couldn't. I got as far as Stamford, and then I—came back."

"Oh, did you?" said Clare civilly.

"I know you were offended because I hadn't sent you flowers—"

"Offended!" she cried, hot with anger. "How can you dare to think that? Why should I—"

"Oh, please!" he interrupted, terribly distressed. "I know I always say the wrong thing. But I don't think like that. I—well, you can't imagine what I think! Please let me give you these! Please take them!"

He stooped and picked up a long box from the floor beside his bags—a florist's box—and came down the hall with it.

"Please!" he said, holding it out to her. Then, apparently for the first time, he noticed the baby.

"What's that?" he asked.

"Lunella's little brother," she answered, and something in his face made her glance away hastily. "He's such a nice baby!" she said. "We're going to give him a bath now—and it's awfully late. . . ."

"Look here!" said he. "Would it be tactless if I said that I never—never in all my life—saw anything so—so womanly and lovely as you are—this minute?"

"No," said Clare, after a long pause. "It's only being 'feminine' that I don't like! But—really it's very late—"

"I know that's a hint," he said forlornly; "but—look here—it's too soon, isn't it, to say anything yet? I mean—about a ring, and so on, you know. . . ?"

"I don't know," said Clare doubtfully. "You're so absent-minded! You might forget if you waited too long."

He stared at her for a moment.

"Clare!" he cried.

She shook her head. She smiled, though her eyes were misty.

"I don't want to talk just now," she said. "It's late—and I'm busy. But—Lunella and I invite you to Thanksgiving dinner to-morrow. Don't forget!"

A Wonder Trip To a Strange Land Within Your Borders

—the change, the new environment, the difference, the charm and beauty, plus the enchantments of the mountains and the sea.

COOL, delightful, unique Southern California offers you wonderfully refreshing sleep under blankets nine nights out of ten all summer, and glorious vacation days where average mean temperatures are as follows (U. S. Government Weather Bureau records—not our own—for the past 50 years. Read carefully): 50 Junes, 66 degrees; 50 Julys, 70; 50 Augusts, 71; 50 Septembers, 69. Humidity, too, is always low. No sultriness.

Golf, tennis, motoring, mountain climbing, hiking, camping, bathing, sailing, fishing—all that you like to do is within your easy reach. And no rain to interfere!

And for sightseers, there are mountains two miles high, deep canyons, a desert like the great Sahara, Old Spanish Missions, palm trees, orange groves and other interests which are different and absorbing—all plus the summer sports!

It is truly like a trip abroad in the change it brings you—yet the cost is low, for living here is very reasonable.

Ocean sport—a tow with a motor boat.

Come by rail or ocean liner. Special low round trip railroad fares are in effect from May 15th to October 31st on all railroads, so summer is an ideal time to come. Ask your nearest ticket agent to tell you all about it. Have him tell you, too, about the transportation bargain that includes all the Pacific Coast—the scenic richness offered through the gateways of Spokane, Tacoma, Seattle, Portland, San Francisco, Oakland, Santa Barbara and San Diego.

And Southern California is the new gateway to Hawaii and the Orient.

Sit down now and plan this wonder trip.

We have issued probably the most complete book on vacations ever printed. We'll send a copy free to you. 52 pages, illustrated, tell you just what you can see and do in this strange playground.

OMAHA

WHEN Lincoln stood on the heights of Council Bluffs and looked across the Missouri at the little frontier village that marked the beginning of the overland trail, he was already visualizing the sweep of empire westward across the billowing green and golden plains.

But even Lincoln could not foresee the astonishing growth of Omaha!—or its sister, Council Bluffs, already springing up about him! Great buildings, enormous grain elevators, vast stock-yards, with twelve railroad systems pouring the wealth of one of the richest agricultural regions of the world into its storehouses. A city-state like ancient Nineveh rising proudly upon its teeming plains. A great independent metropolis distinguished for its varied commerce and its culture.

LOCATION: Astride the broad trail that leads West; dominating the middle reaches of the Missouri River; the natural metropolis for the vast region that includes Nebraska, Wyoming, and sections of adjoining states—a region more than twice the size of all New England.

POPULATION: Within Omaha's corporate limits, 215,000; within a radius of 50 miles, 500,000 divided among 154 towns and 29,330 farms. All within shopping distance of Omaha and Council Bluffs.

MANUFACTURES: Annual output of packing industry, $210,000,000. Smelter products, $46,000,000. Omaha leads the country in the production of pig lead, is third in packing-house products, and is the greatest butter manufacturing center in the world, 55,000,000 pounds. Flour mill products, agricultural implements, bakery products, share largely in the output of Omaha's 600 manufacturing plants.

TRADE: Wholesale territory embraces 1500 towns; 310,000 farms averaging 390 acres. Crop value, $2,000,000,000; livestock on farms, $1,000,000,000. Bank deposits, $1,500,000,000. Omaha is leading retail center between Chicago and Denver; annual business, $157,500,000.

TRANSPORTATION: Twelve railroads converge at Omaha and Council Bluffs as through a great gate. The chief outlet from Omaha to Chicago and points eastward is the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway.

A natural metropolis

Born on the edge of the prairies, Omaha and Council Bluffs have grown from the richness of an incomparable soil. There is an opulent conservatism about it that has insured steady growth. Living wealth—the value of growing animate things—of an inexhaustible nature is a positive guarantee of Omaha's inevitable progress and expansion.

Omaha's history is rich and varied, colored by the turbulent adventures of explorers, fur-traders, Indian wars, and the migrations of the Forty-niners. It is a city of varied interests, of fine homes, of splendid country clubs, of exceptional educational facilities. With a population over 85% native born American, it is a metropolis worthily placed in the center of the nation.

—the Western Gate

A network of polished rails

THE run from Chicago to Omaha over the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway is only an overnight interlude in business between these two great cities. Business conferences are often continued on the splendid Milwaukee trains that serve the Western Gate.

The Milwaukee Road not only serves Omaha with a trunk line across golden Iowa, but it serves with equal facility the great metropolis that is the pride of all the Southwest—Kansas City. Its vast system, extending along 11,000 miles of track, operated by 60,000 employees, forms a network linking all important centers northwest of the lower Mississippi Valley. From Chicago to Kansas City, Sioux City and Omaha; to the Twin Cities and Duluth; to Milwaukee and the Upper Michigan Peninsula; to Puget Sound and the Pacific. Spur lines and feeders tap vast resources of raw materials.

The Milwaukee Road is the shortest link with the Pacific Northwest. For 660 miles over four mountain ranges—the Belt, the Bitter Root, the Rockies, the Cascades, to shipside—it is electrified. This is one of the greatest achievements in railroading. Another revolutionary advance has been the adoption of roller bearings for passenger cars—the first time this has been done in the history of railroad transportation.

Splendid trains to serve you

If you wish to visit Omaha on your way to the Coast, the Pacific Limited is the train to take. If you are going to Kansas City, go by the Southwest Limited. The famous Pioneer takes you to the Twin Cities. Then there is The Olympian, the de luxe limited that travels to shipside at Seattle or Tacoma, after passing the most beautiful and diversified scenery in America, through a new empire bursting ripe with opportunities!

only an incident, one of hundreds that have passed through Mr. Tyrrell's hands, but it suggests some of the strange side lights on human nature seen by an examiner of questioned documents, for that is the profession Mr. Tyrrell pursues.

Handwriting and typewriting are familiar to us all. But probably few suspect more than a fraction of the interesting facts about them known to an expert. A slight pen stroke or pencil mark may clear up a mystery. A single typed word may serve to identify a whole chain of circumstances. An erasure or alteration not apparent to the naked eye may be visible to the camera or the microscope, and when seen thus may disclose secrets that somebody thought too well hidden ever to be detected. Murderers, forgers, blackmailers, thieves and cheats, men seeking to conceal old crimes by new, men spurred by hate, revenge, or cupidity, women lying for a few dollars or a few hundreds, men lied against and unable to clear themselves by ordinary means—all these Mr. Tyrrell has dealt with, in their writings, and learned the truth. Often the clues were so elusive that they would have escaped the eyes of a million casual observers, yet were perfectly plain, even to the untrained, when traced and pointed out.

John F. Tyrrell has taken part in many famous cases, such as the Molineux murder case, the Patrick will case, the Leopold-Loeb case, and scores of others. The questioned documents that he has examined include wills, contracts, bank checks, promissory notes, letters, envelopes and package wrappers. Some of them were typewritten, some were handwritten, some printed, and in one strange case "ghost-written." The questions about them have been as various as these: Is it the genuine writing of the person supposed to have written it? Was it written at the time stated? Was it made on this typewriter or that? What ink was used, what paper, what kind of pen? With which hand was it written, and how did the writer hold the pen?

Correct answers to these questions have saved many an innocent man or woman from punishment and have fastened the guilt on the right party.

BORN in Australia sixty-four years ago John Tyrrell was brought to this country at the age of three, and has lived in Milwaukee almost all his life.

His father, a man of the old school, believed that every boy should learn a trade. Consequently, at seventeen John was apprenticed to a trunk maker, and for four years he was learning something in which he had no interest. Promptly on becoming his own man, at the age of twenty-one, he quit the trunk-making business and joined the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company as a clerk.

He has remained with the company ever since, and is the superintendent of an important division; but with a special arrangement allowing him time to follow his work of questioned document examiner.

"Handwriting interested me from the time I was in school," Mr. Tyrrell told me; "and since a person does well at what he likes, I was good at it. The teacher used to exhibit my writing and drawings, and had me make models for other pupils. But my interest in handwriting as applied to questioned documents began with a case that was famous in the newspapers forty-five years ago.

"A colored boy was appointed a cadet to West Point. Because of his race, it created a furor. One day his ears were cut and maimed, and he presented a threatening note he claimed to have received, telling him he 'had better look out!'

The authorities believed that whoever had cut the negro's ears and written the note was connected with the school, so they began a rigid investigation. From each cadet they secured three samples of handwriting. These were assembled into three sets, with a sample from each boy in each set. The samples were then numbered in such a way that only the authorities could identify the writers, and the numbering scheme differed on each set, so there could be no collusion between experts. Each expert took one set of the samples, to compare, one by one, with the writing on the note the negro had received. When their reports were turned in, it was found that their conclusions were identical. The author of the note was the negro himself. He had written it and cut his own ears, in the hope of winning sympathy!

"THAT case interested me tremendously. I sent for copies of all the documents, and studied them from beginning to end. Thereafter, I was an examiner of questioned documents—in the making!

"I soon discovered that my chosen profession, or hobby, was not an easy one. It took me years and years of exhaustive study—most of which was done in my spare time—to gain a comprehensive knowledge of styles and habits of handwriting, the history in detail of all makes of typewriters, kinds of papers, water marks, pens, carbon paper. I also had a great deal to learn about photography and certain chemical processes.

"Then, bit by bit I had to collect my instruments and apparatus. An up-to-date document examiner has to have in his kit the finest obtainable magnifiers, specially built microscopes, steel rules, glass alignment scales, test plates for typewriting, and, among other delicate scientific instruments, a micrometer caliper with vernier scale that will ascertain to the thousandth part of an inch the difference in paper thickness, and measures graduated on glass to the five-hundredth part of an inch. A camera with a battery of the finest lenses, and a fuming apparatus for restoring obliterated writing also form a necessary part of his equipment."

Mr. Tyrrell's studies as a questioned document "detective" have won him na-

P. A. sure does things to a pipe!

TO TWIST an old saying, a pipe is only a pipe, but a pipe packed with P. A. is a smoke! I'm here to say it is. Why, Prince Albert can take the balkiest pipe and give it a sweet disposition in no time. Because P. A. is that kind of tobacco!

Just open a tidy red tin of Prince Albert. Half-close your eyes and breathe that marvelous P. A. fragrance. A peach-orchard in blossom-time has nothing on P. A. Now . . . tamp a load into your old jimmy-pipe and light up. Here's the real thrill!

That taste . . . that wonderful taste of wonderful tobacco. Cool as a letter from a credit department. Sweet as the news of promotion. Mild as a summer breeze . . . mild without sacrificing that full, rich tobacco body you demand in a smoke.

You find yourself loading up and lighting up all day long when you pick P. A. for packing. Because this grand old favorite never bites your tongue or parches your throat. No matter what your present set-up is, I suggest you try Prince Albert. Do that!

P. A. is sold everywhere in tidy red tins, pound and half-pound tin humidors, and pound crystal-glass humidors with sponge-moistener top. And always with every bit of bite and parch removed by the Prince Albert process.

tional repute; but no one looking at this small, white-haired, mild-mannered man would think that his life was as thrilling as a perennially continued mystery story, and that he has played a leading rôle in the unraveling of many baffling crimes.

"Let me tell you about a case," said Mr. Tyrrell.

"Arthur," he went on to explain, "was a ne'er-do-well who was willing to come by money by any means, so long as he did not have to do any honest work. Out West, where he was living, he heard that the hotel keeper of Ladysmith, a town of some three thousand people in northwestern Wisconsin, had died, leaving his widow a fortune of between forty and fifty thousand dollars.

"'That,' said Arthur, 'is the girl for me!'

"Going to Ladysmith with an oiled tongue and winning manners, he soon induced the hotel keeper's widow to become his wife; but you may be sure he had no intention of settling down to a placid married life in a remote small town. At the first opportunity, he persuaded his wife to open a joint bank account. She put a little more than ten thousand dollars in the account; and without more delay than was absolutely necessary, Arthur drew out nearly all of it and left town.

"However, he had not realized how sincerely his wife loved him. She was a good woman, although not educated. She followed and found him, forgave him for taking the money, and induced him to come back to Ladysmith. Soon after his return, she visited her lawyer, saying she wanted to draw a will in her husband's favor. The lawyer, knowing Arthur, said:

"'You mustn't sign a will like that. If you do, it will be your death warrant.'

"He refused to draw the will. But Arthur easily found another lawyer to draw it, and she signed it. Soon after, her health began to fail rapidly. A physician was called in, but about a week later she died in terrible agony, her shrieks being heard all over the village. A bottle containing strychnine pills was found, and the explanation was given out that she had been ill and had committed suicide.

"PEOPLE who knew her had their suspicions of this explanation, for she was a fine, big woman, and had always enjoyed splendid health. Suspicions, however, are not proof, nor can they be introduced as evidence; and Arthur was supported in the suicide theory by a letter he said he had discovered by accident.

"It was a most curious document—impression writing, some would call it; 'ghost writing' was the name given it by others. It appeared on an ordinary ruled tablet, and was not done with pen or pencil, but seemed to be such an impression as is left on an underneath sheet when, in writing, one bears down more or less heavily on the top sheet. The original of the note was not found, but the impression was legible. It said:

Aug 9, '15

i will soon be gon i cant stand this pain dont wory you will bee better of good by Dear
Jennie

If you were a Californian, and in business, your customers would be the kind who own twice as many automobiles . . . buy more of everything people like to have . . . and then put twice as much in savings, as the average American

You are going somewhere this summer—and California offers, in addition to a hundred vacation lands, a picture of ideal living, rapid growth, and great opportunity, told in part by the letter we are printing on this page.

California is closer to you than ever before; reduced train schedules have brought it nearly a business day closer by rail, and, if you motor, the new Victory Highway in conjunction with the Lincoln Highway will take you straight across the country into California's Great Valley and to San Francisco, the center of it all.

In San Francisco you will see a quarter of a billion dollars' worth of new buildings. The San Francisco Stock and Bond Exchange now ranks next to New York in financial volume. Here, and in the cities and towns around, are many square miles of factories, residences, offices and shops on land that was vacant when you saw it last. Little towns of the Great Valley are now thriving cities; the larger cities have grown still larger; orchards and farms have multiplied. Everywhere, on giant new industrial plants, you see world-famous names transplanted from the East. California, third agricultural state, is also eighth in value of manufactured products.

In six years, California has grown thirty-five per cent in population—with corresponding growth in land values and business opportunities,—a perfectly normal and natural development, going on all the time. There is room for twenty million people without crowding—room for you, if you are getting ahead where you are and possess a moderate competence with which to start.

One such business-man tells what he thinks of California, in the letter printed below. Read it—it is a true and typical experience:

"San Francisco, Dec. 1, 1926.

"This year I have learned how short a time it takes to become a Californian!

"Not many families were bound together by so many strong ties as ours was back East. Nearly a dozen of us had lived all our lives in the same middle-western state where the family business was founded fifty years ago. Our brothers' wives and our sisters' husbands were people we had all known since we were children.

"When our California business grew until it was necessary for one of us to move out to San Francisco, and the choice fell on me, I boarded the train with my wife, two sons and a daughter, all feeling as though we had been banished to some strange country.

"Now our boys have finished college and have come to work with me in a business that has grown fast enough to need all three of us. We supply the entire West, Australia, Hawaii and the Orient with our products. My daughter finished her professional training in one of our fine California universities and immediately began to earn an independent income.

"And when I went back last winter on a business trip, I found myself making it as short as I could—to get back to California. I discovered that we are Californians, all of us. This country of cool summers and pleasant winters is home.

[Name on request] R. W. B."

WHAT THE Californian OWNS:

Climate: Year-round producing climate. The Californian can work, grow crops or play every month in the year.
Growth: From 3,500,000 to 5,000,000 population in six years—three times faster than the United States average.
Wealth: Twice the national average of wealth, twice the average number of savings bank depositors and twice the average deposit. Only three states report more income tax returns; none has so many automobiles per capita.
Health: 6 of the 15 most healthful cities in the United States are in California. U. S. investigations prove California children bigger and taller, than the average.
Education: The Californian's schools share first rank only with Massachusetts in efficiency. Five states have larger enrollments; only two exceed California's expenditures.
Recreation: Four National Parks, a thousand miles of ocean shore, a thousand-mile-long Sierra playground, 30,000 square miles of National Forests, 42,000 miles of improved roads. Year-round motoring, golf, fishing, week-ending out of doors.
Crops: More than $600,000,000 yearly. Six million acres under irrigation with great mountain reservoirs supplying abundant water.
Industry: One of the youngest states, California is eighth in value of manufactured products.
Markets: From San Francisco's great harbor, the largest on the Pacific Coast, the Californian successfully sells his manufactures and crops throughout the Western and Eastern States, and exports enormously.

For every Californian—here or on the way—these advantages spell Opportunity.

TO GET THE TRAINS THROUGH . . . SAFELY, SWIFTLY, AND ON TIME

As the test car speeds along, officials watch two sets of glasses filled with water. The number of drops which splash over give one test of smoothness. Another record is made simultaneously by the extremely sensitive "track-o-meter."

The 'splash test' smooths the way for these swift trains

ALONG the 11,000 mile front of the Pennsylvania a great army of over 20,000 men is always at work on the right-of-way.

Year in, year out, they labor to perfect this highway of commerce: deepening the ballast, installing the heaviest rails, cleaning, leveling, tamping, pausing only to move aside for the passage of the swift trains for whose safety and comfort they strive.

Day and night their work will be constantly inspected by track walkers, foremen, supervisors, engineers. But once every two months the supreme test of the quality of their work occurs. For then the "splash test" is made.

So that the test may be based on actual conditions, the car containing the testing apparatus is coupled to the end of one of the regular trains, and whirled swiftly over the division, while officials make careful notes of the record of each section.

To those responsible for the best sections of track will be given valuable prizes—rewards for fine work—recognition of the important part they have played in getting the trains through swiftly, smoothly, and safely.

lenged, but insisted on an investigation, believing a despicable crime had been committed. I was brought in to see what evidence the documents might yield.

"The dead woman had followed the businesslike habit of making carbon copies of her letters, though she wrote everything in long hand. We therefore had any quantity of genuine writing by which to make comparisons of suspected bits. One fact I discovered was that, as is often the case with large people, she wrote with a light hand. This prepared me to appreciate the significance of another fact I discovered about the impression writing: it had been written with a very heavy hand, so heavy that the impression was visible not only on the top sheet, but also on the three succeeding sheets.

"I wanted to know about how much pressure on the pencil was necessary to produce so deep an impression, and I rigged up a crude but effective device to find out. Taking a funnel, I sealed a pencil in the narrow end, and closed the outlet. Then I poured shot into the large open end. By dead weight, I found that in order to produce an impression about as heavy as the woman's ordinary writing, I needed eight ounces of shot in the funnel; but in order to produce an impression that would show through on the fourth sheet of tablet paper, there was needed three pounds and more. This was strong evidence that she had not made the writing.

"There was other evidence. She wrote slowly and carefully, never forgetting to dot an i or cross a t. Instead of writing the first personal pronoun with a capital I, she used the small i. The fake message also used the small i; but only four out of the ten were dotted, and some of the t's were not crossed.

"WHAT had happened was this: Someone—and the someone obviously was the husband—having access to the woman's files, had carefully picked out letters containing the words needed for the false message. Over these he had traced with a stylus, bearing down heavily, for his object was to make an impression that could be read. The resulting message certainly retained many characteristics of her writing, but differed so in essential points that we could positively say she had not written it.

"Another document turned up strangely in this case. The husband told some of his friends about a startling dream he had after his wife's death. She appeared to him, he asserted, and said:

"'Artie, did you get the last letter I wrote you?'

"'What letter?' he said, and she replied, 'The one I hid under the rug.'

"His friends told him he had better look under the rugs; but he pretended to scoff at the idea. However, the story of the dream was given wide circulation. And when, after a while, the husband hired a man to take up the rugs and beat them, sure enough, a note in his wife's hand was found. It said:

as i am to blame for all this i did it all alone.

"This was not an original, but a carbon copy consisting of two lines on a strip of paper torn from the bottom of a page. I examined it, and satisfied myself it was an impression of her writing. But under the microscope I saw there had been an erasure and a substitution. I ventured the opinion the original wording read:

as i am not to blame for anything as i told you all about it.

But the thing remained a mystery for years.

"The man was tried and convicted of the murder, and was sent to the penitentiary for life. Seven years later he appealed for a pardon, and seemed to have a reasonable chance of winning it. But one day he wrote to the lawyer who had originally refused to draw the woman's will, and asked for a certain letter which he said he believed was in the lawyer's files. It was a letter, he said, that his wife had written to the lawyer, and he told about the date and the substance. The lawyer found the letter, and brought it forth at the second trial. Then the mystery of the "dream" note was cleared up. In the letter the dead woman had complained about the lawyer's handling of a business deal for her, and wound up with these words: 'as i am not to blame for anything as i told you all about it.'

"By altering a few words on the carbon copy of the letter, the murderer had a document well suited to his purposes. In the penitentiary, brooding over his affairs, he realized that the original of the letter was probably still in the lawyer's files and might come to light. He wanted it destroyed. By his own act he brought it to light and created fresh proof against himself. His appeal for freedom was denied. He died in prison.

"THE Patrick will case," Mr. Tyrrell continued, "was another famous example of murder and forgery, and it illustrates an interesting point about handwriting. An aged New York millionaire named Rice lived for a time at Houston, Texas. His wife died there. According to Texas law, as it was at that time, a woman resident of the state died possessed of half of her husband's estate. Mrs. Rice had relatives who sought to take advantage of this law and constitute themselves her legal heirs, hoping to extract four or five million dollars from Mr. Rice. He, of course, contested their rights and returned to New York City, which he claimed as his legal place of residence. There the Texas relatives sent a lawyer named Patrick, to see what information he could dig up that might be helpful to them.

"Patrick smelled money, and decided to line his own pockets. How he connived and conspired with one Jones, a combination valet and secretary to old Mr. Rice; how they doped the millionaire with a slow poisonous irritant; how they devised the scheme of a Rice Institute of Belles Lettres, which Mr. Rice—unknown to himself!—was to endow, and of which Patrick was to be trustee; how they prepared false wills and manipulated bank checks; and how they finally killed the old man with chloroform in a great hurry, and tried to have him cremated before an inquest could be held, makes a long story. The interesting thing from a handwriting standpoint was the detection of forgery in the signatures. There were several false documents, and eleven forged signatures.

"Now, nobody ever writes his own

The door of opportunity - - -
It is open - - - - in the South

A variety of fertile soils and a moderate climate—coal, iron and other minerals—timber tracts—water power—these are some of the natural resources in the South lying ready for industry to fashion into fortune.

And back of these there is the substantial Southern citizenship—of American stock, hard working, homogeneous and contented. Prosperity and progress are as much a matter of men as of things.

Each year many new industrial enterprises are established in the South, and Southern farmers grow more and better things.

The South is a region rich in opportunity for ambitious men and women.

The Southern Railway System, with its 8,000 miles of lines, serves the South from the northern gateways at Washington, Cincinnati and Louisville—from the western gateways at St. Louis and Memphis—to the ocean ports of Norfolk, Charleston, Savannah, Brunswick and Jacksonville, and the Gulf ports of Mobile and New Orleans.

The Development Service of Southern Railway System, Washington, D. C., will gladly aid in securing industrial locations, farms and home sites in the South.

name twice in exactly the same way. It is impossible to control the muscles so that there are not some differences, great or small, as to sizes of letters, shape, or character of line; and the differences, if necessary, may be measured with accurate instruments.

"But the four signatures purporting to be those of Mr. Rice, we found, were all so much alike that they were suspicious for that reason alone. We measured them from all sorts of positions: from the tip of the W in the first initial to the tip of the final e in Rice; from the top of R to the tip of e; from the top of R to the bottom of the same letter, and so on. We chose all sorts of angles and measured them, and found that in no measurement did any one of the signatures differ from any of the others by more than one sixty-fourth of an inch. That is only about the thickness of a horsehair.

"What was the conclusion? Why, the murderers and forgers must have traced the four false signatures from one original signature! And that was just what they had done.

"There were other details, also, that gave the forgery away. For example, Mr. Rice was eighty-five years old when he was murdered, and he had learned handwriting in an early school, when the goose quill was used instead of the steel or gold fountain pen. He held his pen nearly parallel with the side of the sheet of paper, thus shading his letters of the down stroke. This was evident in all his writing. The forgers, however, had used a different method of holding the pen, and at the angle they used—more nearly parallel with the top of the sheet—the shading fell on the cross strokes.

"To anyone understanding handwriting, this detail in itself was immensely significant. The manner of holding the pen is only one of those little everyday actions that develops into a habit, finally becoming so firmly fixed that it is hard to change.

"Handwriting is a rather complicated process made up of a lot of habitual actions, and that is why forgery is not more often successful when the forged document comes under an expert's eye.

"Patrick and Jones were both arrested and convicted on this evidence.

"SOMETIMES we find genuine signatures on false documents. August Wiganowski, for example, was an industrious Pole who lived with friends in Milwaukee. After he died, these friends presented a promissory note as a claim against his estate, amounting to three thousand and fifty dollars. His lawyers did not believe the note was genuine, and they brought it to me.

"'Wiganowski signed the note!' I informed them.

"That was perfectly clear. The signature, as shown by comparing it with admitted signatures, was genuine.

"'But,' I added, 'he did not sign a note for three thousand and fifty dollars; he signed one for only fifty dollars.'

"This fact was detected by a perfectly simple method that can often be employed when a document has been folded. In folding a piece of paper, you break the writing surface to some extent, and the ink 'acts up' on these surfaces.

"Wiganowski wrote the note for fifty dollars before the paper had ever been folded, a fact that was evident, because, although a fold crossed the note at 'fifty,' none of the ink had run into the fold. But the words 'three thousand,' by the same reasoning, had been inserted afterward, after the note had been folded, for the ink had run into these folds, on a smaller scale, but in much the same manner as it does when you try to write on blotting paper, which has no writing surface. The path of the ink into the folds was plain under the microscope and on enlarged photographs. Wiganowski signed the note; but they raised the ante!

"Another case was similar in intent, though the method of detecting the fraud was wholly different. A woman died, and her sister presented a promissory note against her estate for five hundred dollars. The note was typewritten, and dated sometime in the early eighties.

"At that time, only a few makes of typewriters were on the market. Even at the present time, however, when there are dozens of makes, it is still possible to tell, by means of the type faces, what kind of machine produced a given piece of copy, and what particular machine, if we have other samples from the same machine; and moreover, we can often prove that the very same machine produced two samples of typewriting, but that one sample was produced at about a certain time, while the other was not produced until considerably later. It is our business to know where to look for the telltale details that disclose these facts, which may be very important.

"The case of the woman who presented the promissory note for five hundred dollars was very simple. The note was dated in the early eighties; but it was written on a make of machine which was not manufactured until the early nineteen-hundreds!

"CHEATING the polls on a big scale was proved in the Chicago vote fraud by a study of handwriting characteristics in so simple a thing as the cross that voters put on election ballots. A certain candidate was shown by the first count to have been defeated. On the recount, however, he gained a sufficient margin of votes to be declared the winner.

"When we came to examine the ballots, we saw how he had gained the winning votes. His friends among the officials presiding at the recount had short-penciled him to victory! Whenever they could manage it under the watchful eyes of other, unfriendly, judges, they had put crosses against his name where the voter had not done so. In cheating like this, they had to bear down lightly, write hastily, use short pencils which they scarcely lifted between the two strokes, and consequently they produced crosses totally unlike the careful, honestly-marked crosses. Their crosses were nearly all connected at one end by a faint line, a sure indication of haste. We found dozens of these short-penciled ballots, and the guilty were convicted.

"Revenge is not a common motive in serious crimes, but occasionally it is a contributing motive, and I have had to explore the documentary evidence in at least two cases where it was the controlling motive. One of these was the Molineux case. Like the Patrick will case it was a famous, long-drawn-out affair. I will not go into all the details, but this is substantially what happened: Harry Cornish was physical director of the Knickerbocker Club of New York, of which young Molineux was a member. Cornish offended Molineux, and when the directors refused to discharge him, preferring to take Molineux's resignation if it came to that, Molineux sought revenge.

"A few days before Christmas, Cornish received at the club, through the mail, a Tiffany box containing a bottle of bromo-seltzer in a silver holder. There was a plain card inside, as if to make it appear that the sender had intended to enclose his visiting card, but had accidentally chosen one on which the engraving had been omitted. Cornish took the gift as the joke of some friend, and wondered who it could be. He saved the wrapper, thinking it might enable him to establish the identity of the sender, and he put the bromo-seltzer in the medicine cabinet at home.

"Not long afterward, his cousin woke one morning with a violent headache. Cornish recommended his new bromo-seltzer. She took a dose, and died within a few minutes. Examination disclosed that the bottle contained, not bromo-seltzer, but cyanide of potassium, a deadly poison.

"THE detection of the guilty person took some time, but young Molineux was finally connected with it by means of his handwriting. Some of the details are specially interesting, because they illustrate those habits which we all develop, and which make handwriting highly individual.

"Molineux was a nervous, quick person, and his handwriting revealed traces of these characteristics. For instance, when the letter i occurred in the middle of a word he was writing, he did not finish the word and then come back to dot the i, as most people do; he had the impatient habit of breaking the word after the i, putting his pen down again where the dot was supposed to be, and continuing from there with the next letter. He also had a curious way of writing the small letter b. Instead of rounding it at the bottom, as it should be, he made an indentation in it, so that the lower part of the letter looked something like a miniature w.

"These peculiarities, with others which were found constantly in Molineux's genuine handwriting, also appeared in the address on the wrapper of the package that had contained the 'bromo-seltzer.' These two characteristics alone would have been almost proof positive of Molineux's connection with the package; however, there was supporting evidence, and he was convicted.

IN THE year 412 B. C. Diogenes left his tub, lit his lantern, and went around in a hopeless search for an honest man. In the year 1919 A. A warm and human business

It is sometimes said that Sherwin-Williams grew to greatness principally because likable, understanding, human men have always served as sponsors of this enterprise.

And it is true that unselfish solicitude for the customer's welfare—inbred into this business by its pioneers—has, for sixty years, been winning us warm friendships in every corner of the civilized world.

Among the many Sherwin-Williams services that are of value to you is the useful and exclusive Household Painting Guide—which, because it suggests the correct Sherwin-Williams product to use for every surface in or about the average home, helps to stop mistakes in painting.

You will find it distinctly advantageous to follow this Guide to "Paint Headquarters"—the sign you will see on the store of a local merchant who carries the Sherwin-Williams line for your convenience.

THE PRESIDENT

first choice of America's first executives

A "CARGO OF VALUE" comes sailing home in The President, a Studebaker Big Six Custom Sedan for seven, and America's first car to combine custom charm and performance with common sense economy.

In six short months, this masterpiece of custom design has become the most popular seven passenger sedan in the world—indicating the purchasing judgment of executives for whom The President was created.

Its long, custom body is swung low for safety and beauty—lustrous with long-lived lacquers. Its interior is richly upholstered in broadcloth or fine mohair with broadlace trim, and enriched by silver-finish inlaid hardware. The patented Studebaker ventilating windshield insures draftless ventilation in every sort of weather. Powered by the quiet Big Six L-head motor which first beat the coast-to-coast time of the crack Limiteds, only seven American cars equal The President in horsepower rating—and they cost from two to four times more.

The President is waiting to see you—now!

THE PRESIDENT $2245

A Studebaker Big Six Custom Sedan (for seven)

f. o. b. factory, including 4-wheel brakes, disc wheels, bumpers and other equipment as listed

Equipment—No-draft ventilating windshield, exclusively Studebaker; front and rear bumpers; Watson stabilators; engine thermometer, clock and hydrostatic gasoline gauge on the dash; coincidental lock; oil filter; automatic windshield cleaner; double rear-vision mirror; vanity case; smoking set; arm rests; toggle grips; dome light, automatically turned on when right rear door is opened; rear traffic signal light; emergency lamp on extension; 4-wheel brakes; full-size balloon tires; and two-beam nickel-plated acorn headlights, controlled from steering wheel.

Gee—I've Had a Fine Time!

got to Panama some of the people went ashore and had an uncomfortable time looking for a good hotel.

But I was lucky enough to be with a man who showed me the sea wall around the city. This wall had a prison in it, full of terrible torture chambers and undersea dungeons in which the early Spaniards kept their prisoners. I learned how the first city of Panama was destroyed by the great English pirate, Morgan. Morgan's men nearly starved before they reached the city but ended up with millions in gold and jewels.

It was fun in this way, living history over again. But it wasn't half so exciting as opening up whole new worlds of animals, such as we did when we got down to the Galápagos Islands. As hardly any ships go to these islands it is possible to see hundreds of forms of animal life in the same state as they were before man came along to disturb them.

The first thing that struck me was the large number of animals, such as sea lions, lizards, strange fish, and thousands of birds. The second thing I noticed was how tame they all were.

These two facts make me believe what the scientists say about animal life in the days before there were so many human beings. The woods and plains and seashores were once overloaded with animals.

Down in the Galápagos Islands the animals seemed to think of us simply as other animals. As we didn't seem hungry and they weren't hungry, there weren't any hard feelings on either side.

SOON after we arrived, Doctor Beebe let me go down with a diving-helmet on. This helmet is just a big cup of brass and glass which you put over your head. It weighs forty pounds in air but hardly anything in the water. It was a funny feeling to climb over the side of a rowboat in about fifteen feet of water and go down to the bottom and look around just as if you were going down in the cellar.

At first the fish were a little frightened. Then they began to come closer and look at me. One came right up to my face and looked in. He was a shiny striped fellow with eyes that stuck out as though he were frightened.

Later on I watched Doctor Beebe spear fish away under the surface. He even stayed down while sharks swam around him. He had a special wire cage affair that was let down in the water, big enough for him to get into. And when the sharks were around he could use this and keep quite safe.

The trouble with the helmet was that deep water could not be investigated with it. For deep water we used the dredge, which brought up thousands of eels, shrimp, starfish and other forms of deep-sea life that I had never seen before, even in a book.

At first a mass of animals like these look interesting because they are brightly colored and have such funny shapes. But when you begin to understand why they have their colors and their shapes and do the funny things they do, you realize how wonderful life is.

I remember there was one fish that had a sort of electric light out in front of it. Another was striped so it could lie on the bottom where sunshine came through the seaweed and would be invisible, because its stripes looked like shadows.

Once when we were out in the small boats we got a giant devil fish. This is a big, flat fish like a skate. Two of our men harpooned him and the boat pulling on the harpoon line tired him out. When we finally got him aboard we found he was 18 feet from wing to wing and weighed 2,400 pounds.

ASHORE the animal life was awfully interesting. The big sea lions didn't seem to mind us unless we disturbed their families. You know sea lions have wives and children and a lot of customs that people have.

It was a terrible sight to see one of the sea lions get into the hot water near the volcano we discovered. The water was made hot by boiling lava which flowed down from the shore into it. He ran right into the scalding water near the shore. Instantly he threw himself straight up into the air to escape. He did this five times, then flopped down dead.

Booby birds and frigates were nesting on the sides of the hill just above the beach on Albemarle Island. They were so tame that I could go right up to them and lift them off their nests. I used to watch the frigate birds sweep down with their long taloned claws and pick fish out of the sea. The boobies were better off because they had webbed feet and can dive in and swim after the fish. But the frigate got even by stealing the boobies' fish every time he had a chance. A frigate bird would chase a booby that had a fish in its mouth and frighten it and make it drop the fish, which the frigate bird would then catch in the air. Sort of a mean trick, wasn't it?

This part of the world is thickly settled with lizards and bugs. There have to be lots of bugs to feed the lizards.

There was one big kind of lizard, four or five feet long, which was pretty close to the old-fashioned dragon. It was the ugliest animal I have ever looked at. Reptiles like this are of particular interest because many of them are survivors of prehistoric monsters, about which we know only what we learn from their fossils.

After three months in the "Arcturus" we reached home again. I remember the day we landed in New York. There was a big crowd down to meet us. I could tell by the looks on the faces in that crowd how much they wished they could have gone off to the edge of things and seen the strange animals and strange lands we had.

Sometimes I think what a shame it will be when the whole earth is explored and well known, so that excitement in travel will be taken away.

I thought nothing could be more exciting than the "Arcturus" trip. But last summer my father chartered the two-masted schooner "Effie Morrissey" and

Dog Saves His Master

"SAULT STE. MARIE, Ont., Jan. 29, 1927. After a terrific struggle against adverse winds, Prince, a dog as loyal as he is strong, swam to the shore of Michipicoten Island near here, dragging in tow his master in a canoe."

At this time of year, your dog needs a tonic. Guard him against sickness and general weakness with Sergeant's Condition Pills. Full directions on Page 20 of Polk Miller's Dog Book.

Hardly a day goes by but the papers chronicle a new dog hero. If you have a dog, you have a faithful friend that deserves your care.

Save Your Dog

You do not have to be an expert on dogs to know how to care for your dog and treat his ailments. You need only be a dog-lover, thinking enough of your dog to write for this information. Every dog owner can, without cost, find out how to treat dog diseases.

All dogs, puppies especially should be wormed. It may save their lives. Reasons are given on page 15 of the Dog Book.

Moreover, there are safe and effective remedies for every dog ailment, and you can easily find out when and how to use them.

Famous Dog Book Free

Guided by fifty years' experience, our staff of expert veterinarians have compiled a book of intense interest to dog-owners. It tells the symptoms of dog ailments and explains fully the best treatments for each. It explains proper methods of feeding and breeding. It is written in clear, explicit, non-technical language. It contains a unique Symptom Chart, making it easy to tell what's the matter with your dog. It is revised yearly and kept strictly up-to-date, and has been used as a guide by millions of owners. It has saved the lives of thousands of valuable dogs. A copy will be sent free to anyone who cares enough for his dog to write for it.

Fleas make dogs miserable and may cause serious skin troubles. Kill fleas with Sergeant's Skip Flea Soap or Powder as directed on page 42 of the Dog Book.

Expert Advice, Free

If your dog develops a condition that puzzles you, we urge you to write us, stating fully age, breed, sex and all symptoms. Our own skilled veterinarian and his staff will answer personally. Complete instructions for care and treatment will be sent you promptly without any charge. Sergeant's Dog Medicines, standard for over 50 years, are sold by dealers everywhere. If you cannot obtain them, write us direct. Address Polk Miller Products Corporation, 1562 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

went to Greenland with a party of scientists and big game hunters. Captain Bob Bartlett was in command, Peary's old skipper who went within a hundred miles of the North Pole.

Just as in my visit to the tropics, I soon found in going North there were very distinct things that stood out, things that most books failed to mention. One of these was the queer way temperature, vegetation, people, and animals, and even the sea, changed as we approached the Arctic regions.

We left home in June. The trees around our house were a hundred feet high and covered with leaves. When we got to Labrador, half way up, the trees were half a hundred feet high and had very small leaves. Part of the way up the Greenland coast the trees shriveled up to bushes, owing to the short Arctic summers. And when we reached Cape York we found the trees had disappeared altogether!

In the same way, the sea in Long Island Sound was about 70 degrees in temperature. Down the Straits of Belle Isle off the Gulf of St. Lawrence it was only about 45 or 50 degrees. When we reached Northumberland Island, where we were shipwrecked, the temperature was 29 degrees.

Incidentally, this is especially interesting because the temperature of the sea never goes below 28.5 degrees Fahrenheit. Captain Bob told me that, because of this, in the middle of the winter when the air temperature is 60 degrees below zero, the sea smokes like a kettle of water. The water is still nearly 30 degrees above zero, while the air is twice that below zero

IN CONTRAST to the sea's loss of heat and the land's loss of trees was the increase in bird life. Our harbors in the South are thick with sea birds, particularly gulls and kittiwakes. But nothing in the South can compare with the bird life which begins along the Labrador coast and extends north to the Arctic Ocean.

Among the Smith Sound Eskimos this heavy bird life is very important. The natives go up on the cliffs and dip birds out of the air with a net on the end of a long pole. They make shirts out of the bird skins and put the bodies of the birds down in sealskin bags for the winter.

While we were near Cape York we took a good many specimens of big Northern animals for the American Museum. One of the most interesting and unusual was the narwhal. This is a big grayish-white fish about twenty feet long. It has a long ivory tusk sticking out of its snout. No doubt it was samples of these tusks that once made people believe there were unicorns. In fact, the narwhal is the unicorn of the sea.

The Eskimos paddle up to a herd of narwhal and throw the harpoon into a fish's side. At the end of the harpoon line is a float and a drag, which tire the animal out. They kill him by driving long lances into his ribs.

Walrus are captured in the same way. We got some by shooting them while they lay on the ice floes. I was surprised at my first looking inside a walrus's mouth. I asked one of the scientists about this.

"He has to have good teeth," I was told, "in order to chew up the clams which he eats."

It seems that the walrus digs clams out of the sand with his tusks. He chews them up and spits out the shells. The first thing an Eskimo does when he kills a walrus is to cut open his stomach to see if it is filled with fresh clams.

In fact, the walrus almost supports the entire tribe of Smith Sound Eskimos which lives in the Cape York district. Walrus meat is the best dog food. The walrus's windpipe is the Eskimo's chewing gum, walrus eyes are the babies' gumdrops.

We went over to Ellsmere Land west of Greenland, in August, after bears. There aren't so many Polar bears as there used to be, at least not in waters a ship can go in. The whalers and exploring expeditions have pretty well cleaned them out. A bear lives on fish and seals. He creeps up on a seal lying asleep by its hole and strikes him with his big paws. Although the seal-skin is tough, the bear's long teeth grind it up into small bits.

Polar bears hibernate. That is, they sleep most of the winter. Sometimes, so the natives say, a bear will occupy a scooped-out place in an iceberg for a great many weeks, sleeping most of the time. When I saw a live bear I could understand this. The bear was fat enough to live for a long time, it seemed to me, without eating anything.

How curious it was, with bears and walrus and icebergs all around, to find beautiful white flowers blooming right on the edges of snow banks.

Of course I brought home a great many small trophies and souvenirs from the "Morrissey" and "Arcturus" trips. I wanted things to remind me of the places, people and animals I had seen.

Now I have a regular museum in my room at home. I have snake skins and booby bird eggs, walrus tusks and bear teeth, Eskimo carvings, and ivory and a lot of other junk. It isn't really junk, though. I find it reminds me more and more of the wonders in this great world of ours. It helps make it interesting to read books of travel and to study up on birds and fishes and animals.

IN THIS little museum room of mine, one of the things I like best is a fossil shark's tooth sent to me from the sandstone of southern Colorado. It comes from Mesa Verde National Park. It was given to me by Deric Nusbaum, the son of the superintendent of the Park. That was last year and I didn't know Deric then. But I had an awfully nice correspondence with him.

Deric is just my age—thirteen now. I sent him a sea lion's jaw I found down in the Galápagos Islands, and he swopped for it the fossil he found out there. Since then Deric wrote his book "Deric in Mesa Verde." Deric's story tells about his adventures out there in archæological work. He lives right in the country of the cliff-dwelling Indians of long ago.

This coming summer, as I have said, we are going up to the Hudson Bay country, and Deric almost surely will go with us. In the meanwhile, this spring I think he is going to write another book.

I have spoken of the lots of letters that come in to an author, even a boy like me. Well, there are even worse things than that! You would be surprised at the number of invitations to speak, to autograph books and go around and meet people, and all that. I think seven different out-

Through a Painter's Stencil

Borders that frame your walls in beauty

THE painter puts his stencil against the wall . . . . brushes over it. And behold, a design on the wall takes definite shape. The room itself acquires new beauty of color—new life. Where before there was perhaps just a plain, painted wall, there is now a wall panel outlined by a stencil border the color of which blends softly into the decorative scheme.

Stencils may be used to advantage in several other ways—as a frieze below the drop ceiling or as a single motif or an all-over treatment in panels. Where the rich, blended Tiffany finish is used, a new and delightful effect is achieved by placing a stencil against the wall and wiping out the topcoat colors where they show through the stencil openings.

No matter what colors are selected for the stencil designs and for the entire wall, you can obtain them exactly with paint made of Dutch Boy white-lead and Dutch Boy flatting oil, the all-lead, all-color paint.

Stenciling is only one of the distinctive and unusual effects obtainable with Dutch Boy white-lead paint. A new booklet, on decorating the home, shows some of these finishes in color and tells how to obtain them. With the booklet you will receive a decorator's data form from our Department of Decoration. Use this form if you want help in selecting a color scheme for your house. For the booklet just write to our nearest branch requesting "Booklet I."

An example of the applied stencil used as a border for a panel. Other uses are as a frieze around the entire upper side wall and as an all-over treatment in panels. The stencil may be either a deeper or a lighter tone of the same color over which it is put. Or it may be a strongly contrasting color. Several colors are used sometimes in a stenciled design.

THE BELT CHAIN WAY IS SAFER AND MORE ATTRACTIVE

WHEN summer finds you on the golf links . . . in camp . . . motoring . . . in a hot office or shop, or any place where the vest is left behind, the Simmons Slipon Belt Chain is the ideal way to carry your watch.

It's the neatest watch chain for the trousers watch-pocket ever made. The clasp fits on the belt regardless of width, and the chain is just long enough to serve its purpose.

Your jeweler has the Simmons Slipon Belt Chain in several attractive designs. All are made by the special Simmons process of drawing natural gold, green gold or white gold over a stout base metal. Durability is the natural result. Make your selection now and you will be ready for those hot days when you leave your vest at home. Prices range from $2.50 to $5.00. R. F. SIMMONS TRADE MARK CHAINS fits have asked me to talk on the radio. I talked twice, and it was pretty dreadful.

The swivel says it's a Simmons

The first time most of the gang who went north on the "Morrissey" had a sort of party, Dad leading the talking and asking questions to fill in a bit. And another night Dad and I had a "father and son" conversation. He talked about the trip, and then asked me to tell my ideas about things.

But I have got lots to do in school and I really hate to do this sort of thing. And so, for the most part the invitations are turned down. And I know Dad tells them that he thinks the place for a thirteen-year-old boy is at home and in school. And I think the home part of it is right anyway!

I honestly think about the best fun in the world is playing football, and although I am not a very good player I like hockey and baseball and basketball. And swimming I love. Of course that is one thing you miss when you go up North in the summer time.

So I am hoping that we will have one more Northern trip next summer. But if that falls through I will be very happy because there is so much else to do that is interesting. I would like to learn to play golf and get a chance with my tennis, which isn't so good. But, best of all, perhaps, I would like to go out to Mesa Verde and visit Deric and his nice mother and father, and have a chance to dig around in Indian ruins out there, and really learn something about fossils and the interesting life of the Indians who lived there long ago.

advances, its line of direction must be absolutely accurate, in order that the different sections shall meet at an exact point. In this case, the Great Northern engineer had repeatedly stayed all night in the tunnel, so that he could give the working crew their "line" just when they had to have it.

If they had been obliged to wait while he was sent for, it would have caused them to lose a little time in their race for the pennant—and the bonus.

This spirit of loyalty reaches across those thousand miles and more, between the Cascade camps and the St. Paul offices. In fact, that spirit was created in those offices. Mr. Baxter, in talking with me, spoke of R. F. Hoffmark, general superintendent at the camps, and of W. E. Conroy, his assistant, as "the best tunnel men in the world."

It was the same when he spoke of the men above him: of H. L. Mundy, his president; and Charles Ffolliott, the chairman of the board. Apparently, the spirit of loyalty, in all ranks of the organization, is of the double-back-action variety. And it is machines and methods, plus this spirit in men, that is doing the tunnel job.

NOW for the job itself, for it is almost as interesting as the men who are doing it.

Imagine yourself facing a mountain. Under its surface blanket of forest, you know, or at least you believe, it is practically a solid mass of granite. If you are an engineer, you wish it would be a solid mass. But you know it is more or less veined with cracks and fissures, filled with the water which has drained into them from the surface.

A 16 by 24 foot hole, almost eight miles long, must be bored through this mountain. Let us see how machines, methods, and men will have bored that hole, lined it with concrete, laid the railway track through it, and electrified it—all within three years.

In the first place, even they could not accomplish the task in anything like three years if they simply started at the two ends and worked inward. There is only one solution to their problem. Somehow or other, they must tap that eight-mile route at several points! Then they can work both ways from each of these points, until all the sections meet.

We have to admit that it's a great idea. But how in the world can they get into the heart of that granite mountain at half a dozen places?

Well, in this case, they got into it at one place by sinking a shaft from a point on the mountain-side called Mill Creek. This point was directly above the line of the proposed tunnel. The shaft, 659 feet deep, tapped the tunnel route about two miles west of the Berne end.

THAT gave them four "working faces," one inward from Scenic; one inward from Berne; and one in each direction from the foot of the Mill Creek shaft.

Four faces were better than two; but still they had to have more. They got them by the "pioneer tunnel" method, which I promised to explain.

The Mill Creek shaft divides the tunnel route into two sections, doesn't it? The short section is between the Mill Creek shaft and Berne. The other one, from the shaft to Scenic, is about five miles long! The mountain mass above this section is too deep to permit the sinking of shafts. Yet that section must be tapped at various points. Otherwise, the work would drag along for years.

This problem was a serious one, and after studying the methods used in driving all the long tunnels in the world, the one used in the very longest, the Simplon, between Switzerland and Italy, was adopted, and two tunnels were started. One is the main bore, the railroad tunnel itself. The other is the pioneer tunnel; not so large as the main bore, but a good big hole—8 by 9 feet—nevertheless.

The pioneer tunnel runs parallel with the main route, with a 60-foot wall of granite between them. At intervals of about 1,500 feet, a diagonal passage is cut through this wall, tapping the line which the main tunnel is to follow. The pioneer bore, being smaller, can be driven ahead faster than the main one.

Several cross-cuts have been made to the actual tunnel route; and at each of these points, crews are working in both directions twenty-four hours a day.

A changing creature is the woman of fashion. A source of never-flagging study for those who have to do with her adornment, whether they design her watches or her clothes

We have watched her as jealously as any French modiste

For thirty-five years Wadsworth Cases have led the style in the dress of fine watches

Wadsworth Cases led the styles when these were the fashion

How woman's tastes have changed in a generation!

From bustle and bodice and trailing hem to the short skirts and trim lines of today, how many different stages!

Yet the history of her clothing offers no greater contrasts than the history of her watch.

Compare the heavy locket timepiece of the lady in bustles with the dainty convenient wristlet of 1927.

Compare the elaborate ornamentation, the intricate scroll designs of thirty-five years ago with the simpler lines, the exquisite taste of the modern wrist watch.

The change in the woman's watch, naturally, did not take place over night. Like the change in her clothing it has been the result of gradual development.

For thirty-five years we have watched her as jealously as any Paris couturier. For thirty-five years the design of Wadsworth Cases has accurately reflected the increasingly better taste of the woman herself.

That is why Wadsworth Cases continue to lead the styles in the dress of fine watches. Why the leading manufacturers and importers have consistently selected Wadsworth Cases for their finest movements.

Among the many Wadsworth creations you are sure to find a case exactly suited to your taste, at a price quite within your means.

When you buy a watch, select the movement you prefer, or that which your jeweler recommends. Probably you will find that it is already dressed in a case by Wadsworth. If not, ask that it be so dressed.

For the mark "Wadsworth Quality" stamped inside is your assurance of correct design, finest materials and workmanship, and that exactness of fit essential to adequate protection of the intricate mechanism contained within. Look for it when you buy.

is therefore being achieved. Men and machines have been taken into the heart of a granite mountain. The five-mile line of that long section has been tapped at several points. As the work proceeds, it will be tapped at still more.

"All very fine," you agree; "but what about the cost? You said money was an important factor in railroad operation. These folks are building two tunnels instead of one. Doesn't that cost a lot more?"

YES, it does cost more; although not as much as you might think. It saves some expense directly—and a whole lot more indirectly. You remember, I said there are two important factors in a case like this: time and money. But time is money! If you are investing ten million dollars in a tunnel, in order to gain economy in operating a railroad, you want to get some return just as soon as possible on the millions that you are putting into this hole in the ground.

Interest on these growing millions is steadily piling up. You want to reap the benefit of this job, which will pay that interest and will eventually pay for the job itself.

By means of the pioneer tunnels, which will parallel the route of the main bore between the west end and Mill Creek, the job will be finished in a quarter of the time it otherwise would take.

These parallel tunnels speed things up in various ways. Instead of only four "working breasts," they will provide twenty or more in the main tunnel. They furnish ventilation, air being blown into the main bore through the pioneer tunnel and the cross-cuts. When the rock faces are blasted in the main bore, the débris doesn't have to be hauled out by that route, delaying the work in progress there. It is quickly loaded into small cars, which are run through the nearest cross-cut to the pioneer tunnel, and thence outside to be dumped.

These are only two examples of the many ways in which the pioneer tunnels justify their existence. Moreover, while the age of initial railway construction may be over, the age of double-tracking is only fairly begun. And when the time comes for double-tracking the Great Northern from Berne to Scenic, behold the pioneer tunnel, ready to hand! It will be comparatively easy to enlarge it to the required full size.

I wish I had space to describe all the dramatic details of a job like this. But here is just one sample of the sort of thing these men are doing. It concerns the Mill Creek shaft.

If you ever have stood at the mouth of a mining shaft, you know that this opening is "straddled" by a high framework. The four corners are four legs; as if a giant quadruped—or the skeleton of one—stood squarely over the shaft. This "quadruped," whose bones are of wood and steel, is called the "head-frame."

The one which straddles the Mill Creek shaft is 87 feet high. Its legs are wooden ones, but it is no cripple! Each one is a single timber; no splicing in it. Yet the timbers forming the back legs are 114 feet long.

To save time, the digging of the shaft and the building of the head-frame proceeded simultaneously. But both could not be done at the same spot! The head-frame could not be erected over the opening where the shaft was being sunk, without the two jobs getting in each other's way.

So, under the direction of Frank J. Kane, the superintendent at the Mill Creek shaft, the huge, four-legged skeleton was built off to one side of the shaft opening. During its construction, the shaft had reached a depth of several hundred feet, and was then ready to use the head-frame with its accompanying machinery.

But the skeleton's legs couldn't walk to their new position. So the whole mass was jacked along, inch by inch and foot by foot, until it stood in its proper place.

The job of moving it began at eight o'clock one morning. It was completed in five hours! Then, instead of calling this achievement a day's work, cables were hung, machinery was connected, and at ten-forty-five that same night, the new equipment hoisted the first skipful of dirt out of the depths of the shaft.

It was really broken rock; but "dirt" is a comprehensive term, much used by men on such jobs. In fact, civil engineers often refer to themselves as "dirt movers."

To a certain extent that is what they are. The construction of the Panama Canal, for instance; what was it but a gigantic task of moving dirt? Taking it from somewhere and putting it somewhere else.

BEFORE leaving the Cascade tunnel-makers to their job, it will be interesting to see how that tunnel will rank:

It will be one of the five longest tunnels in the world. The others are:

Simplon: 65,734 ft.—12.4 miles.
St. Gotthard: 48,893 ft.—9.26 miles
Loetschberg: 47,685 ft.—9.03 miles.
Mont Cenis: 42,150 ft.—7.97 miles.

(The Mt. Cenis tunnel, which is between France and Italy, was originally 37,385 feet long, as driven in a straight line, but it was afterward opened up on curves at the end, which lengthened it to 42,150 ft.)

New Cascade: 41,142 ft.—7.79 miles.

Although the Cascade tunnel isn't the longest, it is the speediest one in the world. It took more than seven years, for instance, to drive the St. Gotthard tunnel; and it is less than one fourth longer than the Cascade one.

Part of this gain is, of course, due to vastly improved machinery and methods. But it is due also to the human engineering which fosters a spirit of loyalty and co-operation that keeps the entire force, from top to bottom, on its toes.

"STRANGE Places of Worship"—a woodshed in a rain, the peak of a mountain range, the top of an old rail fence, a cabin where dogs slept—these and other odd shrines are described next month by Archibald Rutledge. This is an article that has profound spirituality as its base. It comes from the human heart, and is addressed to the human heart. It is a rare picture of devout persons seeking solitude that they may commune with their Creator. You will find peace, beauty, and reverence in it.

asked me. "Up somewhere on Maple Street, wasn't it? Yes, of course. I remember now. What can I do for you?"

As he spoke he was eying me appraisingly. Presently he shook hands again, and less formally, as he ushered me out.

Well, Buck Olin was only one boy, after all. The others would more than make up for his casualness. Will Bryant was dead; and Carl Stebbins was living in the West just then; but there were plenty more of the old crowd in town. I began my round of surprise visits to them.

One of them was too busy to see me. Another sent back my card with a penciled line on it saying he saw salesmen only by appointment. A third remembered me with an affectionate warmth that went straight to my heart—until he brought the talk around to a note he had to meet in five days. Perhaps for boyhood friendship, I'd help out an old pal who was in merely temporary difficulties?

I don't know who went on his note. It was not I.

After six interviews, I gave up my project of gathering my old friends around me.

MY PROSPECTIVE two weeks in Fallfield tapered down to something short of two days. The joke was on me, but it was a long time before I could class it as a joke. I had gone away when a small boy, and here I had returned with silly notions that I still meant something to the town. I had taken no part in its life for fifteen years; I had not even kept up with what had happened there. Why should I have expected the Old Home Town to keep tab on me? I shouldn't have—and it hadn't!

(By the way, in more recent years I have had some mighty pleasant times in Fallfield. Apparently my dog yarns have won me a welcome that memories of my boyhood could not. Indeed, a family hotel there has been named "Terhune Hall" in my honor, a compliment which flatters and delights me vastly.) No, the town was not to blame for its chilly reception of me on that first return visit. The fault—or rather the folly—was all mine. I had taken with me a galleryful of glorified mental pictures. With the passing of time, these pictures had become enhanced and idealized out of all semblance to reality.

It is always so with one's recollections of an Old Home Town. We, who go away, are soon half forgotten by those who stay on; whether it is a town or a world that we go from. Nothing worth while is free, and this is a part of the price we must pay for going to distant places, which offer us, we imagine, better opportunities than we could find at home.

We all learned in our elementary physics that nature loathes a vacuum. So does life—as I learned on this visit to Fallfield. Gaps fill, with swiftness and completeness. It is normal, and it is infinitely better that it should be so, and that newer interests should crowd out the absentees. Life must go on. Nobody is at fault.

The art of smiling charmingly is the art of caring properly for one's teeth. That is why Pepsodent, urged by dental authorities, is also universally placed by experts, these days, near the top of the list of modern beauty aids.

Cleanse Teeth of Dingy Film

To Brighten Smiles Quickly

The new way to combat the film on teeth—the source of many tooth and gum disorders—which numbers of leading authorities suggest

WHEN teeth lack gleam and whiteness, it is usually because they are film coated.

Ordinary brushing has failed to combat film successfully. Thus thinking people, chiefly on dental advice, are adopting a new way in tooth and gum care called Pepsodent.

Now an effective film combatant

By running your tongue across your teeth, you will feel a film; a slippery sort of coating. Ordinary brushing does not remove it.

Film absorbs discolorations from food, smoking, etc. That is why, according to leading dental opinion, teeth look dingy and "off color."

Film clings to teeth, gets into crevices and stays. It invites and breeds the germs of decay. And that is why it is judged so grave a danger to the teeth by authorities.

Film is the basis of tartar. And tartar, with germs, is the chief cause of pyorrhea. That is why regular film removal is urged as probably first in correct gum protection.

Most dental authorities urgently advise thorough film removal at least twice each day. That is every morning and every night.

For that purpose, obtain Pepsodent, the special film-removing dentifrice which leading dental authorities favor. Different from any other tooth paste.

Pepsodent curdles the film, then removes it; then polishes the teeth in gentle safety to enamel. It combats the acids of decay and scientifically firms the gums. It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. And meets, thus, in all ways, the exactments of modern dental science.

On dental advice, people are adopting this new way of tooth cleansing. Obtain Pepsodent, the quality dentifrice, at drug stores. Two months' supply at a moderate price—or send coupon for 10-day tube. Use twice every day. See your dentist twice each year.

You may not agree with anything I am saying. I hope you don't. For I should like to think that your Old Home Town is, in reality, all that your memory pictures it to be. If so, my clumsy tale may have no meaning to you, except as you are interested in the experiences of another.

It is said that not one New Yorker or Chicagoan in two hundred was born in New York or in Chicago. That means, in those two cities alone, there are several million residents who have left an Old Home Town.

The same thing applies in a lesser degree to people in any of a hundred big cities. One might safely say that the bulk of America's urban population is made up of Old Home Towners.

It is still safer to say that the big majority of those many million Old Home Towners have times of yearning unspeakably to go back to the place of their birth and of their childhood.

Perhaps some of them, after long years of absence, have made the trip and have found everything just as fancy and memory painted it.

Perhaps.

But, out of more than a hundred men and women to whom I have put the question, only one has replied in the affirmative. That one had just returned to New York from his first visit in twenty-two years to his native Kansas home.

"I found it just as I left it," he told me. "Folks treated me just the same too. Last time I was there, they stuck me in jail; and they did the same this time. Same jail; same cell. Everything the same!"

I asked the question, years ago, of a restaurant man who since has grown rich and influential. This is the story he told me:

"I WAS born in Naples. I lived there until I was twenty. Then I came to New York and got a job as a waiter. By and by I started a little restaurant of my own; and made good money. I was able to save a few thousand dollars. I married and had two children.

"But always my heart was sick for Naples. I would look out at the snow and slush and ice in the New York streets, and I would remember southern Italy, where it was always sunshiny and warm and full of flowers and music. I hated America; and I prayed every night and morning for a chance to go back to Naples.

"At last I was able to sell my restaurant for a big price. I sold it. I said good-by to this cold and crowded and hustling country, and I sailed for Naples with my family. I told them we were turning our backs forever on rain and snow and hustle; and that we were going to live evermore in a land of eternal sunshine and gayety.

"I was not a rich man, from an American standard. But I had enough money to live in luxury as a landed proprietor in my own dear Italy.

"I woke up at dawn, on the morning our ship cast anchor in Naples harbor. I had been telling my wife and the boys that the Bay of Naples was the most lovely sight on earth with its fire-blue water and the crescent of city rising toward the green hills, and with old Vesuvius smoking in the sunlight.

"The anchor chains woke me that morning. I jumped into my clothes and ran on deck, herding my family ahead of me, to get that wonderful first view of my home city.

"Then I stood still and stared.

"A cold mist cut me to the bones. The sky was a dirty lead color. So was the city. A sluice of winter rain was falling. Under that wetness and gloom, Naples looked hideous. Gray mud and rain puddles and chilliness! No sunshine, no flowers, no music! The mist cut off all view of Vesuvius, and of the other mountains I used to love.

"Do you know what I did? I went below, and found the purser; and I bought return passage to New York on that same ship. I didn't even set foot on shore, all the rainy time we were anchored in the Bay of Naples. I came back here to New York and bought another restaurant with the cash I had been going to use in buying an estate near Naples. Here I am going to stay."

Yes; if the sun had been shining warmly and brilliantly when they arrived at Naples, and if everything had been at its Italian loveliest, the story might have had another ending.

In the days of his youth, there had been cold rains and raw mists, occasionally, brooding over Naples. But, with the passing of the years, they were forgotten in the happier memories of sun-kissed quays and shimmering waters and moon-drenched nights when a hundred street singers are abroad; until at last Italy had become to him a bourne of perpetual beauty and warmth and music and flowers.

A SCULPTOR—justly world-famed—found much of his inspiration in the memory of a semi-wild Western townlet that had been his boyhood home. He brought its details and its suggestions into his work. Years passed before he went back there; but always he carried its picture in his mind. Always it inspired and guided him in the delineation of certain phases of his art.

Then he returned for a visit. At least it was going to be a visit. As events turned out, it was only a stop between trains.

The town had progressed as fast as had the rest of urban America. Where dusty cowboys had galloped their pinto ponies down a twisting yellow dust road between picturesque wooden shanties, now a neatly painted interurban trolley car made its sedate way along a wide asphalted street, a street whose shops were of modern architecture and full of modern city goods.

Where once cowboys and barefooted little ragamuffins and frontier men and women had tramped the narrow wooden sidewalks, the broad concrete pavements now were trodden demurely by white-collared business men and up-to-date flappers.

Shielding his eyes from the changed scenes, and with the air castles of decades crashing down about his ears, the sculptor went back to the railway station and took the first outbound train, heedless in which direction it might be headed. His loved source of inspiration was in danger. He wanted to remember that town as he had known it, because he needed the vigor in his work that sprang from those memories of early frontier life.

Both in the case of the sculptor and of the restaurant man, the mere external appearance of their former homes was enough to smash their roseate mind-pic-

Resinol Soap wins professional favor

The effect of its Resinol properties brings warm praise from nurses

CRISP, immaculate, clear-skinned and wholesome, trained nurses are quick to recognize real merit in a toilet requisite and to adopt its use when they find it produces comfort or other beneficial results. Resinol Soap has won their endorsement through its distinctive Resinol properties.

They realize at once that these Resinol ingredients make the luxuriant lather soothing as well as cleansing and help to keep the skin soft and natural. They freely express their satisfaction, and in their letters are such statements as:

"Has always been my preference because it has such a soothing feeling on the skin."

"Am delighted with the wonderful lather, and appreciate its healing qualities."

"I recommend it to those who are seeking a smooth, natural complexion."

"Use it for my patients because it is so refreshing."

"As a cleansing agent, I like it very much."

Why not follow the example of these nurses and begin today to use Resinol Soap. Your druggist sells it. Of course we will be glad to send a trial size cake, free, if you will mail us the coupon below, but a full size cake gives a more satisfactory test.

If you are now annoyed by blotches or similar disorders, apply a touch of Resinol—that soothing ointment which is so widely used for various skin troubles—and see how quickly the blemishes disappear. It has been prescribed by doctors for more than thirty years.

At noon—each day

JAPAN TEA

The drink for relaxation

Ten minutes to restore the nervous energy you've been paying out all morning.

Ten minutes to wind you up like a clock for the afternoon's work.

Just ten minutes spent in relaxation over a leisurely cup or two of Japan Green Tea after luncheon!

Drink it slowly, lingeringly. Enjoy each separate mouthful.

Can you afford the time?

Try it once, this way, and see what it does for you!

You'll make it a daily habit.

Japan Tea is tea at its best—the natural leaf, uncolored and unfermented, with all the flavor-laden juices of the fresh leaves preserved by immediate sterilization.

Specify Japan Green Tea when you buy. Put up for the home in packages under various brands. Several grades and prices. The best will cost you only a fraction of a cent a cup tures of other days. Oftener, I think, it is the change in the Home Town people, rather than in the town itself, that does this work of demolition. More often still, it is the change in the one who has gone away.

His former friends and acquaintances have developed new interests; they certainly cannot stand still mentally, living through the years on experiences they had as children and as young grown-ups. The one who went away has also found new interests, new friends. The things you talked about years ago—youthful parties, school items and the like—no longer furnish you with sufficient topics of conversation. The man who goes away, remains away for years, changes and grows up, yet expects the Old Home Towners to remain the same, is expecting the impossible. If he stopped to think, if he cross-examined his ego, he would not expect to be important to persons he has not seen or written to in years—as I expected on that memorable visit to Fallfield.

AN ACQUAINTANCE of mine left the middle-size Middle-West city of his birth and youth, and came to New York. He rose to the control of a huge corporation. His name became internationally known. Last year, he told me of a return visit he paid to the Old Home Town. Like myself and like millions of others, he had been looking forward for years to such a return. With his desire to see the old place and his old friends, was a forgivable pride in the career that had been his, and the joy of anticipating his townsfolk's pride in his high achievements.

He went thither for an indefinite stay; planning all the gorgeous things I had planned for my visit to Fallfield, and with the added ambition to invest there a goodly slice of his several-figure fortune.

He stayed little longer than I had stayed at Fallfield. Like myself, he was all but forgotten by his former intimates. The few of them who had followed his career were in awe of him. The rest were not interested. Here is one of his minor experiences, as he related it to me:

"John Smith was my side-partner and my buddy up to the time I left for New York. He was the first one of the old crowd I looked up. He is running a small factory, and he isn't running it any too prosperously. I figured it would be fun to take a silent partnership in his business and lift it high off the rocks and help him toward Easy Street.

"I touched on the plan. At once, I could see he thought I had some sinister purpose in meddling with his business. But he said he'd talk it over with his wife. I invited them both to dinner. Smith hadn't heard anything of my work in New York and in London. I made it as mild as I could; but I could see he thought I was bragging. His wife was in no doubt at all. She was certain I was a monumental liar.

"Smith and she seemed to think I was trying to make an impression of wealth, and that I was probably a shipping clerk with wild-cat investment tendencies.

"When I ventured to bring up the theme of Smith's factory, saying I was sure I could find at least one hundred thousand dollars capital to put into it, she arose and told Smith it was time to go home. The next day when I called at his factory he sent word he was too busy to see me."

There is little use in wasting your time by piling up these anecdotes. All of them go to prove the same thing; and most of your friends can tell you similar experiences of their own, with more point to them. It comes down to this: The Old Home Town changes, develops, improves; the Old Home Towners change, and you change. Which is exactly as it should be. You surely wouldn't have your former home and former friends stagnate, so that when you drifted casually back you could take them up right where you left off years before!

If the Towners should hold a permanent Lodge of Sorrow every time some boy or girl went to another city to live, the price of crape would become prohibitive. If they should be foolish enough to keep vacant spaces in their hearts and lives, one space for each acquaintance who moved away, they would find life decidedly empty.

They go on with their lives, filling the gaps with new interests and wisely looking ahead instead of behind. Then, when one of us exiles strays home, if he has been away a long time he may be nothing more than an obscure character in a book long since read and put away. How can they be expected to set the clock back for a term of years, and to brush aside all later interests, in order to do honor to a half-defaced memory? (It shames me now to recall that I expected Fallfield to do that for me!)

When John Jones, who used to live near Sunnybank thirty years ago, comes back to Pompton Lakes and calls on me, I don't lay aside my work and give up the day to reveling in his society.

Why should I blame Buck Olin for giving me similar treatment when I dropped in at his Fallfield office in the middle of a busy work day? In fact, I don't blame him at all. It is all part of a life which is much larger than the people who must live it.

THE people who stay have no time to grieve over the people who go. Life, close at hand, shuts out the vision of life anywhere else; even as To-day must always block the picture of Yesterday. If we, who yearn to go back to the Old Home Town, would bear that in mind, we should save ourselves from grievous heartaches.

Napoleon III—Louis Bonaparte—Emperor of the French, spent part of his youthful exile in a New Jersey village. I can visualize him as having come back there, say in 1871, after his subjects kicked him off his throne and chased him into banishment.

Let us say the fallen emperor revisited New Jersey, during his wanderings; just for a look at the Old Home Town, and for a reminiscent chat with his former neighbors. The first man he happened to meet as he left the railroad station was Jed Perkins, who once had lived next door to him. With no undue exaggeration, I can hear in fancy the following dialogue:

"Why, hello, Jed! Don't you remember me? I'm Louis Bonaparte."

"Why, ye-e-s, I do seem to remember you, now. Been away, haven't you?"

"I've been away for twenty-odd years, Jed. I was Emperor of the French, from 1852 to 1870."

"You don't say so! You'll have to drop in some evening and tell the wife and myself all about it. By the way, the seven-twenty-nine express has been changed to a local. What do you know about that? These railroads think they own the earth, don't they? Well, g'-by—le's see, the name's Boneheim, isn't it? Oh, Bonaparte of course. I remember, now. Well, so long. I gotta get to the office."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

It is far more important to Jed Perkins—yes, and to you and to me—that the 7:29 express has thrown out our whole daily commuting routine by degenerating into a local, than that a former townsman has been dethroned, three thousand miles away. Can you blame us?

I don't think I shall be sneered at, as maudlinly sentimental, when I say there is one touch of magic which can keep the Old Home Town from changing its attitude toward us, or from checking our whole-souled joy in returning to it again and again.

That magic touch is supplied if our parents still live there. Our parents will keep the neighbors from daring to forget us and from thinking we are anything but the best and cleverest people on earth. Our parents, too, will make the place continue to be our Home, not simply our Old Home Town; no matter how long we may have been absent, or how seldom we go back.

The Feud in Hell's Kitchen

Dave. Thirty a week—when you work all week."

"That ain't it, Ellen. He'll make me a gateman after a while—and there's a lot of pickings there. Some of those fellers make seventy, eighty dollars a week on the gate, and make it legitimate. Vann'll do it for me too, if I stick a while."

So Dave went back to the water front as a cargo guard. For a long time nothing happened. An occasional fist fight when some longshoreman found temptation too great, a wordy battle now and then; but for the most part there was that something in Kerry's eyes which gave warning that he was not the safest sort of person in the world to fool with.

"You see, Ellen," he told her a month later, "everything's apple sauce. I never have no real trouble."

"Just the same," she said, "I wisht they'd let you carry a gun."

"Well, they won't. So far's I know, there ain't but three piers on the West Side where they let the watchmen tote gats . . . and they're company men, not agency. We don't really need guns. Maybe it's even safer not to have 'em."

And that was that. Dave did nicely and worked faithfully, with always the bait of gatemanship dangling before his eyes. But even at that he should not have volunteered to watch alone in the hold of the "Regal." It is customary to send two watchmen below decks in each hatchway. But Dave was tight pressed for ready cash, and when he volunteered to handle the job alone Old Man Vann assented. He raised Dave's pay a dollar a day for the job and wished him luck. Of course there's no better safer food for Baby!

Active little bodies need this delicious whole wheat nourishment!

Summer feeding is no longer a fearful bugaboo to intelligent mothers of young children.

That's because they have learned the vital importance of serving simple, easily-digested, nourishing food, such as Wheatena, during the trying summer months.

Child health authorities advise cooked cereals, preferably whole wheat; as a most healthful diet for youngsters—all year 'round. Wheatena is definitely recommended by the most eminent authorities on child feeding in America.

In summer, when active little bodies need substantial nourishment, you cannot give them a more appetizing, digestible and healthful food than Wheatena. Served hot or cold, with milk or cream, Wheatena will help solve your summer feeding problem.

he considered that Kerry was foolish; but even he did not know how foolish Kerry was. It meant nothing to Mr. Vann that the "Regal" was docked in the Hell's Kitchen district.

The "Regal" started taking cargo Tuesday. On Tuesday afternoon a certain Mr. Cockeye MacShane informed Mr. Eddie Grogan that Dave Kerry was watching alone below decks at hatch number two.

Eddie substantiated Cockeye's tidings and carried them to Glory Lawson. That afternoon Mr. Lawson was busy. For one thing, he ordered Mr. Red Gissing to be at the Trans-Oceanic pier at seven o'clock sharp the following morning. Identical orders were issued to Messrs. Tony Canzano and Jim Hennessy.

Glory's next step was to visit a sharp-nosed gentleman of easy conscience and acquisitive tendencies.

"You're the assistant boss stevedore over at the Trans-Oceanic now, ain't you?"

"Yeh."

"An' you're runnin' the shape-up every morning, ain't you?"

"Uh-huh."

"Well, I'm Glory Lawson; you know me?"

"Yeh—sure I do."

"Good." Glory shoved a crisp bill into the other's hand. "That's extra. What I'm givin' you is orders. To-morrow morning when you shape 'em up, you pick me for loading below decks at hatch number two. You used three men down there to-day. All right; the other two will be Eddie Grogan an' Jim Hennessy. Red Gissing is to handle the winch. Tony Canzano is to get the job of gang boss. Got that?"

"I got it. . . . Say, listen, you ain't plannin' no haul, are you?"

"No. If we was, we'd cut you in on it."

That night Glory Lawson played pool with his friend Eddie Grogan. Eddie won consistently, but Glory's expansive contentment was undisturbed. "To-morrow," he commented, "I'm sure gonna learn a certain party it ain't safe to marry Glory Lawson's girl!"

DAVE KERRY reached the Trans-Oceanic pier at fifteen minutes before seven o'clock the following morning. It was a chill gray day, and he hastened into the shelter of the big pier with never a glance toward the motley gang of poorly clad longshoremen, shenangoes and wharf rats waiting patiently for the shape-up. Dave slouched into the roundsman's office, and chatted for a few moments with that person, then made his way along the pier.

It was the still moment of morning before the water front begins to hum with a thousand discords, when the stillness preceding the bedlam of winches and trucks and shouting voices is in itself symphonic. The whistle of a river tug, the rattle of a ferry in a slip near by, the low-toned conversation of other watchmen taking their appointed places by huge piles of cargo awaiting shipment. . . .

Outside the pier, the crowd of would-be workmen grew more dense. The assistant boss stevedore appeared, notebook in hand. Every morning this happens; every morning at every pier where there is cargo being loaded or unloaded. It is the great moment of the longshoreman's day—for a longshoreman's job is a daily one. The fact that he has worked hard and given satisfaction to-day does not assure employment to-morrow. This is the shape-up; the daily selection of the laborers who will handle cargo from eight in the morning until five in the afternoon.

The assistant boss stevedore was nervous. He tried to control his voice as he picked man after man and assigned each to a particular job:

"You—with the torn britches—on the pier. Georgetti, you'll load in hatch number one. Lawson, you'll be in hatch number two. Smith, take the winch on number four. Grogan, below in hatch two. . . ." And so on and on and on. Canzano was duly appointed gang boss; it was his job to stand on the deck and signal the winchman when each draft was ready. These particular Gophers met at the timekeeper's window, where each was handed a brass check, which was to be cashed on pay day. They did not look at each other, although once when Eddie Grogan found himself standing next to Jim Hennessy, he whispered the single question:

"Heeled?"

"Sure."

That was all. They wandered out on the pier, waiting for the starting whistle. The shape-up had taken perhaps forty minutes. At eight o'clock work was to start.

AT FIVE minutes before eight Dave Kerry made his way for'ard from the ship's galley, where he had been chatting with one of the cooks. He located hatch number two, and clambered down the ladder—down three decks. It was a forbidding place, with cargo blocking the bulkheads for'ard and aft. On the deck immediately above were a few scattered cases; but the real task of loading was being conducted from the lowest deck upward.

Dave seated himself on a box. He was very much at ease, and victim to no slightest premonition. He heard someone coming down the ladder of the hatch; and it was not until he looked into the smiling eyes of Glory Lawson that he suspected anything unusual.

A moment later Eddie Grogan appeared. Hennessy, slender and lithe as a panther, was next. They did not glance in Kerry's direction; but the watchman was not fooled. For the first time he began to believe that he had been too hasty in volunteering to watch below decks alone.

The hold was very much of a trap. The big bulkheads for'ard and aft contained doors; but these had been securely blocked by heavy cargo the previous day. The single mode of exit was up the ladder to the deck, and Dave knew better than to attempt that.

He knew perfectly well what the presence of these particular gangsters portended. They had no intention of permitting him to leave the hold of the "Regal." He noticed that they had brought their lunches, just as he himself had done. No shadow of an excuse then to clamber out at the noon hour.

He experienced an uncomfortable sensation at the pit of his stomach. He knew that this was just such a situation as men of the Glory Lawson type revel in. Odds of three to one, no possible escape; and of course they were armed, and he was not.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

Worse than that, they knew he was unarmed. The Trans-Oceanic watchmen were supplied by an agency and were not privileged to carry guns. Theirs was a job of bluff; they were there to prevent cargo stealing, and were vested with only such authority as they were courageous enough to assume.

At eight o'clock work started. Silence was transformed into bedlam as all of the winches commenced at once. There were hoarse shouts and bellowings, a sudden clatter and clangor of trucks on the big pier; hoarse-voiced orders, a din which reverberated down the hatchway and echoed from the steel sides of the big ship. Dave Kerry sat silently and smiled; but it was a smile only of the lips. He fully appreciated his danger.

LOADING started in hatch number two. There was a shout from the gang boss on deck as the longshoremen on the pier slung a draft on the heavy iron hook. Then a snorting of the winches on deck, a shrieking of cable, and the big sling with its load of cargo was lifted from the pier, and suspended over the twelve-foot hatch. At another signal it was lowered three decks, to where Glory Lawson and his henchmen were waiting.

They were skilled workers. The giant hook dropped gently, so expertly that it unhooked itself and swung idly back and forth in the middle of the hatchway. The men stepped forward and removed the cases of cargo from the sling. Then the signal was given the gang boss, and the hook and sling returned through the hatchway to the pier, while Glory and his men busied themselves placing the cargo.

It was not until an hour later that an overt move was made by the gangsters. They unloaded a half-dozen small cases and inspected them carefully after the sling had shot upward. Then, quite deliberately, Glory Lawson drove his hook into one of the boxes and tore it open. It was filled with watches; and he fingered them provocatively as he addressed the grave-faced watchman.

"How about it, Watch? You in?"

It was a set question. When larceny is to be attempted in the hold, the would-be thieves question their watchman in that manner. If he is of easy conscience, he nods affirmatively; and when the longshoremen check out that night they carry in their clothes a wealth of small stealage.

But Dave Kerry realized that this was no ordinary situation. He knew that they knew he was not a grafter; he knew that they had smashed this case of American watches not with any particular desire to steal, but in order to provoke him to action. And he had no idea whatsoever of being betrayed into an offensive move.

It was his task to protect the company. It was incumbent upon him to prevent thievery below decks. He saw them waiting for him to do something. And he did precisely nothing.

The morning dragged away. Hatch number two was working slowly. Less cargo was loaded than should have been. The gang boss was undoubtedly aware of the situation below, for occasionally Kerry could see his swarthy face peering down the hatch and, when Glory and his men were slow in unloading the draft, he bim-

Magazines Cost You Less by the Year— Why Not Books?

When you subscribe for a magazine for a year, you pay less than when you buy a single copy.

WHEN you subscribe in advance for a series of concerts you get a much lower price than for one performance.

If you subscribe through the Literary Guild for 12 books a year you get your new books for less than if you buy each book separately at a bookstore.

The Literary Guild of America abolishes the risk of uncertain editions and helter-skelter distribution. Its plan is to publish for an organized body of subscribers in advance. They will receive twelve books—one each month—as they would a magazine.

By adopting the magazine idea, the Guild gives you better contemporary books at lower prices.

The Literary Guild of America

Privileges to Members

1 Discrimination—Your books are selected for you by an Editorial Board of distinguished critics.

2 Width of Choice—The books are chosen from original manuscripts—not from books already published. These manuscripts are submitted by any publisher or author in America and Europe.

3 Special Beautiful Edition—The Literary Guild makes a special edition of the book. At the same time the regular publisher will make a regular edition to be sold through the bookstore. The Guild book will always be at least as good as the regular edition.

4 Convenience—Once a month the postman will hand you a book from the Guild. All postage will be prepaid. It will reach you with as little trouble as your magazines.

5 Promptness—You do not receive your copy three or four months after the book is published. The Guild edition will reach you on the same day that the book-seller receives his copy at the regular price.

6 Half Price—By subscribing for a year at a time, the members of the Guild get these books, postage prepaid, at about half the price non-members pay for single books in the stores.

7 Experimental Low Price—The present price holds good to immediate subscribers. It is an experiment. It may prove too low, in which case later subscribers will have to pay more. And you pay in small installments if you prefer.

self manipulated the slack cable until the big hook was loosened.

Once, when Kerry rose to stretch himself, Eddie Grogan deliberately shouldered him and turned with an ugly growl: "Whyn'tcha look where you're going?"

Dave Kerry grinned good-naturedly: "Sorry, Grogan. My fault."

NOON—and an hour of absolute quiet. Once, shortly after work had started again in the afternoon, Kerry moved to the very edge of the deck where it terminated at the hatch opening. He wanted to see what the others would do: whether they would construe this move as an attempt to escape. Glory left his work and moved forward; and at that instant there was a shrieking of the winch, a singing of heavy steel cable, and the massive iron hook came crashing down into the hold, missing Kerry's head by inches.

The watchman leaped back. He knew definitely now that the men above were in on the plot. The hook had been sent to crush him—and then there would have been the usual alibi: faulty winch—accident.

Afternoon wore slowly away. Tension was growing; there were frequent whispered conferences among the Gophers, all of which Dave Kerry watched calmly, but with inward trepidation. After one particularly lengthy conference Glory Lawson swaggered near to where Kerry was sitting. The watchman rose warily, and Glory sneered.

"What you gettin' up for, Watch?"

"Just stretching. Seventh inning."

"A-a-a-ah! Trying to be cute, ain't you?"

"Guess I was born cute, Glory."

"Uh-huh. And you're most likely to die the same way."

This much Dave Kerry knew: even to the lengths of committing cold murder, they had no slightest intention of letting him escape. He fancied he knew what they would do. Corner him, rough him up a bit, provoke him to physical combat, and then pump a bullet into his body. It had been done before. It could be done again. He noticed the others watching him even more closely after Lawson moved away.

The cargo on that particular deck had not been expertly loaded. Lawson and his fellows were not intent on their job. A couple of dozen big cases had been dumped willy-nilly near where Kerry was standing, waiting to be trimmed in with the other cargo. Eddie Grogan, at a signal from Glory, moved toward the watchman. He placed hands on hips and stared insolently.

"Well," he inquired, "don't you like it?"

Kerry arched his eyebrows. "I ain't got a thing to do with cargo-trimming."

Grogan did not notice that as Kerry spoke he moved around so that the longshoreman stood between him and a blind passage behind the big cases.

"You been lookin' kind of funny."

"I never did think I was good-lookin'."

Grogan released a stream of vituperation. Kerry grinned. "Gosh!" he commented. "I wouldn't say that sort of thing about anybody."

And then something happened. It happened like the stroke of a rattler, and it happened to Mr. Eddie Grogan.

Dave Kerry struck. The blow came with such devastating swiftness that the two men watching from across the hatch did not even see it. They heard the impact of fist against flesh, a startled grunt, and saw Mr. Grogan fall flat behind the bulwark of cargo.

It was a clean knockout, deftly delivered. And instantly, as Grogan fell, Kerry leaped to safety behind the packing cases. Two shots spat from across the areaway and buried themselves in the cargo. Kerry heard a shout and cursings, and meanwhile he was not idle.

He had negotiated a tactical coup by unexpectedly taking the offensive. He bent over the form of the unconscious Eddie Grogan and relieved that gentleman of a vicious little .25-20 automatic which was snuggled beneath the left armpit. Almost at the same instant Mr. Hennessy hurled himself recklessly around the corner of the dark alley where the watchman had taken refuge. The bark of his gun was answered by a snapping spit from the weapon in Kerry's hand.

There was a shrill scream, the sound of a revolver skimming across the iron deck and Mr. Hennessy collapsed into a state of complete uselessness.

Kerry dropped to hands and knees and worked his way along the floor. He was just in time to see Glory Lawson, automatic in hand, disappearing behind a pile of cargo on the opposite side of the yawning hatchway. Kerry's pistol spat once and an answering bullet splintered the wood over his head. For a few moments he sat there, then quite deliberately fired again—at nothing in particular. Immediately, he ducked back to the form of Eddie Grogan. That shot had been a ruse; he wanted to assure himself that Glory Lawson would remain under cover until he should have had time safely to tie Mr. Grogan with some rope which he had cut from a bale of cargo.

That detail attended to, he resumed his vigil. The situation had changed considerably. The odds of three to one had shifted to even. Hennessy was not to be entirely ignored, of course, because Dave didn't know just how severely the man was wounded; but he did know that Hennessy had lost his gun.

AND then started a catlike battle. Once he heard a scraping along the top of some crates which were piled high against the side of the ship. He crawled to meet it, and in the blackness he and Lawson exchanged shots. Another time Lawson tried to shift position to where he might command the alley in which Kerry was sheltered. Two bullets from the watchman's automatic sent him scurrying back to the other side of the hatch. Time seemed to creep; yet Dave Kerry knew that not twenty minutes had elapsed since he had flattened Grogan and precipitated the battle.

He moved some of the cargo and hid behind it. From that vantage point he essayed one more shot when Lawson exposed himself for a moment. He missed, and Glory's answering crack came perilously close. And then Dave Kerry made a decidedly disconcerting discovery; he realized that he had exhausted the last cartridge in his clip.

He was aghast at the discovery. He realized that once again the tables were turned. He wondered whether Glory knew of the situation. That was unlikely, of course. But it was possible.

There was only one thing for him to do: to remain under cover, hoping that Lawson did not know he was bereft of ammunition, and to wait for that gentleman to attack. It was dark where he crouched, he couldn't hope to find Hennessy's gun that had skidded across the deck. But the chances were that Glory would not essay an open assault.

Kerry shifted slightly. Working with painstaking slowness, he managed to see between two packing cases, and as he watched he became more and more certain that Tony Canzano, the gang boss, had heard, for he could see that a great display of loading cargo was still being made. Three times he saw the slender steel cable drop into the hold with drafts, saw the cable sway limply as the gang boss manipulated it to release the hook, then saw it shoot upward again.

Very clever, reflected Kerry. With the clatter and sputtering of winches drowning out all noise of the gun battle, those on the pier could not know that anything unusual was transpiring below. So far as anyone outside could tell, cargo was being loaded in hatch number two.

KERRY was thinking with lightning swiftness. He was trapped, and knew it. The bulkhead back of him contained a steel door, but that door was safely blocked by cargo. And he knew that even if he could move the cargo where he stood, he would run into a solid wall of cargo on the other side of the door. It was a pity, he reflected, that he didn't have the room which was afforded by the deck above, where there was as yet virtually no cargo.

Meanwhile, Glory Lawson had not stirred. The man's strategy was obvious. He was safely entrenched, and wisely awaiting an offensive move from Dave Kerry. If the watchman showed himself, or made a break for escape—

. Once again a draft of freight clattered into the hold; once again the gang boss shook the big hook loose from the sling and signaled it up. An idea came to the trapped watchman: Suppose he should make a sudden dash as the cable started upward and swing onto the hook.

He discarded the idea almost as soon as it came to him. "Just two things would happen," he reflected; "and either of them would kill me." He knew that the moment the gang boss saw him swinging on the hook something would go wrong with the winch, and he would be dropped uncere[illegible]i usly back into the hold. Or, failing that, Glory Lawson would step from behind his barricade and pot-shoot him as he swayed helplessly on the cable in the middle of the twelve-foot hatch.

Kerry was nervous. If only he had another bullet in his gun and could trick Lawson into the open! But that was impossible. And five o'clock was approaching. That might mean that Glory's men from above would descend into the hold to complete the job. They could do it then without attracting attention. He whistled softly.

"I've got to do something. But what?"

And then an idea came to him: a plan which held possibilities and was fraught with danger: The deck above was clear. If he could make that, it would be a simple matter to walk for'ard to hatch number one through the bulkhead door, and thence up the ladder and into the open air, where he knew not even Glory Lawson would dare shoot him down.

The cable snaked down into the hatchway once more, bearing its draft of cargo. The freight flumped in a heap on Kerry's side of the hatch. He saw the cable grow slack and then wiggle excitedly, proof that the gang boss was trying to loosen the hook from the sling. And then he saw the cable sway idly across the hatchway and swing leisurely back in a graceful arc.

Dave Kerry acted. Once again he banked solidly on the element of surprise in his attack.

He leaped from his place of concealment. There was the sharp, surprised bark of Lawson's gun, and a bullet missed his head by inches. At the same instant the swaying cable shot upward.

The muscles of Kerry's legs responded like steel springs. He leaped outward across the hatch; his hands caught the rising hook, which was swaying in the direction of his jump.

Then there was a shout from above, and at that moment Kerry released his grasp of the hook and flung himself forward. His hands clutched the deck above. With amazing speed he clambered to safety on that deck, directly over Glory Lawson's head—and he heard the vicious spank of the hook as it dropped into the hatch again.

Glory Lawson had fired his first shot mechanically as Kerry made his break for safety. He had been expecting some such move. He cursed as he saw that his bullet had missed, and as the watchman disappeared up the hatch, Glory leaped from his place of concealment, pistol in hand. One good shot at the man on the cable. . . .

He reached the edge of the deck. At that moment the cable and hook clattered at his feet. But there was no sign of Dave Kerry. Glory looked up. . . .

KERRY was crouched, waiting. He peered down from his vantage point on the deck above, and as Glory appeared the watchman carefully dropped a case of canned goods on that person's head. Save for a surprised grunt, Glory Lawson did not utter a sound. He pitched forward and lay sprawled at the bottom of the hold.

Kerry satisfied himself that Lawson was not shamming. Then he turned and walked swiftly for'ard. The bulkhead door was open, and he made his way to hatch number one. He mounted the ladder and emerged on the main deck.

The ship still buzzed with activity; but at hatch number two all was still. As Kerry moved toward that hatch he saw that the gang boss and his winchman were staring down into the hold. The watchman touched Canzano on the arm and that worthy whirled, his eyes popping with amazement as he recognized Dave. There was a grim smile on Kerry's lips, and he spoke with honeyed softness.

"Listen here, Tony," he counseled significantly, "I'd sort of investigate if I was you. I've got a hunch that something has gone wrong down yonder."

the poorhouse, and no child of mine should ever say: "We could do so many more pleasant things if we didn't have poor old Dad around."

But the very concentration on economy which has insured me against being poor has kept me equally from ever being rich. And by rich I mean not in money merely, but rich in achievement, in full-blooded living.

I doubt if any more numbing emotion can possess a human mind than the constant thought of money. For years I scraped and saved and denied myself, slipping one dollar after another into the savings bank, and saying, as each five dollars accumulated: "There's one more day of old age provided for." This habit of thought grew so strong upon me that, long after I had accumulated a competence and might properly have begun to enjoy life more, I lacked all capacity for enjoyment. Only the help of my wonderful wife enabled me finally to conquer the stern inhibition against reasonable spending.

I give this glimpse of the family background in order that the reader may understand something of the circumstances which made me a "family fixer." There burned in my heart a fierce and unquenchable family pride, born partly of real affection for my brothers and sisters, partly of resentment against my stepmother, and the determination to rescue them from her ungracious rule and secure them permanently against subjection to any other untoward influence.

So strong was this passion that I could not bear to finish my schooling. Four years of college and three years of professional school was a delightful prospect, one that my heart hankered for, for I was a natural student and loved books; but what right had I to spend seven years on myself when there was so much to do for the others? What unimaginable dangers might not befall my younger brothers, and my sisters coming up so fast into womanhood, while I was thus away? No; there could be no college, for I must strike away into the wilderness of the world and build a stockade behind which these defenseless ones should be secure.

DOES this sound like the mock heroics of an over-sensitive child? I admit the charge, and offer no defense. I was over-sensitive; I was over-fearful. I was the eldest son of a hard-up family, conscious that there was no lingering affection for me in the home, and eager to be up and doing on my own account and for the sake of the others.

In this spirit I slipped away from the house one dark night, paid a last visit to the grave of my mother, and set out for the city. I walked all night; but, as the first flush of sunrise was brightening the east, I lay down for an hour's rest beside a friendly haymow. There the owner found me about six o'clock, and let me ride with him on a load of vegetables. Thus I entered Chicago, with eleven dollars in my pocket and all the burdens of a large family on my soul.

This is not the story of my business career, and so I shall cut that part short. Suffice it to say that I very quickly discovered that just because a town is big is no reason why one should stand in awe of it. If there are a million people within the corporate limits, instead of a thousand, that means that there are just so many more "clock watchers," just so many more who do as little as possible, and wonder why they don't get more. Speaking broadly, I believe it is easier to make a success in a large town than in a little one. True, Chicago and New York are great magnets that draw keen minds to them from all directions, and the pace is swift. But what oceans of mediocrity they are! How quickly a little extra work is seen and appreciated!

I FOUND a job the first morning; not much of a job, to be sure—just sweeping out a wholesale produce market and carrying heavy bags of potatoes off the carts. But it gave me enough for food, and the proprietor allowed me to sleep in the rear, which saved room rent.

In the next ten years I came to know everybody up and down South Water Street, which was the center of the produce market. The business was one which had no friends. The farmers protested that they received too little for their produce; the retailers cried out that they were charged too much, and periodically the newspapers took up the cry, and even the courts occasionally gave heed.

I began to look into the laws that governed the business and gradually began to read more books on law. When, after several years, I took the bar examinations and was admitted, I found that among my market acquaintances I had already a good beginning of a profitable clientele. Those first clients have stayed with me, and year by year I have extended my circle.

I married young, which is the way to marry. My wife and I shared together the whole program of struggle and success. We were grandparents long before our heads began to turn gray—and that brings me back again to the point of the story.

As I said before, my intimate association with the man who committed suicide by trying to decide everything for his relatives began a change in myself. But it was only a beginning. It took my frank and outspoken daughter to bring the final result. I was standing with her one afternoon on the shore of Lake Michigan, where her little family was spending the summer. We were watching her boy and girl paddling in the water. I was nervous about them, for the waves were getting higher, and they seemed a long way out. I said nothing, but she saw the look in my eyes, and she turned on me with a speech which had apparently been corked up for a long time.

"Father, if you are going to worry about my children, you can just take the next boat and go home!" she exclaimed. "You worried about your own sisters from the time they were knee-high to grasshoppers. Didn't you?"

"Well, I was the eldest," I answered meekly.

"Yes, and so you worried day and night. And did any one of them ever drown? Aren't they all alive? More than that, aren't they pretty successful on the whole? Just how much good do you think your worry accomplished? What's been the use of it, anyway? And, since it's been no use, why are you starting in to worry about the next generation? Just tell me that!"

She had me flabbergasted. My worry about my brothers useless. My years of solicitude, of careful planning, of fixing things, all wasted! What a terrible thing to say. Later, in the solitude of my room, came a more disturbing thought: Perhaps, I said to myself, the girl is right.

THAT night after the others had gone to bed I sat with a pad of paper on my knee and commenced to set down a frank statement of what my attempts at "family fixing" had netted. When I finished I had the following record. I make no comment on it; it speaks for itself.

One: My sister Anne is a year and a half younger than I, and shared with me to a considerable degree the sense of family responsibility. Her passion was music, and even as a little child she showed an aptitude for the piano that promised much, if she could have continued her studies. But at eighteen she left home to become a school-teacher in a neighboring town. When she was twenty-three she had saved enough money so that she thought it might be possible to go to Chicago and enter a conservatory, and she asked me to make some inquiries.

It was at that period of my life when I was struggling to keep my head above water and to provide some sort of a place in the world for the younger children. Hence, I had the feeling that Anne, the only one who was settled, ought to play safe rather than add herself to my already long list of responsibilities. Accordingly, while I made the inquiries at the conservatory, as she requested, I conducted a somewhat more vigilant campaign of inquiry for a better teaching position, and presently I ran onto the trail of a position as supervisor of music in a nearby suburb. "Just the thing for you," I wrote her. "Here's a chance to teach the subject you love, and you will be near enough the city to come in for lessons on Saturdays." With decided reluctance she took my advice, and I breathed a sigh of relief; Anne, at least, was "fixed."

Her instinct, which made her reluctant, was wiser than my judgment, at least at this distance I think so. For getting to town on Saturdays proved increasingly difficult, and the progress she made with these fitful lessons was so slight that she gave up within the year.

A hardware merchant in the town persuaded her that she loved him, and so she married and settled down. He is a good-enough sort of fellow, but decidedly her inferior intellectually. They are neither happy nor unhappy, just an average couple with three healthy children. But the passion for music in Anne is dead. I wonder what she might have become if I had encouraged her to follow her star, instead of having tried so hard to get her "fixed."

Two: My brother Joe came up to Chicago after his graduation from high school,

"You Must Have Spent Years on Shorthand"

"NO; I Learned it in 6 WEEKS!"

HER employer laughed aloud. "Six weeks! You're joking, Miss Baker. No one could learn shorthand in six weeks."

"But I mean it, Mr. Chapman. When I came here to work for you I had only studied shorthand for six weeks."

The president of the large corporation hesitated; the girl was evidently sincere; she expected him to believe her. But six weeks!

"You're fooling, of course, Miss Baker. You have been with us not more than a month and you are by far the most competent secretary I ever had. Surely you don't expect me to believe that you gained your present speed and accuracy in only six weeks! Why,—a great many young ladies who have been here with us had studied shorthand for ten months or a year or more and still they made a great many errors."

"That wasn't their fault, Mr. Chapman. Old fashioned shorthand requires months of hard study and practice and even when it is mastered it is difficult to read. But Speedwriting is very easy. I——"

"Speedwriting?"

"Yes. Haven't you ever seen my notes? You can almost read them yourself. See—"

The big business man took his secretary's note-book.

"Why, this is remarkable, Miss Baker. It's in simple A. B. C.'s!"

"Yes, surely. That's the secret. That's how I learned it so quickly. Anyone can learn Speedwriting. There are only a few easy rules. There are no hooks or curves; every "character" you use is a letter you already know,—one that your hand needs no special training to make."

"And it's called Speedwriting?"—Mr. Chapman was more than interested.

"Yes. Isn't it simple? Can't you read that? See—here is the first letter you ever dictated to me. Those notes are a month old, but I can read every word of them. That is another advantage Speedwriting has over all other systems,—notes never get cold. And my notes are just as plain to another Speedwriter as your handwriting is to one of the salesmen."

"Well, that's the most remarkable thing I ever heard of. I could use that myself at board meetings and a dozen other places. . . . . You can write it rapidly too!"

"One boy I know who studied Speedwriting in his own home, took court testimony at the rate of 106 words a minute after only 15 hours of study."

"Miss Baker, will you get me some literature on Speedwriting? I really believe I'll take it up myself!"

Two months later Mr. Chapman and all of his stenographers were Speedwriters.

Speedwriting
The NATURAL SHORTHAND

Tens of thousands have been freed from the drudgery of the old fashioned methods of learning and writing shorthand by this marvelous new system. Speedwriting may be written with a pencil or on a typewriter; it can be learned in a third the time needed to master any other system; it is more accurate, and it can be written with amazing rapidity.

Put this coupon in the mail tonight. It will bring you an illustrated book full of examples and stories of successful Speedwriters all over the world. No matter what your need for shorthand may be,—you can fill that need better with Speedwriting.

This man sees a floor from the proper viewpoint

He is a business man schooled in the importance of thrift. Plate glass protects the polished surface of his desk.

To him a fine hardwood floor is comparable to a costly piece of furniture. To withstand abuse and remain beautiful its protective finish must be wear-resisting like the glass on his desk.

Liquid Granite is such a finish. It forms a tough, durable translucent film capable of withstanding hammer blows without cracking or chipping.

Here is varnish made to walk on. Users tell us it is the most durable floor covering made. Tests conducted at the University of Chicago under actual service conditions prove this to be true.

In finishing a new floor or refinishing an old one, preserve the natural beauty of the wood and provide a rich, lustrous surface that will withstand millions of steps and wear for years by specifying Berry Brothers' Liquid Granite Floor Varnish. It wears.

Save the surface and you save all—that's book and I felt very proud to be able to meet him at the train with the news that I had found him a job. It gave me a nice sense of success to have friends in the city who were willing to take my brother on my say-so. Joe lasted three months in the job, hating it all the time; and then came home with the sad news that he had been fired. It was a blow to me, but I hustled around and placed him in a paper house from which our concern made large purchases. This job he hated worse than the other, and so I hunted up another. Four times this process was repeated, at continuous cost of nervous energy. Then one night I returned to the little flat—he was living with me but paying no rent—and found a note pinned on my pillow. "I have taken twenty-five dollars out of your purse, and am going to Kansas City to get a job on a newspaper. It is the only thing I ever wanted to do; but I know if I stay here you'll never let me do it."

I was hurt and disappointed. Two months went by without a word from him, and then I received a letter enclosing a money order for twenty-five dollars. He was working as a reporter at fifteen dollars a week, and was having the time of his life.

I have always looked on Joe as a semi-failure. He is well along in his forties today and is city editor of a small town daily at a salary of about four thousand dollars. I have always felt that if he had stayed with the paper business, where I started him, he might be president, and earning ten times his present salary. But he's the youngest-looking and happiest one of the crowd. Would he be so happy if he had let me "fix" him?

THREE: We always regarded Jim as utterly irresponsible. Anne and I combined to underwrite his college expenses, feeling that if we could pound four years of mental discipline into him he might steady down. In his freshman year he got into a row with the faculty over some student escapade, and instead of letting him work it out himself I rushed down to the college town and stayed there a week, neglecting my own business while I interviewed the president and the dean and promised that Jim would never do it again. He didn't thank me for my intervention, and I sensed the feeling on the part of the boys at his fraternity house that I was babying him. However, I had seen my duty and done it, and I went back satisfied.

Jim's college course was not a success. He just managed to attain a passing average during the next two years, and in the spring of his senior year we heard a rumor of the most terrible sort. He was engaged to be married to one of the co-eds. If he had been arrested for highway robbery the news could not have shocked us more. Visions of having another family on my hands ran through my worried brain, and I hastened to get in touch with the girl's father, who obviously had the same feelings. Together we labored with the young people, pointing out the reckless iniquity of marrying before they had established a place for themselves in the world. They listened to us with the amused tolerance of all-wise youth toward middle-aged apprehension, and they answered our arguments by eloping just a week before commencement.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

For the next three years the girl's father and I held monthly luncheon conferences. He showed me her letters, and I showed him Jim's, which were infrequent and uninformative. We met each time with a decided tension, each expecting the other to break the bad news that the youngsters were starving or had been thrown out of their apartment for non-payment of rent, or had separated because the economic strain had proved too great. We found two different business openings for Jim, but he refused them haughtily. He allowed us to send the usual birthday and Christmas presents; but when the girl's father sent her a check for one thousand dollars, Jim made her mail it back, and wrote me that he wanted it understood once and for all that they could stand on their own feet. And they proved it.

The Chicago papers carried a little paragraph one day to the effect that Jim had been made assistant sales manager of the biggest business of its kind in town. He moved into our midst, and proceeded to forgive us for all our well-meant meddling. But his wife has never quite forgotten that we tried our hardest to keep them apart, and, candidly, I don't blame her.

FOUR: My wife and I made my sister Elsie's marriage a subject of profound thought and planning. We arranged to lure her up to our home for visits at least twice a year, and I combed Chicago for desirable young bachelors who could be induced to risk their freedom in exchange for a meal and a theatre party. Three of them fell in rapid succession, all good chaps with secure positions and fine prospects. And what did independent little Elsie do but turn them down one after another, borrow a thousand dollars from me, and light out for New York?

There she has a little shop on the upper East Side as an interior decorator. She goes to Europe every other year, visits in the best homes in the city, and steadfastly refuses to think of matrimony. My wife still thinks Elsie will never be properly "fixed" until we have equipped her with a husband. But as she refuses to visit us any more, except on condition that we allow no bachelors or widowers in the house while she is there, there seems to be small prospect of our success. "If all the work and worry that we have wasted on Elsie were laid end to end," says my wife, "it would reach from Chicago to Los Angeles and back." It would, and what good did it do?

FIVE: Tom was, and is, the baby of the family. I was financially secure when the time came for him to go to college, and I sent him as a gentleman's son. When he visited us during his Christmas holidays I used to ask him if he had made up his mind what he wanted to do; but he seemed to have no definite notions about anything but football and girls.

My wife said, "Don't hurry him. He's entitled to a little fun in his youth. Goodness knows, you had little enough in yours."

So he finished the four years and, evidencing no great craving for work, he drifted on through three years of law school. He is now a clerk in my office, and will, as a matter of course, one day become a partner. He is the only one of the family who has stayed "fixed." I arranged his life and I shall apparently continue to arrange it. He seems perfectly contented to shift all responsibility, and allow me to go on "fixing things" for him as long as he lives.

Curious that I had to wait so long to learn my lesson; that not until the death of my worrying client and my daughter's abrupt challenge had I ever stopped to analyze the facts of my long years of attempted "fixing." Written out in black and white, even in this brief form, the record is almost shocking. Hours and hours of patient, well-intentioned planning and worry, and to what end? Three of my five brothers and sisters take their destinies out of my hands and do better for themselves than I could possibly have done. One sister follows my guidance and scores only a moderate success, to say the least. One brother resigns himself wholly to my molding and up to date shows no evidence of ever being able to travel alone.

I have given the matter a great deal of thought since that night when I first faced the facts. It is too late for me to make much change in my own life, except as regards my grandchildren and perhaps my brother Tom (him I should cast off to make his own way; I know it, but I haven't the heart). But I can tell my story for the possible help of others.

I KNOW now that if there is one thing that history teaches more plainly than another it is that no man can lead another man's life. It matters not how strong the man, nor how worthy and painstaking his attentions, the attempt to "fix things" for other people almost inevitably ends in failure.

Similarly, I am now convinced that it is exceedingly dangerous, and sometimes fatal, for any one of us to try to select another's career. Stevenson's father wanted him to be an engineer, and fastened him to a drafting board for painful years. Voltaire's father, a hard-working small-town business man, was shocked when told that his son contemplated a literary career.

"Literature," he exclaimed, "is the profession of a man who wishes to be useless to society, and a burden to his relatives, and to die of hunger."

Both these fathers, and many others of whom history gives us the record, loved their offspring, and honestly believed that their mature wisdom was far more trustworthy than the vagrant impulses of youth. But what a tragic loss the world would have sustained if their wisdom had prevailed.

Youth has a marvelous capacity for landing on its feet. Every generation of grown men and women is greatly distressed about the "rising generation." These thoughtless, self-centered, lazy boys and girls, whatever is going to become of them? Who will do the work of the world when we workers are weary, and these useless youngsters have grown into lazy manhood? From the beginning of time this has been the sad lament of maturity!

The parents of the brilliant Cardinal Wiseman were in terrible distress because their boy was so "dull and stupid." Charles Darwin, whose patient lifetime of hard work turned all scientific thinking into new channels, was so lazy and useless as a boy that his father confidently expected him to be a "disgrace to the family." Wordsworth was so lacking in ambition up to the age of seventeen as to be "incapable of continued application to prescribed work," and James Russell Lowell was suspended from Harvard, where he later served as a professor with such brilliant distinction, "on account of continued neglect of his college studies."

WITH such examples as these to encourage us, surely we parents and elder brothers may strengthen our faith, believing that sooner or later youth will find the task for which an all-wise Providence has intended it, whether we "fix" things or not.

The principal obstacle to our faith, of course, is our love. Having struggled ourselves, we are almost morbidly eager to spare our loved ones from struggle. It is a fine emotion, in a sense, and one feels almost sinful in combating it. Yet there is no doubt that this very over-carefulness on the part of parents is the principal reason for the failure of many children. It has been remarked that great men are seldom followed by great sons, and Emerson, in commenting on that fact, says:

> The genius of a race or family is a stream always equal to itself, and if the present tenant fishes it too much, the next tenant, his son, will find the stream poor, and must withhold his nets and seines. Hence we say, "A great man has not a great son."

In other words, if one man uses up too much of the energies of a family, he has exhausted the supply, and the family strain must lie fallow for a generation or two until there is a chance to recuperate.

This may be one explanation of the failure of successful people to have successful children. Doubtless there is truth in it. But a greater truth, I believe, is the super-love which makes the path of the next generation so smooth that strength and courage are not bred into the fiber. And other children, less sheltered, and hence more tough, pass them on life's highway.

Finally, and this is the thought that has become more real to me year by year: the lives of those we love are too sacred to be tampered with, even with the best intentions.

What we need is not more planning, more "taking thought for the morrow," but more Faith. More simple, childlike trust that the God who sent these other lives into the world has some plan for their work, and will, if given a chance, guide them to it.

"GIVE me a newborn child and in ten years I can have him so scared he'll never dare lift his voice above a whisper, or so brave that he fears nothing." So says Dr. George A. Dorsey, author of "Why We Behave Like Human Beings," one of the best-selling non-fiction books of recent years. Next month, in "How Do You Get That Way?" Mr. Dorsey explains why you are what you are; moreover, if you're not satisfied he holds out hope that you can make yourself someone else—within, of course, certain physical and age limitations.

You've had an excellent education and a valuable experience in France. Your war record won't tell against you. Just now, everyone's sentimental."

Gladden raised his eyebrows.

But he cried out loud in his heart. This was his first encounter with the "back to normal" attitude of the civilian who feared, perhaps unconsciously, that the returned army might try to run the country. The returned army was in one state of mind, the civilian population in another.

And the advantage was certainly not with the army, which had been, for some time, subjected to the physical and moral confusion of war. Gladden did not know whether to pity or to despise his uncle. He felt superior, yet he felt whipped. He knew the baffled mental surrender of knowledge to ignorance.

"Thank you very much," he said. "I accept your offer with gratitude. Only there is something I must do first."

THEN he told his uncle about Smith, and his promise to look after Smith's family in California.

"You don't mean to tell me that you expect me to put up the money?"

Gladden shook his head.

"Not a cent. It's nobody's business but mine."

Mr. Gladden became inquisitive.

"Have you any money of your own?"

"A few hundred dollars."

"How do you expect to support a wife and children on a few hundred dollars?"

"They're not my wife and children!"

"I thought you said—"

Gladden rose with a certain dignity. He saw that it would gain nothing to argue with a man like his uncle, a man who never made a misstep, who was incapable of soft-headed, blundering philanthropy.

"I have no doubt," he explained carefully, "that I am being a fool. The Smith family will probably kick me out."

"Why don't you write to them?"

"And give them a chance to refuse charity? No. I'll go out there and see for myself whether they have any need of a young man with no money and a medal. Of course, if they throw me over, I'll be glad. I don't want a wife and a family of children!"

"Not yet," his uncle interposed.

"Never. I don't like the idea."

He held out his hand.

"Good-by."

"I think you're an idiot."

"I got my code from your generation. A promise is a promise."

Mr. Gladden, with a startled look, clasped his nephew's hand.

"Of course. Of course! The war hasn't changed all that. I don't want you to be selfish. Only, I have decided ideas as to what is best for you. I never change my mind. Never. I simply refuse to give you money to throw away on these hypothetical Smiths. They have no claim on you."

"Good-by," Gladden repeated.

He went out into Broadway, crossed Forty-second Street to the station, and paid cash for a ticket to Los Angeles. The train left in two hours. He packed his bag and spent the balance of the time in the station, enjoying the mulling about of people, the echo and remote, humming vibration under the starry roof; the business of departure and arrival; the excited, tense faces of travelers; beginnings and endings; tears and kisses; eyes stark with separation, passionate with gratification. Little knots of immigrants with bundles, shuffling over the marble pavements, silent and embarrassed, apologetic and inspired. Porters carrying wonderful leather bags, golf sticks, fur coats.

All women looked at Gladden. He liked it, yet it embarrassed him, very much as the immigrants were embarrassed. He knew he was not ugly, but he could never believe that he was gifted with that magnetism which in some men, otherwise negative, is an open sesame to the perilous delights of the flesh. Therefore, he passed up many opportunities for experiment.

In the great station at New York he stood with the crowd at the gate, sensing acutely the marvelous promise of life; it actually brushed him in passing; he felt the currents; he stood braced, expectant, and his heart beat a little faster when the gates opened and the crowd streamed down the shadowy incline toward the long, silent train.

THAT train, crawling over a continent, had brought Gladden to this uncomfortable moment.

There had been a Scotch Valley near San Diego; but no Smiths lived there. There were no inhabitants, save a few nameless Indians, who lived in 'dobe huts and drove little cars to market. Gladden had been on the point of returning to New York, when a stranger to whom he had confided his bewilderment, assured him that there was another Scotch Valley farther north. He was even explicit, in the manner of those who speak with the voice of conscience.

And now Gladden was actually in that Scotch Valley which sheltered the family he sought. Having found no flaw in his urge to go on, he picked up his heavy suit case and started again along the road. He wished that he had left some of his possessions in New York. He certainly had no need for a silk lounging-robe or a smoking-jacket, or for linen knickerbockers. He had purchased all of these things during the brief stop-over in Chicago, impelled, perhaps, by a vague and youthful desire to be ready for any adventure, to be equal, sartorially, to any romantic occasion.

Save for his two years in the army, Gladden had had a very agreeable experience; he had not sprung full-fledged with a gold spoon in his mouth; but he had been permitted to lick the parental spoon. The only thing that saved him from being an insufferable waster or a congenital snob, had been the death of his mother and his father's remarriage to a woman of spirit. Gladden's stepmother

THE BANK OF ENGLAND
Looking towards the Mansion House
LONDON

The Bank of England required 32 years to erect, 1795-1827. A century's progress in materials and methods cut to a small fraction the time and expense of building the Fresno High School (below). Coates & Travers were its architects; its cast stone was made with Atlas White by MacGruer & Simpson

The standard by which all other makes are measured

AMERICAN impatience with lost motion and delay is reflected in the pace of building as well as business. The time and money savings achieved by mass production and quickened turnover are paralleled in construction by the economies of concrete made with Atlas Portland Cement.

Building funds are given greater buying power. Rugged strength takes shapes of grace and dignity. Any tint or character of surface desired can be produced with Atlas White, in stucco, cast stone or broad masses of poured concrete.

In homes, schools, churches, in business and public buildings of all kinds, Atlas and Atlas White make inspiring form, color and texture practical by making them reasonable in price.

If the Bank of England were to replace the classic London landmark pictured above with a modern structure, cost would be a minor consideration in shaping the plans. But countless American communities, firms and individuals, on the contrary, must frame their building budgets in strict accord with the funds available.

For many such, Atlas and Atlas White have solved the problem of beauty with economy. The stately new High School at Fresno, California, is an example. Its Ionic columns and cornice were moulded in concrete made with Atlas White.

Ranking with the development of the rotary kiln by Atlas in 1895, the perfecting of Atlas White makes concrete a complete architectural and structural material with which any building, at moderate cost, can be given substantial dignity and grace.

The Atlas plan of distribution is worked out to bring Atlas to consumers in the most economical manner—through the building material dealer, the sole distributor between Atlas plants and users. He adds economy in distribution, acts as purchasing agent for your community's needs in his chosen field, and deserves your recognition and support. Write to The Atlas Portland Cement Company, 25 Broadway, New York, for information on any type of concrete work.

Pyorrhea still claims 4 out of 5

If you could only look into the future and see the truth, if you could only be made to see the dangers that lurk along the way you have to go, if you could only see the invisible barriers that stand between you and the achievement of your ambitions, how much more jealously you would guard your health!

Pyorrhea, dread disease of teeth and gums, strikes four out of five after forty and thousands younger. They are the unfortunate victims of their own neglect.

Unless abruptly checked in its frightful course, Pyorrhea may loosen teeth in their very sockets, feed its destructive poison into the system, often causing rheumatism, stomach troubles, anemia and embarrassing facial disfigurement.

Buy Protection

You can purchase protection against this sinister enemy of health. See your dentist at least twice a year. Have him examine teeth and gums thoroughly. And start using Forhan's for the Gums, now.

This dentifrice which is the formula of R. J. Forhan, D.D.S., for years a Pyorrhea specialist, wards off Pyorrhea or checks its progress, if used in time.

It firms the gum tissue and prevents the dangers that occur when gums recede from teeth. It keeps teeth snowy white and protects them against acids which cause decay.

Don't wait for warning signs, for your gums to bleed. Start using Forhan's regularly, morning and night. It contains Forhan's Pyorrhea Liquid used by dentists everywhere.

Forhan's for the Gums is health insurance. Get a tube from your druggist, at once—35c and 60c.

had gone a long way toward undoing the harm his own mother had done by insisting that her son should be spared both the sin and the rod.

"We're going to laugh the Fauntleroy out of you," his stepmother had said. "For your own sake, try to laugh with us!"

He had. But there had been moments when the fruit of knowledge tasted bitter as poison. He would have drifted back into his habit of lazy dreaming had he not been driven by jealousy and resentment into daily combat with his stepbrothers. They were good-humored, healthy, normal, rather stupid and, like their mother, utterly devoid of those impedimenta of the imagination which make life torture for the artist.

They did everything well. They were crack shots; they played a swift game of tennis; they could swim like seals; they rode like demons. Gladden did everything they did, not because he wanted to but because he had to, or lose his self-respect. He took some bitter victories and learned, at last, to enjoy being laughed at.

GLADDEN and the brothers, Alex and Karl, went to different schools. Mr. Gladden may have felt that it was a case of two to one—the balance was all on the side of conformity. Perhaps he had a sneaking hope that his son might develop a few fascinating if reprehensible irregularities of his own. After all, he had loved this boy's mother. She had made him suffer. But she had given him the only hours of glamorous delight he would ever know.

So Gladden went to one school, while the healthy stepbrothers went to another. In summer, with benevolent grins, they returned to the business of making a man of Gladden.

Gladden had surprised them, later, by winning a place on the varsity nine at Princeton, and still later, at Tech, he developed into the fastest swimmer of his class. His scholarship he kept to himself.

He was not ashamed of his ambition to be something more than the son of a rich man; but he was wise enough to realize that unless he licked his stepbrothers at their own game, he would be their bone all the rest of his life.

When his father died, just before the war, it was found that Gladden had inherited nothing. What was left of that substantial fortune belonged to his stepmother. She sent at once for Gladden, and for the first time he saw her chastened. Definitely older, tears had blurred her eyes, thickened the bright lilt of her voice. He had never liked her so well.

"Of course," she said, "I will give you what is yours—"

"Thank you. But I can't accept it."

"Why not?" She leaned forward and put her hand over his. "You don't hate me, do you, Jimmy—for what I've done?"

"What have you done?"

She shook her head. "I was afraid you might want to play the piano."

"I do," Gladden said. "I always have!"

He got up, stooped quickly and kissed her. "Don't worry about me. I'm going to France. And when I get back, you must invite me to visit you. I'd like that."

But she hadn't.

Gladden guessed that he had hurt her more than he had intended. She wrote him simply that she was happy to know that he had returned from France. She had not been so fortunate. Alex and Karl had both fallen in Belleau Wood.

The road that Gladden was following dipped down from the crest of the hill and turned sharply to the left. Mount Soledad seemed to wheel, to present another, sterner face. There were sheep in a meadow, and white-faced, big-horned cattle grazing on a slope so steep that their hoofs had terraced it, terrace upon terrace, like the steps of a Mayan temple, to the crest.

A row of silhouetted horses, cropping, stood in identical attitudes against the sky. When they moved, it was as if sculptured horses developed a momentary, rigid animation. A great bird hung up there, drifting on wide-spread wings, scanning the remote and tragic earth for small carrion—rabbits, ground-squirrels, moles, gophers.

Gladden thought of German 'planes, hovering over the lines. "I hope he starves!" he said.

At the crest of the little hill, he saw the ford: planks laid across the dry bed of the river. In a cluster of tall trees, the uncertain outline of a house and sheds, a whitewashed fence in great disrepair, a fence that sagged and leaned and staggered like a drunk on a narrow sidewalk.

He slid down the bank in a clatter of small, smooth stones, waded through a few yards of sand, and gained the planks. "I'll have to fix these," he thought. "First thing I do."

The planks rose and struck at him. They teetered and rolled. Once he fell on his knees, and rose in a bad temper. "What a place. What a place. Good lord! What am I doing here? I'd better go back, while there's still a chance."

But he went on, over the bank, through a growth of brittle nettles, a knee-high forest of great purple thistles gone to seed, and across another sand pit to the gate.

No one was about, so Gladden climbed over. "They've all gone away," he thought. He was both relieved and disappointed; he wanted to see what these children of Smith's were like: they would of necessity have inherited some of that priceless vitality, that steam-engine drive, that restless enthusiasm which in the end had driven their father headlong into death. "My death," Gladden thought. "And here I am alive."

THE yard was deserted. The usual promenading, gossiping hens were absent. The barn door gaped like a mask's mouth. An old car, topless, battered, stood on its rims in the dust of last year's hay. And high in the rafters, up there in the cloudy dusk of the eaves, pigeons were making love. Gladden called, "Anyone here?"

He went back to the yard. Poverty was written on the face of things: poverty, hunger, thirst. The trough was dry. Not a drop trickled out of the pipe that came on straddling trestles from somewhere behind the house. The house itself was like a blind beggar sitting empty-cupped in the middle of a desert. In the narrow shadow of the porch the parched remains of a little garden struggled for existence in a tangle of coarse and hardy weeds.

Gladden set the suit case down and climbed the uncertain steps to the porch. He knocked at the door. There were no

Communication for a Growing Nation

An Advertisement of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company

THE first telephone call was made from one room to another in the same building. The first advance in telephony made possible conversations from one point to another in the same town or community. The dream of the founders of the Bell Telephone System, however, was that through it, all the separate communities might some day be interconnected to form a nation-wide community.

Such a community for speech by telephone has now become a reality and the year-by-year growth in the number of long distance telephone calls shows how rapidly it is developing. This super-neighborhood, extending from town to town and state to state, has grown as the means of communication have been provided to serve its business and social needs.

This growth is strikingly shown by the extension of long distance telephone facilities. In 1925, for additions to the long distance telephone lines, there was expended thirty-seven million dollars. In 1926 sixty-one million dollars. During 1927 and the three following years, extensions are planned on a still greater scale, including each year about two thousand miles of long distance cable. These millions will be expended on long distance telephone lines to meet the nation's growth and their use will help to further growth.

footsteps within, no answer. Only a sudden, indefinable tightening of the silence, as if someone listened, terrified, on the other side of the door.

Gladden waited. He thought he heard a sort of sighing, rhythmic and faint. Where? Inside? Or outside? Someone snoring? He hurried down the steps again and went to the back of the house. A child's go-cart with broken wheels lay overturned. A terrible rag doll stared at him from the dust. There were broken spoons, tin cans, spools, everywhere. A one-sided broom dressed in rags. These must be toys.

A wry twist of memory, and Gladden saw his own toys: painted rocking horses, taut drums and a whole fleet of yachts: "Ariel," "Spray," "White Swan." These he had sailed in the Central Park basin, while a nurse in gray, with streamers, watched from a bench.

He stood there, wondering what to do. Perhaps the Smiths had already gone to the County Home. This might be the manner in which a benign Providence had prevented the Smith children from falling into his hands.

Children frightened him. He had always observed them at a distance, with trepidation. When they were pretty and had manners, he found them a stuffy imitation of their elders. When they were normal, they made him feel inferior, as if, somehow, the laugh was on him. No man is quite equal to a boy's idea of a man.

Gladden knocked at the back door. Then he decided to go in.

THE kitchen was in wild confusion. It was wreck and desolation. Dirty pans stood ankle deep in cold, stale suds flecked with the corpses of flies and skinny little wasps. Gladden's stomach felt empty.

He went into a dark hall, on tiptoe. And again he heard that thin, wheezing sound, close at hand, behind a door that opened hard, but opened, at last, upon the strangest scene he had ever witnessed.

The pressure against the door gave way suddenly. He fell into the room. A room dark and fetid, with the odor of stale blankets, sickness, and fear. The blinds had been drawn against the glare of light outside.

At once, Gladden knew that he had not come too soon. An old man lay on a cot in the corner of the room. His head was pillowed high. His hands plucked at the coverlet. Picked and picked, with great, stubby, brown fingers.

Two children sat on the cot, huddled against the wall, with their knees drawn up and their eyes staring over, like frightened rabbits.

Two more children clung to the door.

"I'm Mr. Gladden," Gladden said. "Your father sent me."

The oldest of the children, a straw-haired boy, retorted, "That ain't so. My father's dead."

"I know. He sent me all the same. I was his captain, in France."

"You said 'Mister.' You didn't say 'Captain.' You get out."

"I'm a captain, all the same. I knew your father. He was with me in France. He sent me here, to take care of you."

"Manuel takes care of us. You get out!"

Gladden turned to the bed. The old man opened his eyes. They were filmed over, like the eyes of a sick eagle. He had a great head; massive, haughty features; a skin, tough as leather, that folded into deep wrinkles, fold upon fold. The heat from his body burned through the blankets.

The two boys came close to Gladden, threatening: "Manuel's sick. You'd better get out."

"I'm a friend. Here, Manuel, give me your hand."

The restless hand was like a live coal. The pulse fluttered, raced; it sounded like the decreasing whir of a spent wheel.

"Very seeck," the old man said. "Die soon. Water in . . . In . . . Over there. . . . We-l-l-l-l. Bad! Bad! Kids seeck, too. Get away."

Gladden turned again to the oldest boy. This was Smith's kid. And something tightened around Gladden's heart.

"This man's very sick," he said quickly. "Tell me where I can find a doctor, and I'll go and get him."

"Bertha's gone for the doctor," the boy answered. He stood facing Gladden with his feet well planted, his fists doubled, a look of challenging fury in his eyes. "You can't take us. My sister's old enough—and, anyway, this is our place."

"I'm not going to take you away! Is that what you thought? I'm not a kid-catcher, you poor little boob. I'm a friend of your father's. I'm here to help you."

Now he understood the drawn curtains. He raised the blinds, the window.

The children on the bed blinked and coughed. One of them might be six years old. The other was little more than a baby—two, three, a miserable little baby dressed in a red sweater big enough for a man. The sleeves flopped like a scarecrow's empty arms. Her face was smudged and streaked. Gladden had seen refugee children with just this look of dull acceptance, this surfeit of fear.

"See here," the oldest boy said, "we're getting along all right—"

"Have you got any food?"

"I can get some."

"Well, I want some milk, warm milk, quick, to give Manuel."

Manuel choked on the word, "Water. Water. Water!"

"All right. I'll be right back. Now, son, lead me to the well."

THE boy gave him a queer look and left the room. He led Gladden across the yard to an arbor, where, beneath a roof of dusty vine leaves and tendrils, there was a well and a bucket. And a smell. Gladden leaned over the rim to peer into a brackish circle, flat and dead as a disk of gun metal. An odor like sulphur floated up.

"You don't drink this stuff?"

"It's all we got. But Manuel won't let us any more. He brings us water to drink, when he ain't sick."

Gladden lowered the bucket. The water was cool, but cloudy, opaque, as if stirred into milk.

"I'll boil it," Gladden thought. "I can't give a dying man a glass full of germs."

He found a rusty pan in the kitchen.

"Haven't you got any wood?"

"I can get some."

"Well, get it, and hurry."

The boy returned with a few sticks, a handful of leaves, and a newspaper. With these, Gladden kindled a fire in the stove.

"What's your name?"

"Pete."

"How old are you?"

"Twelve."

"You believe me, don't you? I knew your father."

"We don't want anybody here. Manuel takes care of us."

"What will you do if Manuel dies?"

Suddenly the boy slumped down by the table and began to cry, burying his head in his arms.

"He won't die. He dassn't. He promised Mother!"

Gladden realized that this was a poser. "I'm sorry," he said; "but people do die, now and then. Promising doesn't help any. Manuel's a very sick man."

"Bertha's gone for the doctor."

"How far?"

"Up to town. Ten miles."

"When did she start?"

"This morning."

"It's five o'clock now."

Peter Smith stopped crying. He wiped his nose with the back of his hand, and tried to smile. Nothing that had ever happened to James Gladden had moved him like this. He knew all at once how it must feel to be a father. The fact and the longing got into his throat, made him want to pray, or swear, or shout out loud: anything would do. The kid smiled at him, and said: "The fire's out."

AT SEVEN o'clock, Bertha had not come. This was Gladden's third evening in California; but already he recognized the metamorphosis of twilight: a cool wind rustled the tall, dry trees and cool stars appeared above the hills. No dew fell, but there was a freshness over everything, and an aromatic odor of damp sage, sweet, penetrating. Along the valley floor, mist gathered in shifting white lakes. There was beauty, where there had been none before. And there was air to breathe. Gladden stood on the porch, taking great whiffs of it into his lungs.

The little children were asleep. Peter sat on the step, staring off at the ford.

The sound of Manuel's breathing was very loud now. "She'll have to get here soon, or he'll be gone," Gladden thought.

"I'm going up the road a way," he said to Peter. "Stay where you are. If Manuel calls, give him water."

The ford was mysteriously white. The path of the river glowed as if brushed with phosphorus. Gladden hurried. To his own amazement, he had just put three children to bed. Supperless, save for a bar of chocolate, salvaged in a limp condition from his suit case.

He had undressed the baby (who was, he gathered, called Lily), shaking her out of the red sweater by her heels. She had emerged whiter than he expected, with a rounder stomach than she deserved, considering the thinness of her arms, the tiny circumference of her throat.

She had no nightgown. Pete offered one, from a drawer, where these articles were kept, but it proved to be little more than a series of holes and stringy buttons. One of Gladden's pajama tops, with sleeves rolled up, was pressed into service for Lily.

Nancy, the six-year-old, objected to being undressed by a stranger. She retired behind a curtain of burlap and disrobed, emerging at last in Gladden's silk lounging-robe. She was little and dark and solemn, with eyes like shoe buttons. She didn't want to be washed—"We don't wash any more. Manuel never makes us wash!"

Gladden realized that to weaken now would only confirm her savage determination to be dirty. He washed her face, her neck, and her ears. She howled. She could make more noise than a steam calliope, but it wasn't serious noise; it lacked the true note of tragedy. She was testing him. Like most women, she watched the effect during the performance, and, with her mouth wide open, contrived to make a note of his reactions.

He persisted, and, when he had at last washed her clean, was conscious of having triumphed. She stopped crying and lay on her back, sucking her fingers and indulging in a luxurious case of hiccoughs.

Henry, the youngest boy, refused to leave Manuel. He lay against the old man's feet, half awake, fighting both sleep and death. Sleep at last conquered. But Manuel was too far gone to know or to care.

GLADDEN was hungry. He had failed to find any food in the house. To questions, Peter answered: "Manuel gets the food. He knows ways."

"But aren't there any neighbors?"

"Only the Pelgrams, and you can't go there."

"Why not?"

"Pelgram'll shoot you. He shot at me last week. I was after chickens. I got one, too."

Now, as Gladden hurried along the road, he looked for Pelgram's house. He might find a woman there, someone to take pity on those hungry children, on himself, so helpless to help them. He decided that in all the world of men he was the most ill-equipped for fatherhood—even a vicarious fatherhood. He knew a lot about pipes and bridges and mathematics, but nothing about children.

"I can never do it," he thought. "They'll have to go to the Home until I can earn enough money to take care of them. I'll bury Manuel, and then I'll beat it."

The first house he came to was on the left side of the road; a modern bungalow with barns and sheds, a water tank and a windmill in the background. Within a large enclosure cattle stood quietly, ruminating, switching.

A dog started up from the yard and ran out barking. He was followed by a tall man in his shirt sleeves, who said crossly, "Who's there?"

"My name is Gladden. Fred Smith was in my company in France. I've come here to look out for his children. They haven't any food, and the old Mexican is dying. Perhaps you could help me out."

"Haven't you got a car?"

"No, I haven't."

"Well, the store is about eight miles up the road, at Vaccatown."

"I'll pay for anything you give me."

"I've nothing for sale."

The man closed the gate with a snap. "Those Smith kids are a nuisance to the whole valley. A lot of trash."

This Little Book May Save Your Town

Fire knows no mercy and but one master. Only with a modern waterworks system and modern fire-fighting equipment can mankind hope to hold fire in check.

This book, "Waterworks for Every Town," written for people whose property stands in constant danger from fire, whose children play in the shadow of disease that lurks in contaminated wells, who live without the convenience of running water in their homes.

This book is written for those men and women who live in towns without waterworks. It will show them how easily and how simply a waterworks system may be brought to their town.

If you live in such a town, will you send for this book? Don't leave it to someone else some other time. Send for it yourself today.

Only a Public Waterworks and Distribution System will secure all of these benefits for your town:

1. Convenience of Running Water in the Home.
2. Protection from Fire.
3. Safeguard to health of a pure supervised water supply.
4. Adequate Sewage System.
5. Growth of the town through attraction of new industries.

Most of America's Greatest Executives were once Farm Boys

He turned away toward the barn. "Good night. I'm sorry I can't oblige you."

It was easy for Gladden to lose his head. More, it did him good. Anger surged up from his heart and burst in stars before his eyes. He leaped the fence and jumped on the man's back. He was not a very good fighter. For one thing, he had no technique. For another, he was too light.

The man flung him off as if he had been a sack of feathers. His shoulders hit the fence and he slumped down in the dust. He wasn't angry now, he was emptier than ever, and ashamed.

The man who had thrown him off was brushing himself with both hands.

"You get out of here," he said. "Git! Stay out! Or you know what you'll get."

Gladden went along the road again. There still remained Bertha, returning with the doctor: the possibility of something having happened to her.

Peter Smith had explained that Bertha was "grown up," sixteen. Gladden had pictured her, with masculine faith in the domestic infallibility of women, as setting everything to rights in a flash. For some reason he had failed to associate Bertha with the wreck and desolation of the house.

WHEN he first saw her, straggling along the road, barefooted in the dust, he was conscious of a shock of disappointment. She was so little, so skinny, so husky-voiced: she might have been another Pete, another Nancy.

Gladden stopped her. "Are you Bertha Smith?"

Even in the dark, he caught the flash of fear in her eyes. "Yes. What do you want?"

He explained all over again. She was holding a big white dog by the scruff of his neck, to keep him from leaping at Gladden. All the while she watched his face, with that eager dread he had come to recognize.

"And Manuel?" she asked.

"Where's the doctor?"

"He was away. A baby is being born to Mrs. Tombis, the Filipino woman. He couldn't come."

"You poor kid. You walked all the way?"

"Sure I did."

"Aren't you tired?"

"Tired?" She challenged him: "It takes more than that to make me tired!"

But when they came to the ford, she went ahead of him, and, suddenly, kneeling down, could go no farther. "It's my feet, I guess. They burn so!"

Gladden stooped and lifted her. "I'll carry you." She was very small and light. Her arm went around his neck, and he could feel her fingers clutching at the collar of his coat, tight, tighter. Somehow, he understood without asking that she was afraid of what they were going to find at the house.

He knew now that he could not look to Bertha to care for those children. She was little more than a child herself. He twisted his head and tried to see her face. Like Peter, she was tow-headed. Not pretty, like Nancy. A funny little pinched face, close to his own. Another child to care for. Another reason why he couldn't run away.

He found all four children sitting on the porch crying. Even Peter was crying. Gladden knew without asking what had happened. The dog lay down on the steps and began to howl, long hysterical notes of protest and bewilderment. Bertha, too, began to cry. He put her down, and she flung herself on the ground, burying her face in her arms.

None of them paid any attention to Gladden. He stood a little aside, feeling very much out of it, like a stranger at a funeral. "They don't trust me," he thought. "They don't believe in me. I'm just somebody who has butted in. They wish I were out of the way."

He went in to Manuel. The old man had rolled out of bed, and lay heavily in a tangle of bedclothes. Where his head had been, there was a revolver. Gladden examined it; it was loaded; he slipped it into his pocket. Then he put Manuel gently on the bed, crossed the blunt hands, closed the filmed eyes and covered him as well as he could.

He returned to the porch, embarrassed, for he had quickly to invent a Being of whom he had little knowledge.

"Manuel is with God. A kind God." Was this true? "A God who will be good to him. Now, you kids run back to bed. I'm going to get you something to eat."

"To eat?"

Before the primitive anguish of that question, Gladden's spirits rose. "Before you know it, I'll be back with some milk, some eggs, and maybe a hen."

He loosened the revolver in his pocket, and ran once more into the unfamiliar darkness, toward Pelgram's ranch.

Ten Years After

he did not know if they lived or not. Then the briefest, baldest bulletins came trickling slowly back and forth through Switzerland, at intervals of three months.

Years went by . . . yes—years. Two years, twenty-four months, an eternity in the life of an ardent young man. Bouillonval, brought to our notice by a friend of ours in his regiment, knew not one soul in what was left of France. He became one of the soldiers, familiar in all French households of that time, who, because he had nowhere to go during his furloughs, came back to our home, wherever we were. At the beginning he was a big blond boy, sick with loneliness and fear for the helpless ones shut up in Chauny. As those months and years went on, we saw him harden into a grim, silent man with enduring eyes.

A turn of the war. Chauny was evacuated by the Germans. Bouillonval, riveted to his regiment at the front, wrote briefly to ask us, if possible, to get news from there, and let him know. The news came. It was that all able-bodied men and women had been driven back into Germany to forced labor. The sick and old (useless mouths) had been left in a little settlement near Chauny, while the evacuated town had been systematically dynamited, house by house, street by street.

I wrote this news to Bouillonval, feeling that every word was a nail in his heart.

In your correspondence department the L. B. 5-Drawer File is a genuine economy. It saves 25% of space over the 4-Drawer File, lasts a lifetime, operates without effort, assures greatest efficiency in filing, because the papers are always held upright. You owe it to your business to ask the L. B. man to tell you more about this super-file.

Now it's a simple matter — to save space in your office

IF your office seems to be crowding you in—if every square foot is at a premium—if you look enviously at the large area occupied by your files—then be sure to consider the space-saving economy of the new L. B. 5-Drawer File.

For here is a file of revolutionary value. Housing five standard-size drawers, it takes no more floor space than your present files, yet increases filing capacity 25%.

And you will want this file for its self-starting drawers, safety-latch (which checks the rebound), and Flexi-File equipment which keeps all papers in upright groups and eliminates the bothersome follower block.

Built to L. B. quality standards, this is a super-valued file in price as well as service. Ask the L. B. Man to bring the proof!

Six Advantages

1 5 Drawers—Saving 25% space over 4-Drawer Letter File.

2 Self-Starter—Each drawer equipped with positive working self starter that automatically starts the drawer without effort.

3 Flexifile Equipped—Each drawer contains Flexifile which holds the papers always in vertical position, preventing sagging and buckling of folders.

4 Safety Latch—Positive acting safety latch checks the drawer when it is shut, preventing accidental opening and rebound.

5 L. B. Quality—Known the world over as the last word in filing cabinets.

6 Manufactured by the largest organization in the industry by precise production methods, which assure a genuine saving in original price.

Tantalizing

Silk Hosiery can truly be appreciated when it is being worn. Its beauty is so enhanced by the wearer's shapeliness of limb. And the wearer—her own shapeliness of limb is enhanced by the silken hose which she wears.

But there are certain kinds of silken hose which bring out natural shapeliness and grace far more than other kinds.

Sheer silk Iron Clads, which snuggle close to softly rounded curves, concealing what they should conceal, yet revealing in all the fullness of their beauty the lovely lines of Nature, have a fascinating way of tantalizing the eyes of those who have a love for charming things.

ONE DOLLAR will buy sheer silk Iron Clad No. 806 in any of the latest lovely shades. Pure silk to the hem well above the knee, and powerful mercerized reinforcement at toe, heel, sole and top. If your dealer can't supply you with 806, send us your remittance and we'll mail your hose direct. Iron Clad

My hand still trembles when I think of some of the letters it wrote during the war. Bouillonval answered, writing the night before an attack, to ask if anyone could possibly get out to Chauny to see if news could be had from the old people left behind. He did not know, you must remember, whether his father and mother and sisters and sweetheart, all or none, were left alive. He did not know whether to wish that his sisters and his sweetheart were dead, or sent into forced labor in the enemy's country. He wrote briefly, sitting in a dug-out, not knowing if he would be alive the next day. His hand did not shake.

IT WAS practically impossible to get a permit to go into the razed zone where Chauny had been. It was under the strictest military guard. No one was allowed to go, save members of the regiments stationed there. But there was Bouillonval waiting in the trenches . . . waiting.

Somehow, by one of those prodigies of willing and contriving which made up our days, the permit to go was obtained, stamped, viséd, authentic.

Like a person in a nightmare—oh, exactly like a person in a nightmare, with the same numb incredulity—I found myself in the rain, climbing over and around heaps of ruined houses, showing my sauf-conduit to one militaire after another, asking my way to where the old people had been left. Finally, "Why, madame, here is one now, come to get medical supplies."

A pale, gaunt, stooping old man, clad in clothes the color of the rain which beat down upon us. Yes, he knew the Bouillonval family. Was Jean Pierre alive? I explained that it was for Jean Pierre I was seeking news. They are all gone. Jean Pierre's father and one sister are dead. His mother and the two other sisters were among those driven back to Germany.

"And his fiancée? Dead?"

"No, alive. Gone to forced labor, too."

That was the news I took back to Jean Pierre. It reached him in a hospital, where he lay with a bullet hole through one thigh. When he could hold a pen he wrote to thank me for my trouble. Then he was sent back to the front.

The war dragged on. We had forgotten that one could ever live otherwise than in war times.

And then it ended.

The first days after the Armistice were indescribable, the air pulsating in excitement, rising almost to madness, as the news came in from all those who had so long been cut off from us. Who was still alive, and who dead? People came rushing in half crazed with joy over their news. Others disappeared from sight . . . sometimes to be found no more.

I had forgotten Bouillonval, he was one of so many and the soldiers had had no furloughs for so long. A letter came in his handwriting; but, for the first time, wavering. I braced myself. But the news was good: "They are all alive. They are on their way home."

Home! The word was like a knell. I had been to Chauny. And then, two months later, an incredible letter from him, composed, like himself again, inviting us to his wedding breakfast, "In my home town of Chauny."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

I laid the letter down with a long breath of stupefaction. He gave no explanation. Bouillonval was never long on words. His life had been crammed with things far too big for words to handle. Of course we went. We would not have missed Bouillonval's wedding breakfast. . . .

The train stopped at nothing-at-all in the way of a station, a little hut just big enough to hold one cot bed and the sergeant who was acting as station master. All around stretched the same ruins I had seen eighteen months before, perhaps a little less like an unburied corpse now that time and decay had begun to push all those dead human homes down under the earth. It was raining. It was always raining. There stood Bouillonval in his faded old private soldier's uniform, his honest granite face as impassive as ever, except that now his eyes were shining. Beside him stood a fair, tall girl, very pale, very thin, not pretty at all, but— "Oh, she's all right!" cried my oldest child, Bouillonval's favorite, who was there by his special invitation. Yes, she was all right.

We shook hands all around and started back through the ruins, on which the rain beat down in a long, steady drive. We walked more than a mile through those ruins. There was a little talk. I was touched to learn that Bouillonval, in the few, brief, official bulletins of news he had been able to send them, had spoken of our household, of the American family who had tried to make him one of theirs. This came out when his fiancée said some heartfelt words of thanks. Once, before a low heap of broken bricks, "This is where Marie Jeanne was born, and brought up," said Bouillonval in his steady voice, "and my home was around the corner of the street there." They stood for a moment, and when they went on it was hand in hand.

We left the ruined town and plodded a mile farther, along a muddy road. We learned that Bouillonval's family had found a shelter in the little settlement left for the sick and old. There it was, finally, a cluster of tiny houses, unroofed and desolate mostly, a half-dozen intact. At the door of one stood Bouillonval's family to welcome us.

I HAD wondered, with a little shyness, how we wou'd meet, those tragically tried women and I—a total stranger to them. One of the memories which constantly knocks at the door of my heart asking to be understood, to be made food for life, is the recollection of how Bouillonval's mother and I did meet. Not as strangers at all—with one deep look into the other's eyes, one long step to the other's side. She kissed me on both cheeks, the hollow-eyed, gaunt working-woman, and held my hands in hers, hard and rough. I can feel them now, and they steady mine.

Did we speak at first? I don't remember. I do remember that we said to each other what was in our hearts. Why did we stand so confidently close? How was it that we did not feel the tragic inner barrier which so often separates hearts that ache to reach each other. I don't know—not yet. Give me another ten years.

They were living in two tiny rooms, and a tinier attic, the five of them. In the front room, perhaps twelve feet by ten, there were two chairs, some packing-boxes, a table evidently salvaged from the ruins, a minutely-small stove, and three mattresses piled on one another, with perfectly clean, worn bedding folded on top of the pile. There was no glass in the window frames, but the yellowish oiled paper which was the usual war substitute for glass. On the scrap of a stove was a large pot, steaming, fragrant, savory.

"We have plenty of fuel!" one of the sisters told me, cheerfully. "It is wonderful to be so warm and dry all the time. Under the ruins of the glass factory there is a big pile of coke, and we can creep in and take all we please, enough even to heat water for washing! It does seem so good to be able to keep our clothes clean."

"And to be together . . . alive," said her mother, in a low voice. She took her son's hand in hers.

What I had been looking at dissolved before my eyes and turned into something else. It was not a wretched hovel, comfortless and crowded. It was shelter, safety, and decency, shared by those bound together with love: it was a home, one of the prime prizes of human existence, unattained by many human beings in all of a long lifetime.

We sat down to the wedding breakfast: big bowls of the thick, steaming soup and chunks of war bread. We ate slowly, talking as we ate. Talking of what? Of what does one talk at a wedding breakfast? Of the new family about to begin life, of course, of how long Jean Pierre and his fiancée had known and loved each other, of how they had played together when they were children, of what they would do when they were married (that ceremony was to take place sometime that afternoon, whenever the official who could perform marriages could reach there on his rounds of that nightmare country).

BOUILLONVAL had a fortnight's furlough—unheard-of leisure! In that time he would be able to set in order a part, at least, of one of the half-ruined houses near by. He had saved a little (incredible!), had bought a bed and four sheets, and could salvage and repair a table and chairs from wrecked houses; enough to start with. That was all they needed now, a start. And when he was discharged from the army—soon now he hoped—he was promised work on the railway there in Chauny, steady work at good wages. The words rang loud and brightly, like new-minted coin. They smiled happily at each other to think what those words meant. It was wonderful, the luck they had. The two lovers sat close, their eyes as starry with hope and forward-looking love as those of any other bride and groom— Ah, more than many.

When we had finished the soup and bread, there was a little stir, a smile or two, and with pride the surprise was produced. We were not, it seemed, to have soup and bread only, good as that was (and how good the war bread seemed to them, they said), but a treat. Something Marie Jeanne had walked twelve kilometers the day before, in the rain, to get. Eggs! Yes, real eggs. They had almost forgotten how eggs looked. The eggs were brought out, and the cooking began.

The stove, you remember, was not much bigger than a good-sized milking-stool, and it had only one small hole in the top for cooking. A tiny frying pan was produced, the sort we buy in the ten-cent stores for cooking one egg or for children's playhouses. Into this was put a minute quantity of precious fat, and when this sputtered a little, an egg was broken and slid into it. One at a time, they cooked them, and one at a time we ate them, company first; all to the tune of perfect social ease and pleasant chat, such as would mark any civilized social event.

And then we produced our surprise. Someone from home had managed to send us, tucked in the corner of the trunk of a mutual friend, two little pots of orange marmalade, the first things made with sugar we had seen in many months, the first things made with sugar the Bouillonvals had seen in years. Decorum almost broke down under the shock of delight when the little golden glass jars were brought out of our hand bags. Eyes glistened greedily, like those of starved children. But there was no grabbing as a scrape of the sweet was put on each slice of dry bread. The slices were passed about the room, each helping himself with a decent show of nonchalance; but in spite of themselves there was a long "Ah-h-h" as the first delicious mouthfuls were taken. How slowly those slices of bread were eaten. How savored to the last crumb.

Yes, it was a wonderful wedding breakfast. I have never tasted a better. But there was something else. A climax.

AFTER the meal most of us stepped out to walk about in a brief pause between showers of rain. It was explained that we were going out for a breath of fresh air and to visit the town, to see the ruins of the church where the wedding would have taken place. But everyone knew that it was to leave room in the tiny shelter for the house-mother to tidy up after serving a meal. When we came back, it was almost time for us to return to Chauny to catch the one-train-a-day which ran back to Paris. Before we began to say our good-bys, however, Mme. Bouillonval, with a serious face of pride and emotion, said she would like to speak to me apart.

We went together into the dusky little back room, like a woodshed, and there, taking my hand again in hers, she told me in a trembling voice, which yet went bravely forward, that she had not yet thanked me for what I had done for her son, her only boy, left alone during all those years of the war. She had known my name, she said, from the first, as Jean Pierre had written her of the friends he had found, and she had not passed a day without saying it to herself. She had wished, above everything, to have something to give that other house-mother who had taken in her boy. She had thought of this and of that, prized old belongings, but, one by one, all their possessions had gone, taken by German requisitions for one reason or another. And when they had been driven off to forced labor, on foot, they had nothing left.

And yet, not quite nothing. She had kept one rabbit with her, carried it in a bag, and whenever they stopped she let it out to graze. She knew how to raise rabbits, and she had kept this one alive, always saving to herself through everything, "If we live through . . . if we ever get home . . . I shall have a present for the American lady." It had often seemed impossible. But she had done it.

And here it was, what she had saved as her token of gratitude. He was fat. He was good. "The American lady was to take him home to her husband and all the family, and they would have one good dinner, and know that Jean Pierre's mother—" She stopped, her voice at last failing her. She turned, with a gesture of pride, she took down from a hook on which it hung, stark, stiff, hideous, the skinned body of a dead rabbit, its great goggle eyes piteous and glazed. . . .

Can I sit here and in words tell you what, remembering that wedding-breakfast, I felt? You know I cannot. Either you know, or I can never make you feel, something of what was in my heart as she and I clung to each other silently.

The rabbit was wrapped in a bag, faded, red-flowered chintz it was, I remember; and after hearty farewells and good wishes we started back. At the corner of the street we turned around, and saw them standing before the door to give us a last greeting. They waved their hands and shook handkerchiefs, and shouted cheerful good-bys and thanks for coming.

I have only to close my eyes to see them again, unutterable, unimaginable desolation all about the poor little group of shabby, half-starved, working people. When I saw them then, and in all the thousand times I have looked back at them since, there streams up from them a shining glow of vitality, of enduring dignity, of stubborn resistence to disaster, of belief in human life, which warms for an instant all the cold, doubting corners of my own heart.

TO FINISH the story, when we returned to Chauny we found that the one-train-a-day was not running that day. We were stranded. Long search found a house with part of the roof intact. Kindly nearby soldiers loaned us a thin, dirty blanket apiece and some bread. We tore odds and ends of wood from the ruins, and made a smoky fire on the ruined hearthstone. The next morning we waylaid an army wagon driving down to Noyon, and, sitting in the back, our feet dangling, we rattled breakfastless through miles of dead apple trees, felled by the enemy's axes, past piles of ammunition laid up like cordwood, and finally into murdered Noyon. A belated express train from Strasbourg to Paris stopped to take us on, a grand train de luxe, with finely dressed travelers, who looked askance at our crumpled, muddy clothes, at our dirty faces, gray with fatigue, and at the lumpy, faded chintz bag which I carried. We saw their lips form the word of reproach, "refugees," as they drew their fine clothes aside to make room for us.

An American officer, in an expensively tailored uniform, was reading a fortnight-old New York paper. As he held it up, I saw in great letters an advertisement of evening cloaks—wonderful marked-downs they were, cloaks that had been $125 were, I learned, now to be had at $90.

Yes, even if one would, it would be hard to forget and push away all the stuff of life that comes crowding in with war memories!

'Round and 'round in my head they turn, those vivid things seen and felt, trying to find their rightful places in a pattern that will help me to understand.

She finished High School—with honors! Then business college gave her a "training" in six months and she started out to beat typewriters for a living.

Fine! But Susie was temperamental. Grinding drudgery might do for the type of girl whose ONLY aim is an early marriage. Alas! Susie found it killing. So Susie "took up the Saxophone."

Now Susie was just an average girl. You could never call her gifted or talented. But within a week she was playing tunes and in six months she could handle her Saxophone like a veteran.

Then things happened. First, a little club orchestra. Next, a local sextette. Then, some "home town" entertainment—a sharp eyed scout for a well-known booking office—a contract—and little Miss Susie hit the "big time" vaudeville, drawing down as much cash weekly as the salaries of half a dozen stenographers.

Sometimes I merely gaze at them helplessly, feeling them once more, red-hot with wrath or indignation, or pierced through with sympathy and admiration, but not understanding. Others have begun to tell me what they mean. Against the recollection of the Bouillonval family I lean hard, as against a great dyke when the winds of doubt and contempt for the race begin to blow. There are some noble things in human hearts—some human hearts—that can survive anything. I had never thought I would believe that again.

There are many of those recurring war memories which still strike too deep to let me reason about them, try to see their true place in the scheme of things. From time to time they rise somberly, or gloriously, and pour over me again a flood of fiery feeling. My war-memories are, you see, those of a woman, not of spectacular battlefields where human beings fought each other with bullets and bayonets, but of those other battlefields of the war, where human hearts fought undeserved sorrow and despair, sometimes winning, sometimes losing—for there were many defeats.

ONE year of the war I was, with a French friend, helping organize and run a convalescent home for invalid children, on a southern seashore near the Spanish coast. We had almost miraculous cures from the appalling cases of rickets which were so common a result of war privation among the younger children of refugees. We saw six-year-olds who had never been able to stand on their feet for lack of bone strength in their legs stop dragging themselves about like paralytics, and run scampering to their play, after only a few months of the brilliant sunshine of that blessed spot, and the good food bought for them by American money, saved for them by plain American housekeepers at home, who were going without eggs and flour that war-racked children might have food.

We had seen such astonishing cures that we felt no hesitation in taking poor, twisted, sickly Raoul, even in rather urging his mother to let him go. Why did she hesitate? He was the last one left to her of five, who had all been hearty and well at the beginning of the war. Two grown-up sons had been killed in battle, one daughter had died after long anemia; another daughter, crazed by being under shell fire, was in an insane asylum.

Only little Raoul, twelve years old, was left—in a plaster cast because his bones had no strength to hold up his head. The gentle, intelligent, loving little boy was all she had in the world. How could she let him go? But she looked at the red-cheeked, hearty children who came back from their stay in the southern sunshine; she remembered when—before the war—Raoul had been like that; we told her how we would love and cherish her little son, and that he surely would be happy.

He went. He was happy, dreadfully happy over having only what children should take without a thought—safety, sunshine, fresh air, real food, room to play on the sand, under the trees of a garden. He throve, grew better visibly, felt himself growing stronger; knew at last something of the heady joyous excitement of the mounting sap of youth; laughed out loud, sometimes shouted as he played.

Then the black influenza came up over the border from Spain, and began striking. People all around us died as if under rifle fire. It struck Raoul. We did our best. You can think how we did our best. But it was not enough. In a week he was dead.

We telegraphed his mother, and went to the little country railway station to meet her. I think I never had a harder half-hour than waiting for that train. How could we face her, the woman from whom we had taken her all. Wherever I looked, I saw her face as she had bidden him good-by, her mother's face so sick with fear and love that one felt it too great a burden on any woman's heart to be a mother in war time.

We had done our best, but could she believe that, could any mother believe that women who had let her only child die had done their best? She was a poor and ignorant woman, her nerves worn down with privation and hardship, with no class tradition of self-control. Perhaps she would make a scene, scream out her reproaches when she saw us. We half hoped she would. It would seem a penance for us.

The train came in. She was there, very pale, her eyes red and swollen. She ran toward us, her arms out. She cried to us, "He was so happy with you! You must never forget that. He had known perfect happiness before he went . . . as he never could with me."

She was comforting us! She had thought of what she could say that would be consoling to us. She had even brought, to show us, some of his letters, so that we would be quite sure he had been happy, could always have that to help us when we thought of him.

What can you do with a memory like that, except try to bear it, to live up to it? I'll tell you one thing you can't do with it, and that's to forget it.

There is a whole group of other memories which I can understand now, of which I could make no sense at all during the war. They sound out to me a clear note of warning, as terrifying as it is reassuring. Curiously enough, those were the very experiences which seemed at the time the most bewildering, disconcerting, disheartening. Every one brought me up standing, as if I had been struck on the head. So I was—by an idea knocking at my thick skull.

THOSE knocks (and there were many of them) came from the sight of the innumerable people who were enjoying the war. For, although little is said about it, there were many, many people who enjoyed the war, who were happier then than at any time since, who are homesick for it in their souls. Plain as was the evidence that they did, I tried to shut my eyes to it, because it seemed to prove something I could not endure: that there was in many normal human beings a vein of hard, brutal callousness to suffering; that they like to see people suffer, and enjoyed the sight of misery, so long as they were not touched personally. How else could I explain the animated eagerness of the faces of many war workers, even of soldiers, faces I had known at home, dull, listless, somber. How else could I explain the new vigor

WANTED!

Other people like these, to make big money as Real Estate Specialists

You want to make money—BIG MONEY. Here's an easy, pleasant way to make more than you ever dreamed was possible. You don't need experience or capital to start. Yet you can actually earn more money in a single day than you ever earned in a year at the best paid job you ever had. Does that seem too good to be true? Then just read these reports.

Widow Nets Big Money in First Venture

EDWARD A. ANDERSON of Illinois was working in the ordinary sort of job, at the ordinary kind of pay. But let him tell you, in his own words, what happened. He writes, "When I saw your ad I eagerly grasped the opportunity and it has repaid me many times over. Have received $2,700 commission on one deal."

Made Good on a Single Sale

How long would it take you to earn $2,700 at your present job?

Now read the report of L. C. CLARKE. For twelve years he was a brakeman on the New York Central. He got $683.40 a year. Today he owns a big business of his own in New York State and is a big booster of my money-making system. Recently he wrote that in one deal he cleared more than he got in six years' hard work on the railroad—$4,500 in a single sale!

Earn Small Fortune in One Day

Mr. Clarke never went beyond grammar school, but real estate showed him the way to financial independence!

Another report, Mrs. EVALYNN M. BALSTER, a widow with three children to support, was a school teacher—working for low pay. My system showed her the secret of making big money quickly. On her first sale she earned $5,500!

Initial Deal Brought Real Cash

Study our system the way Mrs. Balster did. She took it up in her spare time at home—without giving up her position. You can do the same. And it will pay you handsomely.

W. E. SHOOP once worked as a weaver. He followed my advice. Now he writes to say that in his first deal he made SIX THOUSAND DOLLARS—think of it!—and has some more big ones hanging fire which will earn good-sized commissions for him.

Get the facts about the opportunities in real estate. Get the facts about a system that will show you how to make Big Money—sometimes as much in one day as you now make in a year. The facts are in our book "How to Become a Real Estate Specialist." It's Free. Write for it at once before there is any chance of forgetting. Mail the Coupon NOW.

W. Burden Stage

"Mother has been my guiding star" says

Helen Wainwright

"WHATEVER my success," says Helen Wainwright, one of the greatest swimmers and divers of all time, "I owe it to my mother. Her love and guidance have been my greatest help."

SUNDAY, MAY 8
IS MOTHER'S DAY

Mother's Day is dedicated to all mothers—everywhere. Many people are in the habit of sending cards on this occasion to grandmothers; to the mother of wife or husband or friend; to all gentle, kindly mothers in the family group.

Surely a lovely custom—thus to bring the joy of tender memories into hearts that never lose their love for the little ones who somehow suddenly grew up to be men and women.

Scatter Sunshine with Greeting Cards

which thrilled through them, the astonishing health and endurance with which delicately bred men and women lived through and enjoyed the most extraordinary hardships? Not a day lost for sickness was the record of the majority. Bright eyes, firm, quick steps, eager, forward-moving, aggressive energy, and abounding good humor. They must be enjoying the war. How could they? How could anyone enjoy being a part, even a helping part, of that long ghastly butchery?

All my wonder and bewilderment came to a head in one short experience, and in one brief phrase. It is one of the memories which, during these past ten years, rise up from time to time, more brilliant with reality than the world about me.

I was passing through a horribly wrecked village, not one of the neatly dynamited ones from which all the inhabitants had been withdrawn, but one of those imperfectly and casually destroyed by a fringe of shell fire. My own errand took me many miles beyond; but seeing a huddle of sad-faced women and white-cheeked children at a corner of the street, I paused to ask if any relief agency had reached them. Yes, an American lady had come with supplies and an automobile, and was to take them back of the war zone to some sort of shelter. It was the third time they had tried to go back to their homes. The last. There was nothing left now. They did not weep aloud, nor wring their hands. They stood and sat heavily and silently on the wet ground, gray with misery. As I looked at them, I felt my heart sicken in my breast.

AROUND the corner of the street came an American girl, in uniform, with the swanky leather straps they all loved so dearly. Her fatigue cap was on one ear, her well-cut, high-laced leather boots stepped lightly through the mud, her young eyes were shining with health, energy, and something else which I did not (in my instant stupid misunderstanding of her) recognize. It took me long months of thought to recognize it for what it was. It looked then like young-ladyish, childish, shallow-heartedness.

Behind her came a group of thin, ill-clad children, their underfed bodies panting with the effort of keeping up with her long strides. I recognized her uniform, that of one of the well-organized war-relief agencies. We nodded, and I explained my presence by saying, "I was passing through and stopped to see if I could be of help. But I take it you have everything you need, that you're all right."

She turned her head on its beautiful long throat like a bird about to burst into song. She smiled at me—and yet I saw at once that it was not at me but at all the world she was smiling. "Sure, I'm all right!" she told me exultantly, "I'm having the time of my life!" The words echoed and reëchoed in my ears as I drove on. I was furiously angry with her, ashamed of her, infinitely relieved to know that none of the stricken women in her charge could have understood that brutal, egotistic cry.

I was ten years younger then! I have heard that cry in my ears many times since then, and although I still hear it, just as she said it, ringing with exultation, it no longer sounds brutal or egotistic to tell how they keep their hair in place

Clothes in the latest fashion. Hair always in place—right . . .

How do well-dressed college men and women meet this problem of unruly hair? That was what we wanted to find out. So we went all over the country. We actually talked to 958 college undergraduates. And we found:—

The hair dressing college men and women overwhelmingly prefer is—Stacomb!

"Stacomb really does keep the hair in place." "Makes it look right—not gummy or sticky looking." "Makes your hair look alive."

All that, yes—and more! For Stacomb is actually beneficial. It keeps your hair in condition; helps to counteract dandruff.

Stacomb comes in two forms now—as a delicate cream in jars and tubes, and in the popular new liquid form. All drug and department stores.

me. It sounds pitiful, touching, horrifying, an appeal bursting from the heart of human youth to be given work, work great enough to still the magnificent human hunger to be useful, to do something worth-while with one's life.

More bitterly than food or shelter or love or occupation, human beings need a goal, a compelling reason for going on. The more time they have to think, the more drastic is this need, the more horrifying that dead absence of a purpose in life, which is really the absence of religion, of faith.

What the war did, for the time being, for all who gave themselves to it, was to provide at least a temporary aim, something that had to be accomplished, some definite reason for rising and going through the day.

No matter what qualifications and shadings there might be in your feeling about the war, how much you hated it in the abstract, how skeptical you were about the pure righteousness of one side as against the unlighted blackness of the other, if, on the whole, you had decided to go in on one side or the other to help . . . there was no more doubt about that, and, hence, about the immediate purpose of your life.

No one who has not experienced this, who has not watched other people experiencing it, can even faintly guess at the immensity of the relief it affords, at the reservoirs of energy and strength which it unlocks.

My American girl had been, all her life long, deprived of this very stuff of life, had been starving to death for it. When suddenly she was set down in the midst of it, suddenly saw before her the nectar and ambrosia of feeling herself needed, useful, creatively living—who could blame her for her great cry of joy? One does not expect starving people to have good table manners. They must eat, first. She was not enjoying the misery of other people. She was scarcely aware of it, absorbed in her thankfulness at escaping from her own misery.

THAT was why people enjoyed the war—the simpler ones unabashed, the more self-conscious, secretly—because they felt with every breath they drew that they were working toward an aim that was worth more than their lives, that they were having their share in achieving something that must be done if they were to save what men most prize.

This can have been no monopoly of the Allied countries. It must have been felt as deeply, as life-givingly, in Austria and Germany, as in France and England, or they could not have held out a day.

If there is anything to be learned from the war about the race we belong to, it is that healthy human beings crave not comfort and self-regarding security but the feeling that they are giving themselves to some purpose worth while; so long for it that they snatch at anything that seems to give it to them, even though they must take it stained and foul with human suffering.

The monstrous, touching, tragic irony of it all . . . that so many found what they craved in those four years of blood and cruelty; that in these following years of easy abundance so few have found it!

The Job I'd Like Best of All

FIRST PRIZE

My Job is the Oldest in the World

THE job I like best is the job I have—that of wife and mother.

When friends wail to me about the drudgery and monotony of housework, I smile dubiously, for I have not found it so. It is not nearly so monotonous as sitting before the typewriter pounding out letters from morning till night, day after day, week in, week out. I did this for seven years, and then I married.

My husband is a working man and his wages are small. We have one child and we are buying a home.

I am the purchasing agent for the family. It is my job to wrestle with the bills and make our small income cover a large outgo, and slowly but surely we are gaining on the enemy.

It is my job to do the washing and ironing and sewing, the cooking and cleaning, and most of the gardening.

Is it monotonous? Is it drudgery? Not a bit of it. With bated breath I watch the cake in the oven to see if it will fall, and with wonder in my eyes I see the cereal rising in the kettle.

When I am tired of the house, I go out into the garden and dig up a few weeds, or cut the lawn, or just smell my roses and gossip with my neighbor over the fence.

I like my job because I can take my time about doing it. I do not have to punch a time clock, and I am my own boss.

Before I married, I earned as much as my husband is earning now. I had a fur coat, and saw all the best moving-pictures. Yet I would not go back to my old job. For I like to match my wits with the grocer and the butcher and gauge the value of potatoes, coffee, bacon and eggs, and when, at the end of the month, I find a balance to the credit side of my budget I feel like a regular captain of industry.

A comfortable home, a garden to dig in, someone to call me Mother, and love me when I am old. What more could a woman want? W. B. B.

SECOND PRIZE

I Want to be a Lighthouse Keeper

I AM not discontented with my present work, which consists of caring for a small flock of chickens, assisting with housework, and working at the village library; but it is natural for most of us to have a dream-job, and keeping a lighthouse happens to be mine.

I want my lighthouse to be situated on a wild and lonely stretch of coast. I would not fear the howling gales and raging sea, or the loneliness; for I find the greatest exultation in watching the gray rain driven before flying storm clouds, and perfect contentment in quiet solitude. As for the keeping of the light, how happy it would make me to know that I, alone, was responsible for the steady beam of light shining out into the darkness and storm!

Observing the tides and the different aspects of the weather would be a pleasure to me. I have been a coöperative observer for the U. S. Weather Bureau for the past few years; and this work has taught me to be intensely interested in all kinds of weather.

I should prefer some human companionship at my lonely lookout for part of the time. At all events, I would have several friendly cats to keep me company. I would also have magazines and a goodly number of books at my abode.

I realize that the work is more difficult than appears on the surface; but this does not make it seem any less desirable to me. For a lighthouse keeper can feel that he is serving his Government to the best of his ability, and that he is being of help to those of his fellow men who "go down to the sea in ships." G. H.

THIRD PRIZE

"A Thing of Beauty is a Joy Forever"

THE job I like best is my own; that is why I have it.

I am a tree surgeon. Why? Answer these questions and you will know why.

What other work will pay more in health and happiness?

Where else could I be my own boss, to come and go as I please?

Where could I find more pleasant surroundings than beautiful parks, or on the wide lawns of fine country estates?

What other occupation would take me from state to state, city to city, North in summer, South in winter, and to practically every corner and beauty spot of our country—the Thousand Islands, the Adirondacks, Long Island, the North Shore, Florida, and California?

What other class of people would be better clients than those I have to deal with—refined, artistic men and women, with a feeling for beauty?

What companions are better than trees, flowers, birds; in fact, all Nature herself?

What other profession is more honorable than the saving of God's most noble and largest living things?

What could be more inspiring than the thought that I am preserving for coming generations some forest monarch whose life is connected with tradition, legend, or history?

What could be more thrilling than swinging on a long rope from one limb to another, a hundred feet from the ground, while I am pruning some immense elm?

What could be more gratifying than to have the respect and esteem of everyone who sees, or knows of my work?

What could be more comforting to me, in my old age, than to know that there are fine old trees all over the country that will remain living monuments to me in years to come?

Last of all, what could bring me nearer to God and His works?

The answers to these questions are the reasons why the job I like best is my own! R. F.

Strop a NEW blade and give yourself a barber's shave

A barber gives you a good shave because he has a good razor and because he strops it each time before he uses it.

The stropping is very important. The best old-fashioned razor made wouldn't be worth a whoop unless it was stropped regularly.

Safety razor blades are made of no better steel than the old-fashioned razor. They need stropping to make them the equal of the barber's razor.

That's easy with a Twinplex. The action is quick and automatic and the results certain. The cutting edge of a brand NEW blade when stropped is improved so much you'd hardly recognize it.

Mr. Goeth has tried it and knows:

"Your stropper is the first thing I have found that takes the PULL out of a safety razor, makes a safety razor shave equally as well as a straight razor. I frequently find new blades which are unfit for shaving even one time, but the "Twinplex" overcomes this and gives me shaves as smooth as my barber can give."

(Signed) Arthur C. Goeth, San Antonio, Tex.

And that's not all. A stropped blade lasts longer. You'll spend much less for blades.

Stropped NEW Blade Free

Name your razor and we'll send you, free, a NEW blade stropped on a Twinplex. We would like to show you what real shaving is.

All dealers are authorized to sell you a Twinplex on 30 days trial. If after four weeks of marvelous shaving you are willing to forego the comfort and economy you have enjoyed give up your Twinplex and get back your money. If you can't find the model you want, write us.

through, you will find many beautiful memorials; but Riverside is not, as so many cemeteries are, scarcely more than a stone-yard!"

"How do you manage it?" I asked.

"Partly by education; and partly," he smilingly added, "by regulation! Suppose a family buys a ten-by-sixteen-foot lot; or of any other dimensions amounting to one hundred and sixty square feet. We have scores of much smaller lots. All cemeteries do have them. And it is because people crowd these small spaces with "monuments" that the whole place looks like a stone-yard.

"But a monument cannot be erected in Riverside, except on lots containing more than one hundred and sixty square feet. On all others, only markers are permitted; and these must be flat ones, only four inches in height. The result is that the place is beautiful with long stretches of grass, where these low markers seem a part of the pattern of lights and shadows under the trees.

"We have some fine memorials on the larger lots. But with ample space, and a chance to use design in the planting of shrubbery, we can make these memorials contribute to the effect of beauty.

"THAT is what our people have been educated to appreciate and to desire in Riverside. They love it not alone because it is the spot where their dear ones are at rest, but also because, in itself, it is a place of beauty.

"As nearly as I can put it," Mr. Rubee went on, as we turned into one of the curving drives, "that is my ideal of what a cemetery should be; and I think I have made some progress toward realizing it.

"For example," he said, stopping beside the little lake I had glimpsed through the trees, "this was a stagnant marsh, filled with cattails, when I came here thirty-seven years ago. It was nothing but a frog pond, a snake hole! People used to throw old tin cans and other trash into it.

"Well—you see what it is now; but you can't see the years of work, not to speak of the money, that had to be put into its transformation.

"The transformation is not alone in the spot itself. The attitude of the community is just as radically changed. I don't believe our people would give up that lovely lake for ten times the money it cost. No one would dream of throwing tin cans into it! If anyone did do such a thing I believe he would be mobbed.

"That fountain in the center plays the year round. In winter, it gradually builds up a great pyramid of ice. Sometimes it is thirty feet high, a glittering white monument in itself, with a thin veil of falling water slipping down the cascade of ice.

"When the lake is frozen over, the little children come here to skate on it. Some people thought, at first, that this was almost a desecration. I don't believe anybody thinks so now. Riverside is the last home of those we love. Then why rob it of what makes a home—human companionship, joy, youth, the laughter of children at play! I have tried to make this place beautiful, not only in its physical aspects but also in its living human quality.

"I wish you could see it in the spring," he went on. "We salute the spring! You might almost say that we hang out banners to welcome it. For within two minutes' walk after you enter the gates, you will see ten thousand tulips in glorious bloom.

"Later come the flowering perennials; wonderful beds of color to delight the eye. You can't imagine what a joy it is to plan all this 'art out of doors,' as I call it.

"It is like painting a picture on a seventy-acre canvas. . . . No, not that! It is like painting a hundred pictures! For Riverside is so designed, in its drives, walks, and planting scheme, that it is simply full of beautiful vistas, lovely groupings, and charming effects.

"And yet, as you see, it is not artificial. I have kept the natural slopes and contours. Hundreds of our trees are the original growth which I found here; white oaks, black oaks, elms, and some maples. I have planted many new trees, of course; but I have chosen those which belong in this climate. The result is that they grow and thrive.

"NOW," he went on, as we turned down a wooded slope, "I'll show you Lovers' Lane.

Imagine a lonely road, at the far end of a cemetery, and accessible only through the "graveyard" itself, being a place where young love feels at home! And imagine the people of a town being so educated in the idea of having their cemetery a place of happiness, that they would not let this road be called anything else but Lovers' Lane.

"We are coming now to the new part," said Mr. Rubee, as we went up the slope at the other end of the road. "When we bought this additional land, there were houses on it: ugly houses, with mean outbuildings and a general air of unkempt sordidness. No trees, no grass; just flat, dull ugliness.

"But now it has been filled in and hollowed out, until there are gentle undulations, with drives winding among them. I have planted hundreds of trees and shrubs. Already we begin to get pictures; and they will grow more beautiful every year.

"Riverside is twice as large as when I came here. It will be larger still. It is the only cemetery the town has. No one wants to have another one! There is none within five miles of the town in any direction. There is none within a radius of ten miles, except a few little country graveyards. Even the farmers all through this section love Riverside so much that they come here often—and want to find here their last resting place.

"Not only that, but people who perhaps left Marshalltown years ago want to be brought back to Riverside when they die. Stranger still, a man who never lived in the town, but who visited friends here a few years ago, said that he wants to be buried in Riverside. His home is in Florida, which is supposed to be the land of beauty. Yet he found something here which was missing there."

"You spoke of this being the only

Adds Gloss and Lustre, Makes Your Hair Easy to Manage

IF you want to make your hair easy to manage and add to its natural gloss and lustre, this is very easy to do.

Just put a few drops of Glostora on the bristles of your hair brush, and brush it through your hair when you dress it. You will be surprised at the result. It will give your hair an unusually rich, silky gloss and lustre—instantly.

Glostora simply makes your hair more beautiful by enhancing its natural wave and color. It keeps the wave and curl in, and leaves your hair so soft and pliable, and so easy to manage, that it will stay any style you arrange it, even after shampooing—whether long or bobbed.

A few drops of Glostora impart that bright, brilliant, silky sheen, so much admired, and your hair will fairly sparkle and glow with natural gloss and lustre.

A large bottle of Glostora costs but a trifle at any drug store or toilet goods counter. Try it! You will be delighted to see how much more beautiful your hair will look, and how easy it will be to manage.

cemetery in town," I said. "Of course you meant the only Protestant cemetery."

Mr. Rubee gave a quick glance around him, then abruptly stopped the car.

"No," he said, "I meant the only cemetery. Right here at this spot, you are in what was once a separate Catholic cemetery. The ground still belongs to that church. But, as you see, the fences have long since been taken away. It is an integral part of Riverside; under the same management; developed according to the same ideas. We, here in Marshalltown, have no separate burying ground for the people of any creed, or class, or race!"

"Have I seen the whole cemetery?" I asked a little later.

"Yes—practically," he replied. "Not all the driveways, of course; but you have had a general view of it. Why?"

"I WAS just wondering—where is your Potter's Field?"

"We have none!" he said emphatically. "I think it would be a blot on Riverside, a blot on the town itself, if we had one."

"But—the poor people who cannot afford a lot," I said. "How about them?"

"You haven't noticed it," he smiled, "but there are dozens of single graves in Riverside. You are not conscious of this because our plan takes care of the general effect. You see the beautiful whole. But we have provided for all classes, rich and poor alike.

"For those who can afford it, we have large spaces which they can beautify with planting and a costly and artistic memorial, helping to make Riverside lovely for everyone. And those who can buy only a single grave share this loveliness. That, I think, is as it should be. I don't believe in thrusting the poor into some ugly, out-of-the-way corner.

"But I want to say this: Our people have come to feel that they do not want to be paupers when they die, any more than while they are living. They take care of this final obligation for their families and for themselves, as an honorable duty.

"They have been educated to be proud of Riverside. They have seen the years of work and effort that have gone into its development. They know that it has cost a great deal of money. And they feel a sense of pride in having their share in it. In some cases they need a little help; but we always manage it, somehow or other.

"It has been wonderfully interesting to watch this education of the people.

"Sunday has become one of the most beautiful of all days. The people come in hundreds, as individuals, or in family groups, to pay true respect to those they love, and to find for themselves a quiet happiness.

"It is a common theory that 'the people cannot be educated to prefer the really fine and beautiful things of life.' My answer to that is: Give them those things; if necessary, compel them for a time to live with something beautiful! That sort of education will work the transformation—and it is the only kind that will work it. Beauty is its own teacher. Give it time enough, and it will need no interpreter. Riverside is the proof of this.

"You should see this place on Memorial Day! Of course, that is the great day of the year in every cemetery. But, considering the size of Marshalltown, I doubt whether Riverside has a rival anywhere on Decoration Day.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

"Flowers arrive, literally in wagon-loads. Every florist's greenhouse is stripped of bloom. And the people themselves—men, women, and children—come with their arms full of blossoms from their own gardens; or, if they have no other resources, with wild flowers which they have gathered in the fields and woods.

"Next to this anniversary, the most universally observed day of remembrance is Mother's Day. I imagine that every cemetery superintendent would tell you the same thing.

"We have other proofs of the peculiarly tender love of sons and daughters for their mother. When they have lost her, they seek to honor her in every possible way. Often this is the crowning act of years of devotion on their part. But sometimes it is plainly a poignant desire to atone for thoughtless lack of devotion while she was living. They try to make up for it by showing the world that they love and honor her. But I can see in their faces the remorseful wish that they had shown it to her, instead.

"We see much of sadness here. That is inevitable. But I think the saddest thing of all is this remorse among the living; this regret over lost opportunities for simply being kind. It is the only grief which the beauty and peace of Riverside is powerless to assuage.

"But I believe that I am right in thinking that the spirit of this place is an influence which helps to prevent some of this special sadness. Because people love Riverside, and therefore come here so often, they more or less unconsciously accept the fact that 'the silver cord' of life will sometime be broken. The thought is not a gruesome one; not here, where they see, on every hand, beauty and the surviving quality of love. I think—I hope—that this beauty and love flow into their own hearts and lives."

He was silent a moment; then looked up with a half-apologetic smile.

"I BELONG to three national organizations," he said; "and I think there is only one other man in the country—Mr. Hare, of Kansas City—who is a member of all three of those societies. They are the American Society of Landscape Architects, of which I am an associate member; the American Institute of Park Executives; and the American Association of Cemetery Officials and Superintendents. In a way these three organizations are linked together. Their field of endeavor is for betterment in God's great and beautiful out-of-doors.

"Now, I admit that I am proud of this. It means, I think, that I have demonstrated my ability to manage the technical part of this work. I do my own designing. I have taught myself draftsmanship and I draw all my own plans. I am called on to lay out the plans for cemeteries in other towns. I am constantly helping them to solve their problems, for Riverside has a rather wide reputation and people come here to find out its secret—the reason why it is the most beautiful and most beloved spot in this town.

"I told you the reason, when I said that it is not just a graveyard, but an invitation to the living to come and find beauty and happiness, linked with their tenderest

Let Me Make You a Master Salesman!

This New Easy Way

IF you are ambitious to become a salesman the Association of which I am president will take you in short, easy steps and make a Master Salesman of you, help to put you in the same class with the big pay men who have all the good things of life.

Easy as A B C

If you have ordinary intelligence you can quickly master the simple A B C's of selling. There are certain ways of approaching a prospect to get his undivided attention, certain ways to stimulate keen interest, overcome objection, batter down prejudices, and make the prospect act.

You can learn these principles at home in a short period of pleasant, inspiring study. And once you have mastered these secrets of Master Salesmanship, you can take advantage of the employment department of the Association without charge. This is a real opportunity, for during the last year the Association received calls for 49,880 salesmen from the biggest sales organizations in America.

The book offered below has been the starting point for thousands of men who are now successful salesmen. This book, "Modern Salesmanship," is now FREE, and will be sent to every man who fills out and returns the coupon below.

Rush the Coupon

If I were asking ten or twenty dollars for this book you might hesitate. But I am not. It is Free. And since it may mean the turning point in your life, it certainly is worth two cents to read the astonishing facts given between its covers. memories. I am more proud that I have achieved this ideal than I would be of membership in a hundred imposing societies."

Probably Mr. Rubee owns his own lot in Riverside. I didn't ask him. I don't know whether it contains more than one hundred and sixty square feet and therefore can have a memorial erected upon it. Anyway, it makes no difference. The only memorial he needs is already seventy acres in extent. It is Riverside itself. Some day—a long distant one, I hope—when he finds in Riverside the "home" he has tried to make it, I trust that the customary funeral dirge will be omitted; that only the whispering leaves of the trees he has cherished, the notes of the birds for whom he has made a sanctuary, and the quiet voices of the living people whom he has taught to be unafraid of death—only these will be heard.

JAMES E. WEST, executive head of the Boy Scout Organization of America, has had a most amazing career. Brought up in a dreary orphanage, without, so far as he knows, a relative in the world; discharged from a hospital at the age of eight as a hopeless cripple, he has conquered life and bent it to his will. The Children's Courts owe their existence in part to his keen devotion to children's interests; and his understanding of boys and their needs has helped to make the Boy Scout Organization what it is to-day. Next month you can read the story of this lonely little boy, who now numbers his friends by the thousands.

not reply directly. "It kind of rounds out a man's life to be a Minister to some place—say Belgium or some'eres. W-al, near's I kin understand it, there's goin' to be sich an openin'."

"Ah!"

"Marvin, if ye owned our Senior Senator, would ye figger on buyin' you another jest like him, or would ye kind of sell him at a reasonable price to git rid of feedin' him through the winter?"

"Well," said Mr. Whitehouse, "I'm sure one of him would be enough—and I'd consider reasonable offers."

"So I figgered. . . . You don't want to be senator, do you?"

"I do not."

"Um. W-al, ye hain't likely to be. Don't git skittish. I've heard tell you see eye to eye with the President."

"I do."

A Cure for Nerves

How one American Magazine reader found health, pleasure and money.

THE little Mrs. Robbins, whose interesting story I shall tell, had for many months, so she told me, lived in a "world of self-pity."

Her children, a boy of twelve and a girl of nine, are in school every day—just as all healthy children should be—and it was out of sheer loneliness that imaginary little ailments were upsetting her. Her home was very modern, having practically all the new devices that make housekeeping light and easy, so she had plenty of leisure—too much leisure.

Month after month she grew more and more weary and really sick, as she thought. The doctor said: "You are developing nerves—get a hobby. Find something interesting to do—anything to take you out of yourself."

That very day she found The American Magazine could help her and that she was welcome to join the Pin Money Club, a friendly, money-making department where more than ten thousand girls and women, many of them wives and mothers, enjoy being members. Now I shall let Mrs. Robbins tell you the rest of her story:

Dear Margaret Clarke:

My physician complimented me on my happy smile today. He said he was really proud that I had improved so much in health these past few weeks. Of course, I quickly told him of the Club, of the $65 I had earned, and also showed him my membership pin, the gold-and-pearl beehive. He was amazed and told me to keep right on—that he felt my new work was the very thing for me.

Doesn't this letter have a message for you? And wouldn't you like to join this jolly money-making Club? Do write to me to-day, for you are missing many delightful things and also extra dollars!

No more misery breaking in New Shoes

Wherever the shoe causes you any discomfort, apply a Zino-pad to the tender spot. Instant relief is your reward—and at the same time every possibility of a corn, callous, bunion or blister removed. Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads stop the cause of these troubles—friction and pressure of shoes. They are thin, medicated, antiseptic, protective, healing. Cost but a trifle. Sold everywhere.

1. For Tender Toes and Corns
For tender toes (the first sign of corns), apply Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads (Corn size). Soreness is removed over-night and corns positively prevented.

2. Burning Soles—Callouses
For Callouses here or burning sensation or soreness—apply Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads (Callous size). They stop the cause, and end the pain at once.

3. For Sore, Tender Heels
Blisters and tender spots on the heels prevented and all soreness removed, by applying Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads (Callous or Bunion size).

4. Preventing Bunions
Apply Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads (Bunion size). They stop the pressure of the shoe, and prevent and relieve bunions and swollen joints.

5. For Tortured Instep
For painful ridges on the instep, caused by tight shoes, use Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads (Callous or Bunion size). They prevent blisters and quickly heal.

waitin' to grab 'em—a man that kin plow a straight furrow."

Mr. Whitehouse nodded.

"You hain't got no leanin' that way," Scattergood went on. "It might fall into the hands of some skeezicks like the Senator."

"So you aim to eliminate him?"

"That's fur from enough. We got to put a feller in his place that'll take up where I lay down."

"And what do you want of me?"

"I want you should campaign for it, like you had to git it or bust."

"But I might win."

"You won't," said Scattergood. "But," he said, with his eye cocked out of the window, "as things lays, you kin deadlock."

"Ah," said Mr. Whitehouse.

"And there's an openin' in Belgium, or some sich furrin country."

"I see."

"Well?"

"Shake," said Mr. Whitehouse.

THE campaign opened. It is no easy task to displace an officer so well entrenched as the Senior Senator from a sovereign state; but here were special circumstances: In the first place, Marvin Whitehouse had a following in all parts of the Commonwealth; in the second place, there was an issue, and of that Scattergood made the most. The issue was support of the President's policies. Mr. Whitehouse was an able and convincing speaker; Lafe Siggins had climbed on the band wagon—and the party was split in internecine strife which seemed to be a battle to the death.

The opposition party, which had lived a formal existence for a score of years, yawned, came to life and licked its lips. Its few members of the legislature which was to elect a senator, sat back, waiting to see how the cat would jump, determined to throw their support to any candidate who seemed most likely to throw a monkey wrench into the machinery.

It was a close thing, a bitter fight, and there were those who predicted it was Scattergood Baines's last battle. They saw control of the state's political machinery wrested from his hand and usurped by the Senator. Even his friends were uneasy, as the vote was estimated. It was close, very, very close, and much depended upon whether the legislators elected by the opposition party would stand by their nominal candidate, or would swing to one or the other of the actual aspirants.

"It doesn't look so good," Johnny Bones said to Scattergood. "The betting is on a deadlock."

"Mebbe we kin contrive suthin'," Scattergood said.

"We've contrived about all we can contrive."

"Seems as though," Scattergood admitted.

"And the party's in a mess. Split wide open by this feud. I'm worried."

"Good idee," said Scattergood. "Stay that way."

"The votes we have, we can hold. But so can the Senator."

"Suthin'll have to give sometime."

"There's the seven Democratic legislators."

"I've hoted 'em," said Scattergood.

"What next?"

"Git 'em bitter," said Scattergood.

"What's that?"

"The bitterer the better. So's nobody'll give in."

"I think they're that way now."

"Um. We'll see. We'll see."

AND so the days were occupied until the hour for the voting of the legislature arrived. The galleries were packed; milling politicians filled the halls and stairways; voices were raised; fists were shaken high. It was an occasion such as the people and the press adore . . . and the result was as had been predicted. The first vote showed a deadlock. And Scattergood's emissaries had seen to it there was a deadlock of personalities—a duel between the Senator and Marvin Whitehouse. All else was forgotten. You were either a Senator's man, or you were a Whitehouse man.

Lafe Siggins dropped into Scattergood's room. "W-al," he said, "we done our best, but I calc'late 'twan't enough. We kin hold; but we can't elect."

"Looks like the boys was sot in their opinions," Scattergood agreed. "Keep 'em so, Lafe. Keep 'em so."

"Anythin' else?"

"G'-by, Lafe. Keep 'em venomous."

A day of balloting passed; worn and harassed legislators returned to an evening session which continued far into the night. Still deadlocked. Eight ballots had been taken without the changing of a vote. All day Thursday the condition persisted, and Friday. Men's nerves were worn and frazzled. More than one fist fight was stopped, and gentlemen who had associated in comity for years in those legislative halls now applied to each other epithets of a not endearing nature.

But still the deadlock held. Meetings, caucuses, arguments, proffers, dickers! But so high and so bitter ran the feeling that no Whitehouse man would have voted for the Senator for any earthly reward, and no Senator's man would have swung to his rival had he been offered the kingdoms of the earth. . . . And Scattergood did nothing.

"Somethin'll bust if we hold over Sunday," said Lafe Siggins. "Human nature can't endure it. We'll be callin' out the milishy."

"Don't calc'late to need any soldiers," said Scattergood placidly. "'Tain't goin' to run past Sattidy noon."

"'Tain't, eh? How in tunket you figger to stop it?"

Scattergood waggled his head. "Perty hot fight, hain't it? Kind of pussonal, eh? Got so's 'tain't my fight. Folks has kind of lost sight of me, hain't they?"

"Seems as though," said Lafe.

"What I figgered on," said Scattergood in a satisfied tone.

"I hain't heard no talk of a compromise."

"Mebbe the time hain't ripe yit," said Scattergood.

Early in the Saturday session the Governor appeared upon the floor to make a speech of conciliation; he advised a conference of the leaders of the opponents, to see if some amicable solution could not be secured. Directly following his address, a legislator arose.

"Mr. Marvin Whitehouse desires the privilege of the floor," he said.

Acrimonious debate followed, but upon this point agreement was reached: that both candidates should be invited to speak to the legislature. Presently Mr. Whitehouse appeared.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I shall be brief. This contest seems to have reached an impasse. I, therefore, in the interest of this state and of my party in this state, wish to withdraw my name as a candidate for the senatorship—but upon one condition; namely, that my opponent follow my example."

In the dead silence which followed, he walked from the room—and then turmoil ensued. Nor did the Senator appear to make his address, for he was besieged in his room by party leaders demanding that he follow the example of Mr. Whitehouse. He refused doggedly. Word came from the Governor that his support would be withdrawn if the Senator persisted.

Politicians look to the main chance. So long as Mr. Whitehouse remained in the field and there was a contest for party control, the Senator's adherents would cling to him from bread and butter motives. But now, with the prospect of a compromise candidate and party peace, they were ready to force their man to walk the plank.

The Coldriver post office, which had loomed no larger than a man's hand, now obscured the Senator's sky.

An adjournment was taken until after lunch, whereupon, Mr. Lafe Siggins began making overtures to certain prominent gentlemen of the opposition.

"Boys," he said, "we've been a-gittin' het up and callin' one another names. Now we git the idee we can't lick one another. And the Senator's bound to withdraw before you go into session agin. While them party leaders wrangles with him and tries to fix on a compromise candidate, let's about a dozen of us go off and eat together, and see if we can't patch things up."

"Sounds sensible," said one of the embattled legislators. "Let's see if we can't save the old party."

"Who'll we take?"

"W-al, there's you six fellers. Then we'll git Jones from Buttstown, and Siggins from up-state, and Nelson, and some of the wheel hosses from our side."

"Where'll we go?"

"Out to the Lake House, where we kin be quiet. Take fifteen minutes to git there."

"Get three cars," said someone. But, strangely enough, three cars for hire were standing before the steps of the Capitol, and into these the party clambered.

WHILE this delegation drove to the Lake House, and dined, and did their utmost to turn the affair into a little love feast, the Senator, faced by desertions, withdrew. But on a condition—the condition that he could name the compromise candidate. To his astonishment, this was accepted with little argument. At least, thought he, this would insure his hold upon the party helm.

"Very well, then," said he; "I sacrifice my personal ambitions for the good of the party. And I name Mr. William Sawyer as my successor. A worthy candidate who will worthily represent this great commonwealth."

And so peace reigned. When the legislature resumed session at one o'clock, Scattergood Baines sat in the gallery for the first time during the contest. He sat in the front row, large and placid and smiling—and somehow neglected. Things were not as once they had been, when his appearance in the Capitol had been the signal for a group of wishful politicians to gather about him, hanging upon every word. But Scattergood seemed not to be downcast. He spoke now and then to Johnny Bones, and, on the whole, seemed satisfied with proceedings.

Not so the loyal Johnny. He raged.

"Why don't you assert yourself?" he demanded. "You are letting yourself be pushed aside. What—Mr. Baines, you're not quitting?"

"Seems like mebbe I shot my bolt," said Scattergood. "Hush up; they're goin' to nominate Will Sawyer."

It was done in style and amid cheers. But then a whiskered old gentleman from down-state, one of those legislators who are always good for humorous copy in the newspapers, but who are never taken seriously by their peers, got to his feet.

"Seein'," said he, "that we got everythin' all fixed up, and everybody loves everybody else, it looks to me like this was a kind of a pleasant time, jest as a formality, and to pay a compliment, fer me to kind of nominate a man from down our way that we got admiration fur. I don't calc'late it means anythin', exceptin' that his town'll be pleased his name was mentioned."

There was a roar of laughter and cries of, "Name him! Name him!"

"Therefore," said the old gentleman, "I place in nomination the name of Johnny Bones, of Coldriver."

Another laugh, though, perhaps, there were some few who did not laugh quite so heartily, and who cast upward a glance at Scattergood Baines, remembering him suddenly. A voice seconded the nomination. The roll call proceeded.

AND then the hall became aware that something not upon the books was happening. It might have been expected that a few friends would vote for Johnny Bones as a compliment, but as the call proceeded it appeared that for every Sawyer vote there came also one for Johnny. Suddenly the legislature awoke. Leaders began to rush up and down the aisles, counting, gesticulating, calculating.

The roll call proceeded, reached the N's, the P's. Now the excitement which had reigned in the former contest was as nothing. Men rushed from the Capitol hatless and coatless to carry the news to headquarters that something was happening. Men stamped and shook their fists at the whiskered old legislator who had brought this thing about. . . .

"Where's Ames, and Walker, and Jenkins and Doolittle and—" A frenzied leader had discovered six of his most dependable votes to be missing.

"I seen 'em get in some cars to drive some'eres," he was told.

The roll call reached the S section. Telephones were jangling all over the city in an effort to locate the missing votes before it should be too late. For, checking up the vote, it was again neck and neck—with Johnny Bones a couple of votes ahead.

A Sure Way To End Dandruff

There is one sure way that never fails to remove dandruff completely, and that is to dissolve it. Then you destroy it entirely. To do this, just apply a little Liquid Arvon at night before retiring; use enough to moisten the scalp and rub it in gently with the finger tips.

By morning, most, if not all, of your dandruff will be gone, and two or three more applications will completely dissolve and entirely destroy every single sign and trace of it, no matter how much dandruff you may have.

You will find, too, that all itching of the scalp will stop instantly and your hair will be lustrous, glossy, silky and soft, and look and feel a hundred times better.

You can get Liquid Arvon at any drug store, and a four ounce bottle is all you will need. This simple remedy has never been known to fail.

It's so easy to use and what a relief!

Just shake Allen's Foot-Ease into your shoes in the morning and walk all day in comfort. It takes but a moment, and is better than a "daily dozen" for putting "pep" into your feet, and at night you can dance and not get foot-sore.

Allen's Foot-Ease takes the friction from the shoes, soothes tender, tired, aching feet, absorbs perspiration and relieves calluses, corns and bunions.

But the missing men could not be reached. They had been at the Lake House, but had left. It is true they had left. When they came out from the dining-room, in ample time to get back for the session, it was discovered that one of their three cars had disappeared. Lafe Siggins uttered language, but as host made the best of it. He crowded the six Senator's men into one car and his friends into another. The senatorial car started first. It was an eager driver they had, and he made speed. Indeed, he made such speed that his passengers remonstrated. Just as they reached the edge of town an ominous "put-put-put" sounded behind them, and a goggled figure in khaki and on a motor cycle motioned them to the roadside.

"Where you think you're headin' for—a fire?" demanded this guardian of the highways.

"We were going a bit fast," said Ames, "but it'll be all right. We're all members of the legislature on our way to the session."

"So's my uncle a Knight of Pythias," said the officer. "Sixty mile you was doin', and we don't aim to have no sich capers through this stretch. Turn her around, young feller, and take your load back to the justice."

"But we must reach the Capitol," expostulated Ames.

"You'll reach the calaboose if I git any back-talk out of ye," said the officer.

"Then let us out, and take back the driver and car."

"And lose my witnesses! Can't ketch me that way. Back you go, the whole caboodle of ye."

BACK in the Capitol the roll call reached the W's and finally came to Zander, who ended the alphabet. A stunned silence followed. Presently a clerk stepped to the side of the presiding official, who swallowed hard and groped to his feet.

"Gentlemen," he said huskily, "the result of the election is as follows: Mr. John Bones, of Coldriver, forty-six votes; Mr. Sawyer, of Trenton, thirty-seven votes; Mr. Myles, the Democratic candidate, seven votes. And Mr. Bones is declared elected United States Senator by a majority of two votes of a total of ninety votes cast."

Scattergood Baines got up and yawned. He turned to the astounded Johnny, and patted his back.

"Told ye to git ye a silk hat, Johnny," he said. "Um. . . . W-al, I guess you and me kin still take care of ourselves if we got to."

There was a trampling of feet on the gallery stairs. No longer was Scattergood alone, but the center of a throng, all clamoring for his notice. Once more, in his own way, he was the victor. Again the machinery of the state was in his sturdy hand. They were quick to recognize it and to accept.

"Gentlemen," he said, placidly, "seems like we held an election. Kind of seems as though. . . . New senator's got an announcement, and ye might carry news of it to the senator that's jest gittin' through. You kin tell him Mr. Bones is puttin' Will Pratt back as postmaster in Coldriver!"

your tickets on a railroad, or sail a boat, or manipulate the stock market, or use the right fork, or draw up a contract, when there aren't any of those things? You'll find that just about nine tenths of your 'knowledge and experience' are not only useless, but do not even exist. Let that sink in. . . . Now let's swat the ball. I'm going to hit little pill just about one calendar mile!"

This he proceeded to do in most workmanlike fashion. And to my surprise, so did I! He grinned at me.

"Well, how about it?" he inquired as we followed the balls. "Just drop all the physical things, and get into an entirely new set of surroundings . . . what you got?"

"I—I don't know," I faltered, somewhat bewildered by this point of view.

"I think I do; I've figured it out. What have you got in Central Africa? I mean out of all you do here? You've got something you can use there out of your ability to run a radio, even if there are no radios."

"Patience, principally," I laughed.

"Exactly! That's a good illustration. It's that sort of thing we get out of any of our experiences. As I figure it, there's a kind of squeezed-out residue of intangible quality—moral quality if you want it so—that hasn't anything to do with physical manipulations. It's a sort of general quality, that can be applied anywhere. You mentioned patience. You learn patience from a radio; but you can use it on lots of other things."

"My golf game, for instance."

"Sure! You've got it! You're satisfactory to talk to. That's a very good illustration, too. You learn two sets of things out of golf. You learn the kind of swing to make, and the amount of force to apply, and the effect of different clubs, and what to do in a rough lie, and you get your muscles trained to do certain things—"

WE HAD long ago caught up with our balls, of course, but had stood over them idly, absorbed in our conversation. Thrackleford squinted at the hole, took elaborate aim with his mashie, and attempted a chip shot. The ball bounced in a sprightly fashion at a sharp angle off the toe of his club and snuggled down into the right-hand one of that execrated pair of concrete culverts that guard our sixteenth green.

"Most of them wrong," Thrackleford finished his sentence, and seized his niblick.

I won that hole very easily, which evened the match. After the ensuing tension of getting off another drive had been relieved, Thrackleford continued:

"Now that sort of training, painfully acquired, you can use only where there are golf courses. But also you may, if you play the game right, acquire other things. You can get the faculty of keeping your temper in adversity; or a fundamental and rigid honesty in keeping your medal

To Men and Women who think they can write—

Friendly criticism proves nothing

When your friends say nice things about your writing ability, don't you often suspect them of just trying not to hurt your feelings? Don't you often wish that you could get a really impartial opinion from an authority?

You can—through the N. I. A.

The Newspaper Institute is an organization of trained New York newspaper men approved as a correspondence school under the laws of the State of New York. Its purpose is two-fold: First—to offer men and women with literary or journalistic ambitions a thorough New York newspaper training—that invaluable experience which is the foundation on which so many famous authors, dramatists and business leaders have built their success.

Second—to examine applicants to determine whether training will be worth their while.

Send for and fill out the fascinating Writing Aptitude Test originated by the Newspaper Institute. It's a challenge to that latent ability in you, issued by keen, trained newspaper minds. You'll get a thrill out of tackling it. And what you do with it will be read, edited and criticized by N. I. A. editors just as if you had submitted it for publication. You learn, without favoritism or prejudice, just what your prospects are.

No strings attached to this offer. It costs nothing; and obligates you to nothing. Coupon is for your convenience.

score—to mention two merely. Now, those things you can use where there are no golf courses. A fellow can be a good sportsman in almost any circumstances."

"And it's those things you can take with you when you die!" I cried in sudden enlightenment.

"And only those things," he supplemented. "How much one takes depends on how much he's got of them out of the things he's done. Perfectly simple. A man can be a whale of a good golf player without being a good sportsman, you know," he reminded me.

I looked down with complete calm at the rottenest lie a ball ever rolled into, and experienced a self-conscious glow over the thought that I was piling up eternal riches when I did not bewail my fate. As though in especial recognition—or perhaps because, in my preoccupation over what my companion was telling me, I did not think too much about the shot—my midiron picked it out clean and sent it almost as far as to catch up with Thrackleford's drive.

"Peach!" said Thrackleford. "Now, our bodies, speaking in general, are merely mechanisms corresponding to what faculties we possess, aren't they? Speaking roughly, we have bodies that enable us to do things in our environment. We can do things because we've got quite a few inner faculties. As fast as we develop new faculties we get better bodies. We've got a lot better bodies than the amœbas have. That's a simple proposition. Well, as I figure it, that's what was the matter with me. I had just the kind of body over there, where I was when I was dead, that corresponded with the faculties I had developed—the intangible faculties, I mean. What I had got out of experience, outside of mere skills and expedients. Follow me?"

"My mind is simple and dazed," I assured him; "but I get that."

"All right. That, then, as I figure it, was why I was so weakish and lumpish. . . . You've got a good lie this time. Let's see you lay her dead."

But I did not immediately address the ball. In fact, I believe I made contemptuous dismissing remarks about the ball.

"WHAT happened next?" I urged him. "This is the most interesting thing I ever heard! Was anybody else there?"

"I'll try to tell you," he replied, "though I do not think it will be very easy to give you an idea. You must remember, in the first place, that I really hadn't brought along enough of what we call those intangible realities—those distilled essences of my efforts in life—to deserve a first-class body. The body I had exactly corresponded to what I had brought; no more, no less. Just as my physical body was the shape of what I contained as a physical being; so this was what I contained of the eternal verities. Consequently, I hadn't many senses, simply because I hadn't many faculties; so of course I was only dimly aware, and that in very confused manner. In the second place, naturally, my recollection is none too good.

"But here's how it seemed to me:

"First of all I had a comforting conviction that I could never be annihilated. There I was; temporarily inactive, but convinced of the fact that somehow, sooner or later, I would participate in whatever there was; and I knew there was something to participate in. There was an environment. I couldn't become cognizant of it, because I hadn't the proper development of body to possess senses that would take it in. No equipment. I was like a baby. The baby has eyes, but he looks straight at things and really doesn't see them. That's just what I was: a spiritual baby, with a baby's body and a baby's undeveloped senses.

"It came to me with rather a shock of illumination that my appreciation of even this much was due solely to the fact that I had got something spiritual out of my earth life. At least I had, even if in rudimentary form, some senses in my new body. This primitive type of perception was one of them. You see, perception was actually one of my new senses, as sight is with us. And I realized with a kind of cold, sinking feeling that if I hadn't brought over even that much I'd probably be unconscious—perhaps really dead for all I know—or perhaps just dormant, like a seed, waiting for something to germinate me. What could germinate me? Something helping me outside myself? . . . I don't know. I rather think it must be something, however feeble, within myself. Perhaps even the most worthless of us do accomplish enough for that."

He paused and chuckled.

"I had to laugh at myself. I had to laugh at myself; and that seemed to bring a gleam of light too. I'd used another sense, and by its use I realized that I possessed it."

"Don't quite see," I objected.

"I don't quite see myself," he agreed. "But so it was. The ability to laugh in just that kindly, understanding fashion is a spiritual sense all right. It softens struggle and effort; makes them more natural and palatable. Anyway, I wished I'd done more of it. I felt that if I had, I'd see better, somehow.

"NOW that was only two simple things I'd done. But just the doing of these seemed to inspire me with a great urge of energy, and desire to go ahead doing things. I used to know a man who suffered a stroke of paralysis. All he could move was two fingers in his left hand. Instead of getting discouraged, he said to himself: 'Well, all right; I'll move these two fingers.' So he did: and by and by he found he could move the next finger. To-day he's almost as good as ever.

"That's the way I felt. I got a sudden glowing conviction that if I exercised what faculties I had, I'd speedily develop more faculties; and that gave me a feeling of tremendous inrushing vitality, as though I had sprung a leak. Gosh! I had a strong urge to get at it, and an eager interest as to the results when I did get at it! It was like the times you step off at rail head, and the Indian is waiting in the canoe on the float, and the lake stretches out into the milky distance where the spruce closes in, and then starts the Trail—you know!"

"I can imagine," I agreed.

"Only a thousand times more so," he supplemented. "It was great! I almost

Mellin's Food A Milk Modifier

Cow's milk contains all the nutritive elements necessary for maintenance and growth. If these elements were in the same proportions as in human milk and of the same character and as digestible, cow's milk as delivered to the household could be substituted for human milk with the assurance of successful results and the matter of the artificial feeding of infants would need no further thought.

However, while all the essential food elements are present in cow's milk, there is a marked difference in relative proportions, in physical character and in digestibility as compared with human milk and for these reasons cow's milk must be modified before it can be applied successfully as nourishment for the bottle-fed baby.

The purpose of Mellin's Food is to adjust these differences and this purpose is accomplished by following the plan which directs the use of Mellin's Food as a milk modifier.

The plan is a practical one, for the entire day's feeding may be prepared in a few minutes by simply dissolving Mellin's Food in water and then adding milk.

They can fight sore throat all day!

Gargling alone is not enough!

Sore throat demands continuous treatment!

GERM-LADEN schoolrooms. Dangerous weather . . . Danger of grippe, influenza, tonsilitis!

Physicians now say: To cure sore throat an occasional gargle is not enough. You should fight sore throat all day long!

With Formamint the throat is kept continuously bathed in an antiseptic of proved germicidal power. Yet Formamint cannot harm the delicate throat tissues.

And children like Formamint. Let them take one of these tablets every hour or so to treat sore throat; every two or three hours to help prevent it. All druggists.

Doctors endorse it

Formamint

THE GERM-KILLING THROAT TABLET

One Drop

Stops most painful corn in 3 seconds

HERE is a new and totally different way to treat a corn or a callus. One drop stops all pain. You wear tight shoes, walk, dance, in comfort, instantly and at once. Acts like a local anaesthetic; really amazing.

Then soon the corn shrivels and loosens. You peel it off with your fingers, like dead skin. No more dangerous paring.

Works alike on any corn or callus, no matter where it is, how old or how painful. Ask your druggist for "Gets-It." You will be delighted.

forgot I was so weakish and lumpish that I couldn't see a thing or know a thing, not even how to take one step forward."

"But didn't you see anything, or touch anything?" I insisted. "Were you just suspended out in space?"

"No," he hesitated, "not that. I was in an environment."

"What kind of an environment?"

"I corresponded with it poorly," he explained. "It was a place of beauty, and great vitality, and endless possibility, and infinite and personal humanity, and friendly helpfulness—I suppose that answers your question as to whether anybody else was there—and a certain simplicity—"

"Yes, but what was it like?" I interrupted.

"I'm telling you all I could sense. I hadn't earned anything more."

I digested this a moment.

"Humph!" I grunted. "Cheerful outlook!"

"It seemed quite cheerful; in fact, inspiring and highly desirable—even to me. And I was worse equipped than many, I imagine. There is no real reason why I should have been so blind, no reason at all, except that I hadn't had sense enough to get me an outfit. I'd done the way a lot of us do, I suppose—just postponed. 'Time enough when we get there' idea. The sudden realization of that is really what brought me back, I suppose."

"How come?" I inquired.

"WHY, I felt ashamed of myself; I was mortified! Here was I, an old hand at the exploring game, absolutely afoot in a strange country! And I had the rottenest sort of an outfit! I was ashamed to be starting out with such an outfit. I was a dazed and helpless immigrant; and I had always prided myself on my ability to take care of myself anywhere.

"And I'd known I was coming: everybody knows he is coming. I wouldn't take a fishing trip over Sunday so poorly equipped. Lord, I was just plain ashamed of myself! Stupid! Silly! Worse than those slobs who start out with low shoes and a cotton blanket and everything essential forgotten, so that all the old-timers have to pool in to fit them out, just so they won't perish! I'd cussed those fellows out enough in my time, and here I was in the same fix! . . . You thinking of hitting that ball between now and sundown? I'm going to lick you these last two holes."

"In a minute," I waved this aside impatiently. "What next?"

"I felt so humiliated that I became obsessed with one thing—a consuming regret that I hadn't a better outfit; I could see plainly enough that I might have had it. That regret was so keen that it must have got some sort of response. Somebody said—no, nobody said—it was like it was before when I was pronounced 'successfully dead'—it was borne in on me in some inner fashion. It seemed as if someone said, 'Let's give him a new start.'

"And at that I seemed to come zigzagging down like an autumn leaf, and the first thing I knew I was lying in bed, and a lot of scared and excited people were doing things to me, and chattering about an inexplicable and marvelous resuscita-

"How I got the job that 34 others were seeking"

THIRTY-FIVE men applied for the position as Advertising Manager of a big department store in New Orleans. But Sam D. Reeks was selected above all these other men because he was trained.

He says: "My I. C. S. course enabled me to put my facts before the proprietor of this business in such a way as to prove that I knew what I was talking about. I was just as well equipped to discuss his advertising with him as if I had been at the work for years and years."

Mr. Reeks was given the position—and he made good in a big way after he got it—because his International Correspondence Schools course had prepared him to take advantage of his Opportunity when it came. Just a few years ago he was elected president of the Advertising Club of New Orleans—another tribute to his personality and ability.

Why don't you study, as Mr. Reeks did, and prepare to get a better position and a larger salary? You can do it if you really try.

At least make the start by marking and mailing the coupon printed below and find out what the I. C. S. can do for you. It doesn't cost you a penny or obligate you in any way to get the facts, but that one simple little request may be the means of changing your whole life. "Do it now."

Won't you follow the doctor's advice?

8 out of 10 advised Nujol type of treatment

IF you suffer from constipation—even if it's only occasionally—you will find that Nujol is the safe corrective. That is why such a large proportion of physicians advise its use. Among several thousand doctors recently interviewed on this important question, seven out of ten condemned the continued use of laxatives and cathartics as injurious, habit-forming, irritating and inflaming to the intestinal tract, weakening its natural function.

But Nujol may be taken at any time by any person. "It is the most natural aid to normal activity of the bowels," said one doctor. "In chronic constipation Nujol type of treatment is especially successful," said another.

Because

1. A lubricant is better than a laxative
2. Nujol is not habit-forming
3. It's a more natural method
4. Does not cause distress
5. It is non-irritating
6. Nujol gives lasting relief

Nujol acts entirely differently from cathartics. It contains no drugs, no medicine. Its action is mechanical. It merely softens the dried waste matter in the intestines and lubricates the passage so that the muscles of the intestines can expel the waste matter regularly, naturally and thoroughly.

Nujol appeals to the medical man because it is a simple, scientific and safe remedy for constipation no matter how severe the case may be. It is gentle in its action and pleasant to take. Children love it.

Get a bottle of Nujol from your druggist today. Doctors advise it for constipation whether chronic or temporary.

tion, and all that sort of thing. I didn't say much, but I knew the explanation. It wasn't so confounded inexplicable. I had come back for a better outfit, and glad of the chance. The next time I die," concluded Thrackleford earnestly, "I'm going to do it with some savior faire."

"That's the most extraordinary vision I ever heard of!" I exclaimed.

"Vision nothing! I was dead, I tell you. And that's all I know about 'Heaven.' But it's one fine country, and I'm going to explore it, and I'm going to make a better start than I did last time!"

I STARTED to say something, but was interrupted by a rough and sarcastic voice. I looked up in surprise to find a caddie addressing me. He was a hobbledehoy who occasionally came out from the city. I never approved of him. He is too old to be a caddie, anyway. He's cross-eyed and has command of a silent but potent contempt; and he has no manners at all for anybody who does not shoot in the eighties.

"Say," he observed witheringly, "are youse guys going to stay in your trance, or what? We been yelling fore at you for the last hour!"

I glanced up hastily to discover the lady champion and three others waiting in attitudes of exasperation and impatience about a hundred yards away. Behind them, as far as the eye could reach were others at spaced intervals.

"Good lord!" I cried, "the women have caught up with us!"

I topped my ball miserably. I never can play when I feel that somebody is right behind me, waiting. Thrackleford hit a long, sweet one with his brassie. He seemed quite unperturbed.

"That, as I was saying, accounts for my peculiar game. Just as I couldn't take over there any of my dinky little skills and expedients; so I couldn't bring back here anything but sort of a general feeling of things, as you might say, and not intellectual ideas."

"Don't quite follow you," said I.

"Why, don't you see: I'm rotten at the short game where I have to think what I'm doing—how much or how little steam to put in it, and just how much to strike under the ball, and all that small, dinky, finicky, fine stuff. But a full stroke is not a matter of thinking about it. It's a matter of rhythm and timing and—well, it's a matter of how the swing feels!"

"Yes, that's right," I agreed.

"You don't have to think of distance, or holding back, or letting out. It's a full stroke. Well, being dead didn't help me on short strokes where I had to think; but it did on the long strokes, where I simply had to know the feel of them. That's one of the big feelings Over There."

"What?" I asked, puzzled.

"Free, wide, and handsome," he explained.

He took the last two holes—and I had began to think I was going to win a match at last! It was most annoying, and I was thoroughly chagrined. It was all due to those women; I never can play when they are right at my heels. Or perhaps I'd have to die to improve my game. At any rate, I am afraid I did not add to my outfit for eternity. But I got an idea.

Is College Worth Four Years Out of Your Boy's Life?

don't misunderstand me," he went on. "I am not decrying universal education. None of us can get too much education—provided it is that kind of education best fitted to us as individuals. But men are not alike, whereas our traditional college training courses are very much alike. We are making the mistake of assuming that education can be obtained only in colleges, and that a college diploma is good for everybody.

"The other day a baby boy was born in a certain home. The first thing the father did was to go to his bank and deposit one hundred dollars to the infant's account.

"'He is going to be a college man,' the father explained, and named his own alma mater as the institution to be attended by his son, adding, 'That one hundred dollars starts a fund for his college education.'

"Eighteen years in advance, and yet there wasn't a question in the father's mind! Ability, mentality, natural preferences, tastes, what these might be in the boy eighteen years hence wasn't considered. The father was a college man; the boy was to be a college man. As well might he have assumed the boy was going to wear the same size of hat.

"There is a mother with two boys, the older twelve and the younger brother ten. The older boy is slow-witted, slow to learn, and a year behind in his classes at school. His brother is almost an opposite type, bright, quick, well up in his studies. But no distinction is to be made in their future education: both boys are going to college. Already the money has been laid aside and the college chosen.

"There are ten times ten thousand fathers and mothers like these, to whom college has become the educational panacea. The question, 'Should Jack go to college?' is not answered by tests of fitness, but by tests of the bank book and earning capacity. The most standardized bit of advice relative to boys in America has become, 'By all means, send him to college if you can afford it.' And the army of those who can afford it, or who find means to afford it, increases each year by the thousands.

"THE great tragedy is in the result. Here on my desk is a report from a famous old institution. Only 33 per cent of the students enrolled have been graduated with their class. Eventually, 38 per cent have been graduated. In a word, 62 out of every 100 students enrolled in that college in recent years have failed to complete the courses. They have gone from college disappointed, disillusioned, some of them embittered, with shattered confidence in self at an age when self-confidence should be highest. And they have gone back to homes in which there is heartbreak, disappointment and broken hope, and where the efforts of years have brought forth only trouble. You hear no outcry. There is silence in these homes; but the tragedy is real, nevertheless "Every college in this land, at the end of every session, sends back to our homes these boys. A few of the oldest, most firmly established universities claim a loss of only ten per cent; but this loss mounts to sixty per cent, and even higher, in many a state university. Nor do the figures include those uncounted thousands of boys who are rejected by the college before admission; nor the additional thousands who, though they have been graduated, have simply wasted four precious years, and received no benefit commensurate with the time given and the money spent.

"There is probably no other career, surely I know of none, for which men are so definitely prepared, and in which there is such an appalling proportion of failures! The fault can't be entirely with our schools, unless all that the ages have taught us about teaching is wrong. Then it must be with the boys, and with us—in that we are sending too many of the wrong kind of boys to college!"

I TALKED with Doctor Faunce in the big, comfortable office which Brown University provides its "prexy." Just across the street was old University Hall, built in 1770, and used as a barracks during the Revolution by the French troops under Count Rochambeau. The age-stained college chapel was close by, on beyond it the campus, the "gym," and farther away the football field on which Brown's "Iron Men" of 1926 had won glory. Here were the dormitories, the "frat" houses, the hatless students, traditions. Doctor Faunce embraced it all in a wave of his hand.

"This, any college," he continued, "is the 'plant' of a great corporation. We have millions of dollars invested here. To use the language of the street, knowledge is our primary output. Students and parents should devote at least as much time to investigating what we have to offer before they decide to buy as the average man does to investigating the suitability of a house or an automobile.

"Students come here without the slightest conception of what college is all about. Many of them are as much at a loss as the man who went into a jewelry shop to buy a pipe wrench. As an example: Several weeks ago I received a letter from a young man in New Jersey. He said he was eager to come to Brown, but was unable to pay his tuition.

"'However,' he added, 'I am an excellent tennis player. Wouldn't it be possible to grant me a scholarship on the strength of my tennis?' And he went on to detail the various championships he had won on the tennis court.

"Out of curiosity I made inquiry of his high-school principal, who replied: 'There are about three hundred pupils in this boy's class, and I would say that two hundred and ninety of them are better prepared for college than he is.'

"Then there is the boy who comes to college for the social prestige it will give him. He wants to be known among his acquaintances as a college man. He wants to wear a fraternity pin, become a member of the university club, and be a host to his friends at the big annual football games. Often the fraternities do not want him and, his incentive for college gone, he quits in disgust. Still more frequently he fails

For HEAVY-DUTY Pavements

There are more than 47,000 miles of concrete road in the United States. The same qualities that have made concrete the most economical and popular road surface have made it the preëminent street pavement of today. Write for our booklet which tells about concrete streets—Portland Cement Association, Chicago.

CONCRETE—one basic material of our modern civilization—having proven its utility for homes, skyscrapers, warehouses, bridges, farms and roads, is also demonstrating its superiority as a city street pavement.

Concrete is the modern street—rugged and durable under the pounding of heavy trucks—clean and even-surfaced for the smooth-flowing traffic of great boulevards—economical and beautiful in residential sections and suburban towns.

Maintenance is built into the concrete street. This means that it is always open—always in service. Yet necessary patching when concrete must be cut through is accomplished easily and quickly—leaving no evidence that the surface has ever been disturbed.

in the classroom, because the classroom is trying to give him something he doesn't want. Colleges are not training schools for society, but for life.

"Some seek a college diploma as a commercial asset. They reason that the very fact they are college graduates will give them higher standing and larger salary in the business world. They may or may not be right, but again they fail in an understanding of the college. A diploma is not merely a receipt for tuition paid and time put in: it is a certificate of knowledge earned. If knowledge has not been earned, the diploma is of no more value than a pretty scrap of paper, a fact which the world of business is quick to discover.

"A MAN should have a certain capacity and a certain taste for college. By capacity I do not mean mental brilliance necessarily, but mentality in the world of thought as well as of action. A youth whose one desire is to get out and touch elbows with the practical isn't going to thrive on a diet of theory. The college might awaken one's desire for understanding, but it can't furnish such desire where it is lacking.

"A case I recently heard of is illustrative. A successful lawyer whose three elder sons had gone into business decided that his youngest son must become a lawyer. It was a matter of personal vanity with him.

"The boy failed to finish in a private school. He was sent to another. There, by dint of summer study under a tutor, he was able to graduate and pass a college entrance examination. Five years he was in college, dragging along at the foot of his classes, studying in the summer, his father's will alone holding him to a grind which he utterly disliked. At twenty-five years of age the young man entered law school, where he put in another three years. At last he was admitted to the bar, his mind filled with a mass of learning by rote, but as empty of understanding as a bowl turned upside down.

"Not long ago his father died. Six months later, the son, now thirty, closed the paternal law offices into which he had been admitted for practice, and closed them for good. He sold the law books, gave away the furniture. To-day he is a salesman in his eldest brother's business and, I am told, an excellent salesman. But is he any better off for his eight years in the university—eight years sliced literally from his life?

"'Oh, but that case is exceptional!' you object.

"No, the sad fact is that it isn't exceptional. There are hundreds of just such men in our colleges, without capacity or taste or desire for what the college has to offer. They learn, like a parrot, by rote. They falter and stumble through a blurred maze, their one wish to get done with college and get away from it. Often they fail, but the lash of home discipline sometimes drives them through. To what? For one, I seriously question if the value of what the college has managed to cram into them is equal to the value of those four or more years they have given out of their lives.

"Finally, and perhaps saddest of all, is the boy who comes to college with an honest, earnest desire to learn, only to discover, after a semester or two, that the kind of learning he seeks is not the kind the college has to give. At least, his present interest is not in college subjects, or it may be in only one or two of a dozen subjects.

"Let me mention a single example, a bright, eager, ambitious young man whose great love was for things mechanical. He liked motors, and especially automobile and airplane motors. It was his joy to get into overalls, to get some grease on his hands, and to tear down motors and rebuild them; to invent and to devise in the field of practical mechanics.

"Somebody told him he should go to college, and he enrolled in the regular course. He hadn't been in college two months before he realized that something was wrong, either with himself or with the college. Instead of studying motors, he was studying mathematics, and the most abstruse kind of mathematics. He was expected to delve into the foundations of philosophy, to study theories of government, and to master an ancient language. There were a thousand facts he had to know, and none of them, so far as he could see, had a thing to do with motors.

"He lost interest. He dropped behind in his class. His fingers itched for a monkey wrench and the 'feel' of metal. But his father had gone to some trouble to send him to college. The folks at home were talking proudly of him. To quit would mean disgrace, so he wearily worked on to complete the grind which he hated.

"In his second year he failed so badly that the college had no choice except to dismiss him. He had come with high hope and confidence. He left with bowed head. In the general classification of why students fail he was probably entered under the heading, 'Lacking in mental ability.' But he didn't lack ability; his ability was simply outside the ordinary college field.

"Insufficient preparation is often a reason for failure, but that can be remedied if the student is of the proper type and wants to remedy it. Ill health, in the student himself or at home, misfortune at home, financial reverses—these must be included among the causes for college boys' quitting. But pass over these as incidental to the main theme—by showing you what the college is not, and what it cannot supply, I have been trying to give you some idea of what it is and what it does supply.

"TO SUM UP: Money, opportunity, and the mere ability to obtain an entrance certificate or pass an entrance examination are not tests of college fitness, nor is the desire of a parent for a college-trained son any evidence of the son's fitness. Colleges do not confer degrees for athletic prowess. Their aim is not to grant badges of social and commercial prestige. They do not create capacity for understanding, but demand it. They are not designed for the purely practical-minded, nor for the youth who desires merely to do, rather than to think and comprehend.

"'Then,' you ask, 'what does college seek to do for a student? What should he seek in the college classroom?'

"As I told our Brown students a few years ago, the young man who enters college should come seeking two main things: first, horizon, and, second, mastery. Those two things the college endeavors to give.

Have you a

"YELLOW MASK"?

BE ABSOLUTELY frank with yourself.

Look in your mirror. If your teeth have a yellowish color, be it even faint, they are unlovely. Enamel is a brilliant ivory white—yours included.

"I brush my teeth," you protest. "Why can't they be white?"

Because only now has dental science successfully found the means of embodying in a pleasant, tasty tooth paste the one substance that will remove that unsightly yellowish tint.

This substance is known as "Tri-Calcium Phosphate." Foremost dentists use it for cleaning teeth; yours, too, no doubt. And you know what a miracle of beauty he works with it.

Of course, this substance can't scratch or harm the softest tooth surface—or your dentist would never use it.

The name of the dentifrice with this marvelous "Tri-Calcium Phosphate" formula is ORPHOS Tooth Paste. Your druggist has it now.

Says one dentist who uses ORPHOS in his chair: "8 out of 10 patients ask what it is, stating that they have never had their teeth feel so absolutely clean and smooth after a cleaning." If one usage does this, visualize the teeth beauty awaiting you using it morning and night! Exchange your "yellow mask" now for teeth with the sheen of polished pearls. Don't wait. Buy a tube of ORPHOS today—or mail coupon for generous 20-Time Tube.

"Most of us enter college with an experience that is real but extremely limited. We have lived in our own back yard and seldom looked over the fence. To enlarge that horizon until it covers all lands and centuries, until it covers the great domains of literature, science, history, philosophy, and art, is the first object of college training. To know something of everything!

"The other main object is to give the student mastery of some one subject. Breadth of horizon is not enough—a man may be so broad that he is flat. There is no intellectual joy quite so great as the sense of having mastered some one corner of the world's knowledge. To know everything of something, and so master it, ought to be the second great aim of college training.

"Now, let prospective students realize that these are the two objectives; let parents realize them, and then let both come to some reasonable conclusion as to the student's taste, his capacity and real intentions before sending him to college.

"Also, let us get out of the notion," Doctor Faunce added, "that the college is the one and only road to a worthy education. Some of our outstanding leaders in politics, and some of our best informed and best educated men in business and industry and finance, have gained their knowledge many miles from college halls. There are dozens of great editors and writers who were never in college.

"To-day we have countless trade and technical schools of unquestioned merit, and schools which specialize in intense training for some one field of endeavor. Our large banks are giving their clerks opportunity and incentive for study. Large industrial enterprises now maintain schools for the education of employees. There are the Y. M. C. A. classes, the night schools in every city, the correspondence schools. Last, but among the most important, we have our college extension courses, through which both young and old may study those phases of college work in which they have a direct and earnest interest.

"THE self-educating man or woman has the advantage, at the very outset, of being able to pick and choose according to individual needs and likings. The man who works by day and gives up his leisure to study at night is not going to devote effort to studies that bore him, and over which he wonders, as the college boy often does, as to the 'good of it.' Experience in the actual field of endeavor has taught him what he lacks and needs. Therefore, his goal is definite; he is driving straight through toward the end he seeks; he is wasting no motion.

"By no means is it a disgrace not to be of the college type; that is, of the type for which college is designed. Not every man is suited to be a lawyer, or a doctor, or a minister, or a machinist, or a miner. Then why should we believe that every boy born under the sun, with enough money to pay his tuition, or enough industry to work for it, is suited to be a college student?

"College means a serious undertaking. To it must be given four or more of the best years of life, years devoted to serious, difficult study; years of companionship with books and scholars; years of trying to understand. The campus, the fraternity, the athletic field, the dance, are but incidentals to the job. The main task is work—work with books which reveal to us the long human story, the successes and failures of science, art, government, and religion.

"We must not forget, however, a new experiment which is now being made at some of our best high schools—the addition to the high school, or academy, of a two-year college course, a so-called "Junior College." Scores of these junior two-year colleges have become established in various parts of our country in recent years, and with success. Many a student who has not the time, or the means, or the persistence, to go through a four-year course is finding just what he needs at a junior college, and the overcrowded universities are relieved. Yet some of our best students need something quite different.

"'MY BOY must be queer,' a father told me; 'he doesn't like college.'

"In this standardized age, what we need are 'queer' men. Give us more of them! Men who dare to be different, who dare to question, who dare to get from the beaten path and blaze new trails of their own! If we had more men who had courage enough to investigate themselves, and then, in spite of everything, to be themselves, we should all be better off and happier. What we call the revolt of youth may be the salvation of age."

"Just how," I asked Doctor Faunce, "can we investigate ourselves on this question of college fitness? How can a boy determine for himself, or a parent or teacher determine for him, whether his greatest benefit will come through four years at college."

"First of all," was his reply, "the boy should investigate the college. He should find out clearly what the college has to offer. Then he should search his own mind and his own desires in the matter, and set the college program side by side with his own. He should seek competent advice: possibly from a trusted teacher honest enough to speak the truth though the truth hurts; possibly from a business man into whose employ he might have the chance to go; possibly from his father; and, if he still doubts, let him go to some source directly connected with the college.

"Suppose he decides against college and goes to work, only a year later to discover he has made a mistake. Suppose that year in the world convinces him of his need of college training and of his own fitness for it. College is still open to him, just as eager to embrace him as he is to embrace it. And he will be more likely to profit by it than if he went blindly and in doubt.

"Suppose, again, he should decide that of a dozen college subjects his interest is in but one. He isn't interested in Latin or Greek, or in philosophy or government or biology; but he is keenly interested in mechanical devices of all kinds. My advice to him, in that case, would be to seek some technical school, where he could specialize; or to take advantage of a college extension course in engineering; or even to employ a private teacher. The first object of college training, as I pointed out, is horizon. The boy not concerned about that object doesn't belong in college.

"No one could make Stradivarius violins by mass production"

Thomas A. Edison now answers a questionnaire

FROM his laboratories Thomas A. Edison has from time to time issued questionnaires. Now, he has consented to become the interrogated—has agreed to lay bare his half-century of effort to give the world perfect Re-Creation of music.

In plain, untechnical words, Mr. Edison here tells how he has made a marvelous musical instrument with all the painstaking care and individual detail of a Stradivarius Violin.

The questions asked Mr. Edison were:

Ques. Do you take advantage of the economies of mass production in the making of your phonograph?

Ans. I consider the New Edison Phonograph a musical instrument and not a machine to be made in the manner of automobiles, cheap furniture or other things in which uniform quality is not a prime essential.

Ques. Isn't it possible to make instruments of standard quality by mass production?

Ans. No greater proof of the fallacy of this, as far as phonographs and other musical instruments are concerned, can be offered than the vain efforts of violin manufacturers to make violins of Stradivarius quality by mass production. For although every part of the instrument may be exactly alike as to size, unless there is the individual human touch, there is bound to be a variation in tone quality.

Ques. How can the layman tell the difference between a phonograph made by mass production and one made by craftsmen?

Ans. Anyone is apt to be satisfied with existing conditions until he hears something better; may even excuse distorted tone for want of a superior instrument. But when an ordinary phonograph turned out in quantity is compared side by side with one in which human hand work has played its part, the glaring difference instantly is apparent.

Ques. What do you consider the truest test of phonograph quality?

Ans. There is no measure of tone quality like the human ear. For this reason I urge comparison between the New Edison and other phonographs. To this end, I have advised every Edison dealer to place—without obligation to the prospective buyer—the New Edison in any home where comparison with other types of phonographs is desired.

Ques. How would you describe the tone of the New Edison Phonograph?

Ans. It is sheer nonsense to speak of the tone of a phonograph or of its resonance. A phonograph should have no tone of its own. The instrument should be only a medium of Re-Creation. Obviously you should be unconscious of it and hear only the beautiful music it Re-Creates.

I worked for five years and spent more than $3,000,000 in experimental work to remove any false tone from the New Edison. Even when I, myself, was satisfied with the results I did not stop there. I insisted that the New Edison be submitted publicly to the test of side by side comparison with living artists whose performances had been recorded. Exacting music critics could detect no difference between living and Re-Created performance. ★

Like a Craftsman of some old world guild; like Stradivarius in his workshop, Edison craftsmen individually make each New Edison Phonograph.

Why There NEVER Can Be a Better Phonograph

After all, the phonograph serves but one purpose—to Re-Create voice or instrument with human reality. When a phonograph does this, nothing more can be asked—it has reached perfection.

That the New Edison Phonograph achieves this is fact—not theory nor hopeful expectation. During more than 5,000 tests in Carnegie Hall, New York, Symphony Hall, Boston and in other noted music centers, side by side tests were made with living artists who sang or played before a critical public in direct comparison with the New Edison Phonograph.

Eminent musical critics who attended these tests found it impossible to detect the living voices or instrumental performances, from the New Edison Re-Creation. Thus it was proved that the New Edison Re-Creates with literal fidelity and in a way that baffles the keenest ear in the effort to detect the living performance from the Edison Record.

Hear the New Edison Phonograph today at your nearest Edison dealer's—also get him to play one of the Edison 40-minute records—the inventor's latest achievement—a record no larger than the usual short playing record which permits you to enjoy without interruption a complete concert on one double-faced record.

The New Edison has always sold by comparison—compare it yourself with any other phonograph and let your own ears decide.

"There are some specific questions the boy might answer. They are such as I would ask a boy if he came to me entertaining the thought of going to college. I don't pretend the questions are all-conclusive. In a sense, they are merely suggestive, and based only on my own personal thought in the matter. They should be supplemented by advice, and the advisers should keep a certain danger in mind; namely, that the boy may have the capacity for college training, though his desire for it may be dormant. If so, it is the duty of college to awaken that desire, and possibly the college will be able to do so to the boy's profit. But dormant desires must not be confused with lack of desire, nor the latter with the former.

"I WOULD ask:

"First: Do you like to study (not merely read) about an interesting subject? Can you shut yourself up with a book which others find interesting, and get a clear idea of what it is all about? Do you like to deal with ideas as well as with things?

"Second: Do you like to study a foreign language, to read or speak it? Would you enjoy spending the next two years in trying to master, for example, French or Italian?

"Third: Do you enjoy studying the history of America, or any other country? Do you relish reading the lives of great men, and their achievements? Would you like to spend a year in learning how the chief modern nations grew up?

"Fourth: Do you like to study any kind of science? Would you really care to learn about stars, or atoms, or electrons, or to understand the laws and forces which underlie the building of a steam engine, an automobile, or the growth of a city like Detroit?

"Fifth: Have you the time and patience to study how animal life has developed on the earth? How human bodies grow? How men have united in families and cities and states? How laws are made and governments conducted? Or would such studies only bore you?

"Sixth: Would you care to spend a couple of years in the study of human thinking and feeling? To discuss theories of how the world began and what it means, and what our duties to one another are? Or would the study of philosophy and religion seem to you foolish and useless?

"Seventh: Is it your great desire and ambition to go out and do things, letting others search for the why and wherefore, or would you prefer for the next four years to try to understand the things that others are doing? Is it your great desire at once to make machines, or sell goods, or report for a newspaper, or do something that will yield you good wages; or, on the other hand, are you willing to give four years to patient study of the laws that underlie all machinery, all commerce, all journalism? In short, do you want to make a living or a life?'

"I WOULD ask the boy those questions, giving him time to digest them and seriously to search himself for the true answers; and then," Doctor Faunce concluded, "I would tell him this:

"'To be a successful college student one does not need always a brilliant mind. But one must be hungry, or there is no use in sitting down to a four-year table. Do you really desire to find out the causes of things—of airplanes, or governments, or earthquakes, or the League of Nations? If you have no hunger for study, but only a hunger for other things, then go after such things at once, and pick up your education 'on the side.' But if you are willing to postpone these things for four years while you try to understand the world into which you are going, and how we can make it better, then come to college, and welcome! Come, if you have to borrow every dollar! If you merely want to buy and sell, go where such things are done. But if you want to know the why and wherefore of buying and selling, and living, then it will richly pay you to give those four precious years to finding out.'"

"KEEP Your Ears to the Ground; You May Learn Something" is John G. Lonsdale's personal story. Mr. Lonsdale is president of one of the largest financial institutions in the Southwest, and he traveled to that position "by ear." Next month you will read how, as a young man, he used his ears to "listen in" on expressed commercial needs and then set about meeting them. In pursuing this policy he built a railroad while he was in his early twenties, opened a brokerage office, and put a tottering bank on its feet.

the farm which had been in the family for three centuries, and he and Suzanne bade farewell to their friends and neighbors. Across the seas they ventured, going to Iowa, where Jean Jacques, the thrifty, had purchased a homestead from the United States Government. On this, with the aid of his wife and little sons, he built a log house, enlarging it as the fertile land was brought into bearing and the boys grew bigger and stronger. Despite the cold of the rigorous winters and the hardships that are the pioneer's lot, the Loizeaux family flourished.

Then hard years came. Jean and Suzanne saw their first-born sicken and die. Two children came to them to pass on in infancy. But a few years later, an eleventh child came into being. Well and strong was this last member of the flock, who grew rapidly into a sturdy boy.

"I was that eleventh child," said Mr. Loizeaux, "and I remember clearly and vividly those early days. We had no near neighbors, except the Indians. They were a small tribe, named the Misquaqui, and they had a reputation for ferocity. This ferocity was reserved for defense.

"I remember one morning in winter, when a couple of them came into the house, and sat there without speaking. We knew that, although they would not ask for it, they expected hospitality. And we gave it to them. That same day, my father, driving down the road, saw the heads of two white men impaled upon spikes. It was the work of the tribe. But I am bound to say that these Indians were white to the core. Treat them squarely, and they treated you squarely in return; misuse them as the white people sometimes did, and your head might be found by the roadside. Our farm and our family were never molested.

"My father and mother were Huguenots, and firm believers in God and His personal interest in them and their affairs. Every day began and ended with the reading of the Bible and family prayers. This custom is still observed by me in my own home. Upon that faith our house is built, and on that faith it stands firm.

"THE earliest hardships of the family were over when I arrived in this world. The farm was prospering. My father raised wheat, corn, oats, cattle and hogs, and before many years I was helping. I fed the hogs and cattle, watered them, groomed the horses, shelled corn, and did the thousand and one tasks that fell to the youngest of brothers. Being the tardy last of the flock, my brothers and sisters were all pretty well along in school before I began. My first school was a little log cabin some miles from home.

"Sometimes in the early days of my education this log school was abandoned in favor of a school in the nearby village of Vinton. As I was now a necessary and much-needed factor on the farm—we never had hands enough—my schooling ran just three months each winter: December, January and February, snowy, cold months, when I mounted my horse and plunged through five miles of unbroken roads to the schoolhouse. I have counted it up, and I had just fifty-five months of schooling in my whole life. But, despite the fact that the other boys and girls in my classes attended school eight months of the year to my three, I never missed being promoted. I entered high school with the rest and studied one winter; and then my school life stopped.

"But I kept on reading. And reading has been my greatest enjoyment aside from my family and my work.

"Father intended us all to be farmers. To him, land was the source of life. We were all to marry, settle down, and found a family colony, in the fashion of France. But my brothers and sisters, for

When 12 barrels a day broke the oil market

In any chemist's shop or drug store, your grandfather might have picked up in 1855 a little circular made to look like a greenback. It advertised the "wonderful medical virtues" of Kier's Petroleum Panacea, "... pumped up with Salt Water, flows into Cystern, bottled in its Natural State without any Preparation or Admixture."

On July 4th of that same year, R. T. Crane poured the first metal in his modest brass foundry. There was then no oil industry. The first well was yet to be drilled. Petroleum was merely a cure-all.

Then in 1859, the pioneer Drake well "came in" with twelve barrels a day, promptly breaking the market. Now, daily production averages well over 2,000,000 barrels, and only cracking prevents a serious shortage of motor fuel. The oil industry has traveled far since the "rock oil medicine" days.

So too has Crane. Always abreast of changing requirements, Crane today supplies valves, fittings, and piping materials, in a range of metals and alloys to serve every need from well to filling station.

Your piping problem may be as difficult as handling highly explosive and corrosive vapors, or as simple as controlling running water. In either case, you can benefit from Crane experience and research which has made Crane a synonym for safety, dependability, and economy.

eight of us lived to maturity, were not so willing. To please Father my eldest brother, Charles, started out to be a farmer, but he wound up by becoming a physician. Two other brothers, Paul and Timothy, became publishers of religious tracts, and have been in business in New York for forty-five years. Leon, the next brother, went to Colorado and farmed there. But my three sisters all married city men. One, whose husband was a tea merchant in New York, settled in Plainfield, New Jersey.

"WHEN I arrived at manhood they had all gone," said Joshua Loizeaux. "My parents were getting along in years, and Father needed me. But I wanted to get into business; I also wanted to get married. I had found a girl who, after the first day I met her, was the one girl in the world for me. May I say that, after forty-two years, I feel the same way? We were married when I was twenty-three. My father had given me eighty acres of land, and I farmed it for a living.

"For nine years I farmed, and it looked as if my ambition to be a business man was never going to be gratified. My father died during the year in which I married, and my mother followed him within a few years. The homestead was sold. I had my hands full with my own growing family, for in those nine years four children came to us. But we prospered and made a good living.

"But I was not satisfied. I kept looking for opportunities to go into business. I visited the East and told my sisters of my ambition. When I was thirty-three I received a letter from my brother-in-law who lived in Plainfield. He wrote that he thought there was a chance for me there, as a lumber company which was owned by an elderly man wanted a younger one to take some of the heavy work off his shoulders. The salary was fifteen dollars a week to start.

"It didn't sound like much of an opportunity, but I was keen to accept it. I figured that we could sell the farm for a few thousand if the necessity arose, and we had saved enough to buy a modest home. So, after many conferences, we rented out our farm, and moved to Plainfield.

"My first knowledge of lumber was acquired through buying the materials to erect a home in which to install my family. I found a good lot for eleven hundred dollars, and put on it a house that cost twenty-six hundred. It was more than a home; it was an investment. A few years later I sold it at a profit of seventeen hundred and fifty dollars, and built a second home. I have built five houses and moved from them, selling each time at a profit.

"It isn't particularly difficult to get a start at anything. The other people in the world know that you have to live as well as they, and some of them are likely to give you a chance. To get ahead you have to figure on how you can increase your chances. When I sold lumber, I looked about me. I never missed figuring on anything in prospect. I talked with the housewives, and many a night I brought a contractor to visit some home where the wife was longing for an extra shed, or a back porch. If the contractor got an order, he remembered me as his friend, and I supplied the lumber.

"In a year I considered myself well on the way to being a lumber salesman. But I was far from satisfied with my job. The financial affairs of the firm were at low ebb. The yard was in the center of town, and I wanted to move out upon the edge, where a lower investment in capital would allow more profit. But I was young and inexperienced, and the owners of the yard laughed at me.

"I had to quit offering advice and bide my time. I bought a bicycle, so that I could cover greater distances.

"When I was convinced the firm would never get ahead, I left, and began selling for a New York house on commission. I covered a territory of forty miles on that bicycle, and as I had about two thousand dollars of my own, I managed, when I had an order for half a car of lumber, to buy a whole car, stack the remainder on some vacant lot, and sell it off for my own profit.

"After I had done this for two years and made a little money, my brother-in-law offered to loan me some more, so that I could actually go into business for myself. In December, 1898, I rented a yard, built a shed and made the last bin into an office. It must have been all of eight by sixteen feet. I bought a horse, and that horse was of the greatest importance, for he had to haul the lumber I sold. He cost a great sum for those days, ninety dollars. Mine was literally a one-man and one-horse business for some months."

BUT while Loizeaux had pedaled his bicycle along the roads selling lumber, he had kept both eyes and ears open. One day he watched the men in a competitor's yard unload a carload of cement. The spur railroad track ran along the ground, and from the car floor the bags were carried to wagons and hauled to the warehouse. They would then have to be hauled out and lifted upon the trucks as they were sold. Loizeaux stood there thinking:

"That's an awful waste. If that spur were elevated, the bags could slide down a chute into the shed, and if the shed were elevated they could be shot out right onto a truck. I believe it would save half the time."

"When I got a yard, I put this system in at the first opportunity. I elevated the spur, built the shed about five feet from the ground and unloaded by a chute to the truck. In six months I had saved the additional price of the elevations, and from that time on the gain was mine.

"Then I borrowed a system of unloading gravel. In a nearby city I saw a coal yard that had elevators, from which the coal was shot out to trucks. So I built three elevators, twenty by forty, and arranged an elevated electric bucket to receive gravel shot from the car on the elevated spur. The bucket swings up and fills the tall elevators. On the side of the elevators are doors and a chute, and a truck driver can run his truck under this, open the chute, and fill his truck.

"Eight tons of gravel will flow on a truck in three quarters of a minute. The saving over hand loading is so great I never estimated it.

"At the beginning I had an uphill job. There were already two very large lumber concerns in town; I was a stranger and had little capital and little stock. But I had made a few friends, and I never neglected to follow up my chances. Nothing was too small for us to undertake, nor is it to this day. Why, we do quite a business now supplying wood for boys to make boats, a small thing, of course but—they are my future customers!

"Then, as now, we did everything that could be done to meet people's needs. I carried lumber at night to customers when day labor had stopped, and I unloaded it in their yards myself. I visited the people likely to build homes for themselves, and gave them my advice. I got the contractors and before long I found I could help out on the financing end. That is now a big part of our business. You had better ask my son Charles about it."

I ASKED Charles later. The alert young man nodded.

"Father is president of one building and loan association," he said; "but aside from this, if you want to build, we will arrange your first mortgage; and if you can buy your lot, we will take a second mortgage ourselves. We have helped over two thousand people around here build homes in this way; we arranged for over a million dollars in mortgages last year. Understand, we do not build the houses, the contractors do that; we never compete with the contractors, we just furnish the materials."

It is not strange that Joshua D. Loizeaux's one-horse business increased within a year to a five-horse affair, with a modest profit. In the first five years sixty-five thousand dollars of profit went back into the business. It seemed time to organize. In 1903, the business incorporated under the name of "J. D. Loizeaux Lumber Company," with Joshua D. Loizeaux as treasurer and general manager. Under his direction, the company moved to new quarters.

"I did for myself," said Mr. Loizeaux, "what I had wanted to do for my old company—moved out where the cost of land was cheaper. When I proposed that to my old company they told me, 'You couldn't sell a thousand feet of lumber a year out there.' I sold a good many hundred thousand feet the first day.

"Incidentally, this land, which we bought for $1,700 because it was so far 'out,' sold after sixteen years of profitable use for $20,000 and we moved 'out' again.

"Trying to meet the demands of customers made it necessary for me to carry more than the usual supplies of lumber, cement, gravel, and brick. I began to specialize, in a small way at first, to keep the odd things people seemed to want. This plan has borne good results. We now have a name for supplying almost anything, a matter not built up without hard work.

Of course, our reputation in this respect was built up gradually. I had definite plans in mind, and these plans materialized one by one. For instance, I wanted a hardware store twenty years ago; but I have had it just eighteen months. I had to wait. However, bit by bit I added items to stock as I learned what was needed, until we got to the point where we carried practically everything pertaining to building, even to grass seed for the lawns of the new homes.

"You saw the planing mill in the yard. We put that in because people were not satisfied to take stock patterns. They wanted a window here and a door there.

and the plan of the building made that particular door or window of such proportions that no stock piece would fit it. We have thousands of orders a year for odd sizes. This is not only a profitable venture in itself, but it leads to many other orders. When a woman wants a shelf for her pantry that must be just so wide and long, and we make it to suit her, that woman is likely to speak of us to her relatives and friends. Upon such services we have built the greater part of our business."

I RECALLED one tale of service that had been told me by an old Plainfield resident that had no relation to orders. When the business was comparatively young, the streets of Plainfield were unpaved, and the horse-drawn wagons made a great deal of noise. J. D. Loizeaux heard of a man seriously ill, whose nerves were being affected by the driving of his wagons past the house. There was no other route for the wagons to pursue. He sent a team to Newark to pick up a load of tan bark, hauled it to the street where the man lived and padded the road in front of the house. In those days of slow travel it took the team and men a day to do the work. The invalid recovered, and the tale lives with him.

From its incorporation in 1903, the business prospered steadily, and in 1907 Loizeaux undertook a new venture of some magnitude. He was buying heavily of New Brunswick spruce. The captain of a schooner carrying the wood down the coast suggested:

"Why don't you take a trip up to New Brunswick and look over this lumber in the timber? With the amount you can use it would pay you to own and work the woods, and I can haul for you."

Loizeaux thought it over. He decided to look into the matter, and took his family on a trip North that summer as a vacation. He explored the woods about St. Johns. Timber was cheap. He bought a tract and supervised it, making frequent trips from home during the winter months when the work in the woods was at its height, and incidentally when the yard at Plainfield was having its dullest season.

As the lumberjacks got farther and farther into the woods they found a quantity of rock maple which was too defective, because of its heavy knots, to be used as lumber. Loizeaux immediately set about finding some use for this maple. Finally he struck a man who was selling rock-maple shoe lasts in Northampton, England. A shoe last must be made of the hardest wood, and even then is short-lived. If sixteen shoes can be made on a single last it has served well. Loizeaux negotiated with Northampton, and for ten years rock-maple shoe lasts were shipped there.

In New Jersey there used to be an abundant supply of black walnut.

"Among Jewish shopkeepers in Europe," Mr. Loizeaux told me, "there is a superstition that a one-piece black walnut counter means good luck, and a merchant starting in business is willing to pay almost any price for it. If a man can get a counter thirty inches wide made of a single board of black walnut, with which to start his store, he thinks he is sure of success. So widespread is this superstition that the market is brisk. We sold wholesale to the Hamburg market.

"Incidentally, it was a black walnut tree that nearly cost me my life.

"I was walking about the woods one day, seeing how things were going on, when I got thoroughly chilled.

"'Step out,' I said to one of the workers on a cross-cut, and I jumped into the hole in the snow in which they were working, and took his place. I worked away for some time and then got to thinking of something else, which is a bad business for anyone in a snow hole at the end of a cross-cut saw. The tree jumped the stump before we realized that she was coming, and I was caught. My leg was crushed. They got me out, and when I realized how mangled I was, I ordered the doctor to cut the leg off. My wife wasn't strong, and I didn't want her to know until it was over. The doctor refused. I was taken home and nursed back to health. It took sixteen months. But although I am a little lame, I am glad I have that leg."

"What became of your business during those sixteen months?" I asked. "Your sons were too young to run it then."

"Why, I ran it, of course," said Mr. Loizeaux, "with the aid of a telephone and a pad. Moreover, I was fortunate enough to have in the office a woman of the highest caliber. When I was unable to attend to anything, she took care of it. Miss Wenzel helped me to pull through those sixteen months; and if the business suffered at all it was so little that it was not noticed.

"AFTER I recovered, the business in Plainfield grew and we needed more and more hard woods. We bought tracts on the crest of the Appalachian Mountains on the boundary line between North Carolina and Tennessee, where we cut oak, chestnut and poplar birch. In 1920, anticipating the building that was sure to come, we had thirteen sawmills running."

"Buying those tracts," continued Mr. Loizeaux, "was a move that met with no great approval on the part of our stockholders. A little later, I wanted to move the yard again, and this also met with a great deal of opposition.

"I believed I could trust my judgment. But it was apparent that the others did not think so. So I determined to buy out everyone except a few of our own family. From 1916, when we moved here, the business had been a family affair. My brother-in-law, who loaned me money to start, still remained president, and it was not until 1921 that he retired, and I succeeded to that office.

"I never asked my boys to go into the business. In fact, John, my eldest son, is not with us. When John was sixteen and lacked a year of finishing high school, he visited a friend in New York City. This man was in the linen business. John went into it too. Charles, the next boy, asked to come into the business when he was about fourteen, and in short trousers. He has been a dynamic force ever since. Fred and Harold came with us after their terms of army service. About a year ago, we bought a yard at Elizabeth, called it the Loizeaux Builders' Supply Company, and made Harold manager. I spend a half-day there every day with him. Then, three nephews, Parker, Arthur, and Jock, are with me, so we are quite a family.

"During the last year of the war, and immediately after, I was alone in the business. Three of my sons were in service, Charles and Fred in France, and Harold on this side. Those were two hard years. We had ordered at high prices, and our yards stood full. No one wanted to buy. I have a theory that business can go forward only when the market is met, and that market could be met only at a great loss. I sold that lumber at 80 per cent of what it cost me, with no charge at all for my deliveries, and cleared my yards. My competitors told me frankly that I was foolish, that the market would revive. It did revive, but not at that price. When it came back, I had a full supply on hand at the new low prices, and by the end of the year I had made up the loss and had a substantial profit.

"THEN my boys came back, and it seemed to me that I was suddenly supplied with wings. Things fairly flew, and I didn't have to supply the energy for the flying. My sons and the other boys in my business are far better business men than I ever was. They have better training, and more knowledge than I had to begin with. At present I have more wisdom, and I put that against their youth and pep, and we appreciate each other. One of my 'boys' is not my son, but he seems like one, for he has been with me twenty-three years and is the treasurer of the company.

"In choosing assistants, I have never selected one without inquiring into his home conditions. I determined that I would have about me people of high order, efficient, and possessing the wisdom to appreciate the value of moral standing. Such people think straight, in business and otherwise. The boys in my business are the kind I want as sons; the girls might be my daughters. My best ideas have come from them. About fifteen years ago, our trucks were painted a dark green. We were talking over repainting them, and Miss Ricketts, who is now purchasing agent for the company, said:

"'Why don't we paint them yellow with black trimmings? I believe they would be noticed, and bring us business.'

"We accepted her suggestion. That painting of the trucks was one of the most powerful bits of advertising we have ever done.

"I have enjoyed every moment I have spent in this business," Mr. Loizeaux said. "I want to tell you something that may help to account for that. The other day, a young couple came in here to look over the plans of homes we have in the reception-room. With them came an elderly man, who asked to see me.

"'I don't suppose you remember me,' he said, smiling. 'But you put up my home a good many years ago, at least you made all the arrangements and saw me through. When my daughter was married you put up her house. And that young couple out there are my grandson and his intended, and they are coming to you to see about their home.'

"I felt suddenly the weight of my sixty-five years. But as I peeped out at the young couple, their heads close together over the book of plans, I began to enjoy myself. After all, I don't know any better or happier way I could have spent the most of my years than in helping to build the homes of three generations."

How is the family temper today?

Are the children fretful and listless? Is the Man Who Thinks He's Boss grumpy and irritable? Are you, yourself, unaccountably off color?

Don't be too hard on them—nor on yourself. What if he did eat a lot too much at that banquet last night? What if Business Luncheons are getting to him slowly and surely? What if the children—the imps—do cram all sorts of outrageous foods into themselves? Were you, yourself, able to resist that delicious . . . ah, that makes you blush a little, does it?

Never mind, most of us poor humans are just that way. We make Spartan resolutions. But they are hard to keep! So wise wives and mothers keep Eno in the house—so that Eno can do its share to keep the family temper in order.

For bad temper, grouchiness, petty fretfulness, often result from overindulgence in food and drink or from a sluggish digestive tract. And these effects are likely to disappear pretty rapidly after a glass of Eno. Because of that it has been world-famous for over half a century.

If past experience of saline laxatives makes you hesitant, you will be very pleasantly surprised when you try Eno. Eno tastes good—and is most refreshing. Its sparkling effervescence makes it really enjoyable—every one of you will like it, and feel better for the safe, gentle way in which it overcomes intestinal sluggishness.

Eno, world-renowned for over half a century, from all druggists, 75c and $1.25 a bottle. Prepared only by J. C. Eno, Ltd. Sales Agents: Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Inc., Belmont Building, Madison Ave. at 34th St., New York.

THE FAMILY'S PROBLEMS

It is Easy to Get into a Hole but Hard to Climb Out!

DURING the twelve years of our marriage, my husband has had a raise in salary and a promotion in authority nearly every year. But until a year ago, we could never get out of debt, and of course we could not save anything.

This state of affairs worried us, for we are both college graduates, ambitious, and wished to hold a substantial position in our community, both for our own sakes and for the sake of our children. We often talked the situation over frankly, realizing that the trouble was with our management; but for a long time we seemed unable to put a finger on the weak spot.

"If we could just get a clean start, with all the old debts wiped out, we could live on our income, and save too! It isn't the current expenses that hound us so—it's always having a back debt to pay on!" we would wail to each other.

It is always hard to face the fact that nobody is responsible for the making of your debts except yourself. Nobody in the world can force you to buy anything. Easy credit is often the ruination of a young married couple.

Finally, the head of the house said, "I believe I know where part of the trouble lies: It is the same old story of counting chickens before they are hatched. You recall that last year, when I knew three months before my promotion that I was going to have a raise, I said, 'Now I can have that overcoat I need.' I had already decided that I could do without the overcoat; but now, instead of waiting until the promotion was in effect and the money in hand, I went ahead and blithely charged it."

LOOKING back, I could recall plenty of incidents like that. My husband's business is such that we always know several months in advance when a promotion is scheduled to take place. And, unconsciously, we had always promoted ourselves that much ahead of the actual time!

When we knew six months ahead about the last promotion and raise—a very substantial one—we said to each other, "Now is the time to prove whether or not it is in us to make good. We will strain every effort to get out of debt. Then we can start out on the new salary with a clean slate, and a good chance to get ahead."

For a long while, I had bought groceries, milk, and the like on a cash basis, so we had to concentrate our efforts on department-store accounts, doctors' and dentists' bills, and furniture payments. We made a solemn contract with each other not to charge anything, unless we talked it over together, decided it was absolutely essential, and then waited a week. After the week, if we still thought it necessary, we would go ahead and charge the purchase. And not a single time, after waiting a week, did the proposed purchase seem necessary enough for us to charge it against our future!

I had one hundred dollars in a savings account that I had accumulated from gift money and various house economies. Nobody knew anything about this except myself, and I decided that this was as good an emergency for its use as I would ever have. Remembering what a miserable month January had always been, I put twenty-five dollars of my nest egg into a Christmas Savings Club. This paid me up for six months. The remaining seventy-five dollars I used to buy the absolute necessaries of clothing for myself and the four small children during the spring and summer season.

I made all of our clothes and some of the hats, watched for bargain days in materials, and used every possible economy in accessories. Sewing is not my talent, so the work was real labor for me. Doing without good-looking clothes was also a real privation, because I had always had them and enjoyed looking well. But every time I looked at my homemade frocks and felt inclined to be blue, I would think "So-and-so's bill is paid up and So-and-so's will be next month. We can do it, if we want to badly enough!"

IN THE matter of food, my husband and I adapted ourselves to the children's meals. When they were having bread, butter, jelly and milk for supper, we cheerfully ate the same thing, and added the price of a good steak to our debt fund!

We found out what a good friend the dry-cleaner can be, since his fee saved two old suits that my husband had thought he could not possibly wear again.

We set aside a certain amount each month to be divided around on the different accounts, and as we were not adding to these bills all the time we could soon see an appreciable difference in the sum-total. We were lucky not to have any illness during the six months of our honest efforts to get square. Simple food and simple life reduce the hazards of illness as well as the high cost of living!

This is a statement of our income and outgo under our retrenchment plan:

Salary before recent promotion	$3,000.00
Sum total of debts	461.70
Applied monthly on debts	75.00

Average monthly budget as follows:

Rent	$ 50.00
Groceries, hired help, and all incidentals connected with housekeeping for six people	100.00
Gas, water, lights, telephone	15.00
Life insurance	10.00
	$175.00

As you see, our fixed expenses left us $75 to apply each month on debts. At the end of six months, we had paid every penny except $11.75. This we paid out of our first month's raise of $80. And, best of all, we started banking the seventy-five dollars we had been applying to debts!

You buy the LIQUID -but you use the VAPOR!

WHEN you drive up to a filling station, you ask for "gas." The word is short. It is correct, too, because while you do see so many gallons of liquid gasoline flowing into the tank, it is not the liquid you use. It is the gas—the vapor of gasoline, that produces the power.

The more complete the vaporization of gasoline in the carburetor and manifold, the greater the available power for the engine and the more perfect its action.

The new and better Texaco Gasoline vaporizes perfectly. It forms a dry gas. You get more per gallon and per dollar. The new and better Texaco has a lower boiling point — more easily vaporized. That means quick starts. It has a lower end point—more completely vaporized. It delivers all its power. It distributes evenly. Each cylinder keeps pace with the power of all the others, giving that smoothness, co-ordination and perfect balance—that engine "PEP"—that new Pick-up, Power and Mileage.

If you have not tried Texaco, use up the old gasoline in your tank to the last gallon or so. Then stop for a fill at any Texaco pump. The better results are immediate.

When Gifts mean more than at Christmas

Cord 50c Extra

This business of graduating from school or college is no idle jest, when one has spent so many industrious years for the privilege of embarking under full sail on the voyage of life.

To the Graduate, Gifts on this occasion mean a great deal more than Gifts at Christmas. No relative, no friend worthy of the name should overlook this.

Each Gift should be something that the Graduate will thrill to receive.

The fact that you can scarcely pick up a college publication nowadays without seeing friendly reference to the Parker Duofold indicates, and correctly, that these black-tipped beauties are all the rage among students. For the campus scribes quite naturally echo the preference of the whole school.

Couple this popularity with the fact that Parker Duofold Pen and Pencil barrels are made of Non-Breakable Permanite, instead of rubber as formerly—that the Duofold Point is guaranteed 25 years—that we now make no service charge on Duofold Pens—and you may as well make it unanimous by stepping to the nearest pen counter for this classic writing Duette, in its attractive Gift Box.

While you're at it, pick your Birthday and Wedding Gifts too—or Prizes for Bridge and Golf. This will save returning for them later.

But look with care for the imprint, "Geo. S. Parker." Then nobody will be disappointed.

"The marked improvement in the reproduction of the piano is a most gratifying achievement."
—IGNACE PADEREWSKI.

The piano is really a piano on the New Orthophonic Victrola

FOR years the piano was admittedly the most difficult instrument to record accurately. Reproduced tones never had that full, rounded richness of the piano itself. They were harsh . . . unreal. But the Orthophonic principle of recording and reproducing has mastered this problem . . . definitely!

It brings you piano tones, pure and unchanged . . . just as they pour from the piano under the master touch of the artist himself. You can almost see the swift, sure fingers running over the keys. When the music stops, you applaud instinctively, as you would at an actual recital. For the illusion is simply perfect.

Victor tone is the tone of realism

Piano, harp—the tones of all instruments, including the human voice, fall pleasantly upon the most critical ear when heard through the Orthophonic Victrola. In no other way can you hear music reproduced so accurately. For the Orthophonic Victrola is based on the new, scientific, Victor-controlled principle of "matched impedance," which permits smooth, uninterrupted sound-flow . . . amazingly natural tones!

The new Orthophonic Victor Records, recorded by microphone, are an achievement comparable to that of the Orthophonic Victrola itself. They have new beauty and power. New clearness and depth. Made from an improved material, they have new quiet! These records play on any instrument . . . and vastly improve it!

The Orthophonic Victrola furnishes the finest music for the home. Model Four-seven (above) is $125, list price.

Go to the nearest Victor dealer today and ask him to play the new Orthophonic Victor Records on the new Orthophonic Victrola. Know for yourself that there is nothing else like this in all the realm of music. There are many beautiful models of the Orthophonic Victrola, from $95 to $300, list price. Silent electric motor ($35 extra) eliminates winding. You play . . . and relax.

HAVE A HEART!

A tragedy re-enacted daily in millions of bathrooms

POOR old brush! Haven't you punished him enough? Counterpart of millions of others in America's bathrooms, he probably doesn't look worn out. At a casual glance, he may even appear as good as ever. All the bristles are still there.

Yet, we who go on using such brushes are neglecting our teeth just as surely as though we left them unbrushed.

That is the pernicious thing about using tooth brushes too long.

Let's give our old brush a well-deserved vacation! Let's pension it off today! Let's start over again with a new Dr. West's Tooth Brush.

A Dr. West's—the brush that cleans inside, outside, and between the teeth. The brush with special bristles—firm, lively, vigorous bristles—that polish as they clean.

Faithful daily care with your Dr. West's will bring your teeth to a brilliant whiteness you may never have thought possible.

Thorough brushing—away from the gums—four minutes a day—two in the morning, two at night.

And here's a secret! To get the full value from Dr. West's special polishing quality, never try to "wear out" your brush. Dr. West's is so long-lived that it is often serviceable for months after its polishing ability is gone. Change often enough to have firm, new bristles always.

Many dentists change brushes once a month. Make sure yours is effective by getting a new one today!

There's a Dr. West's Tooth Brush for every member of the family. The Adult's size is 50c; Youth's, 35c; Child's, 25c; Special Gum Massage Brush, 75c.

Dr. West's Tooth Brush—a Biography

A good tooth brush is more than a handle and some bristles Dr. West's is scientifically designed to combine all the features that make a tooth brush good.

The brushing surface of Dr. West's is double-convex, being curved from end to end and from side to side Thus it fits the frequently neglected inside contour of the teeth.

Accurate spacing between its nine serrated rows of bristles enables Dr. West's to penetrate the interdental crevices And its tuftless, sloping end reaches easily into the farthest cheek-corner with bristles firmly erect for proper cleansing. . . . Insist on Dr. West's—the brush with the specially selected and shaped bristles that clean all the teeth and polish as they clean.

EVERY Dr. West's Tooth Brush is Sterilized and Sealed for your protection. It is safe from Thumb Brushers. Samples of each type are displayed for examination in the handy cabinet on your dealer's counter.

Through the "Plains of the Lost" in a Buick

Into Lower California—that little-known land which has defied civilization for four centuries since the Spanish Conquistadors first searched for golden cities, the little expedition ventured.

Headed by C. W. Hatton, of the Los Angeles Museum, and C. L. Franklin, this band of scientific explorers drove a Buick Sedan 680 miles through a strange country—examining flora, recording topography, breaking a trail for civilization to follow. For 180 miles they traveled over trails previously traversed only by pack mule, with the thermometer reading 120 degrees at midday.

They climbed steep mountains—grades of 45 degrees and more, with only loose volcanic rock beneath the wheels. They crossed jagged arroyos, 20 feet deep, with crumbling banks. They penetrated forests of sharp-needled cacti, 50 feet high. And most difficult of all, they crossed that mysterious desert mesa—"The Plains of the Lost"—through finely-powdered sand, hub-deep; over fields of dense mesquite, with the nearest water 50 miles away. Through everything, Buick kept on going—making history!

Buick's powerful Valve-in-Head Engine met every strain without once faltering. Buick's reliable Mechanical Four-Wheel Brakes held every time. It was not necessary to make a single adjustment, nor to add one drop of oil!

Truly extraordinary performance for any motor car! But not extraordinary for Buick. For thousands of Buicks are making equally remarkable performance records for their owners every day.

To keep candlelight charm by sunlight—this safe and simple care

A POOL of rosy light from rose-shaded candles, a becoming powder—and a little stage is set for beauty! But with sunshine, makebelieve disappears. To look lovely by daylight, complexions must really be lovely. And to be lovely they need the safest, sanest care.

What is this care? When you ask the doctor, his answer is simple. With health, says the doctor who is a skin specialist, the normal skin needs little more than safe, gentle cleansing with water and a pure soap.

Of course, the soap must be pure without question. A dry skin is irritated and roughened by a soap even a shade less mild than it should be. An oily skin, which should be washed several times daily to keep it fresh and clear, needs the purest, gentlest soap for these frequent cleansings.

With Ivory, you are sure of as fine and pure a soap as can be made. Doctors everywhere, every day, advise it for bathing tiny, new babies. What more could be said for its gentleness? Daily careful cleansings with warm water and Ivory, cold rinsings to make your skin less sensitive, a little cold cream if your skin is dry—and you will find that your complexion responds to this simple care with added loveliness.

Sir Richard aids a lady in distress!

Sir Richard. Pardon me, fair maid, but you dropped this package.

Alisanne. Oh, thank you, gentle sir. Adieu.

(A moment later)

Sir R. Again a thousand pardons, but you dropped your parcel by the road.

Alis. How careless of me! Thank you. Farewell.

(Two minutes later)

Sir R. Forgive me, but I have just fished your parcel from the brook.

Alis. (almost in tears). Goodness! I've been trying and trying to lose that package!

Sir R. But I don't understand——

Alis. Well, it's full of beauty soaps and magic lotions that my aunt says I must use every day, if I want to stay at court. And you can't imagine how tiresome they are.

Sir R. But I can clearly see how unnecessary they are!

Alis. How charming! I'm afraid I'll have to give up court life and go back home where I can have Ivory Soap every day, which is all I want or need.

Sir R. But if I could persuade your aunt to let you use Ivory——

Alis. Oh, if you think you could, you might come to tea at five!

What Is Going To Happen To America?

An interview with Dr. J. Russell Smith

As Reported by M. K. Wisehart

HAS anything happened in your part of the country to make you realize that changes vastly important to you and your children and your children's children are now taking place within the limits of the United States?

Back in 1790, at the time of the first census, the population of our country was a little less than four millions. In 1920, a hundred and thirty years later, it was a hundred and six millions—a twenty-sevenfold increase. What will the population be fifty years from now?

Twenty-seven million Americans—approximately one fourth of the total population—now live in seven great metropolitan areas: New York, Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, Detroit, San Francisco, Los Angeles! Will these cities continue to grow? And what is the future of our inland cities: St. Louis, Atlanta, Denver, Indianapolis? Will new cities spring up? Where?

In a very few decades America has produced the richest and most powerful civilization the world has known. How long can it go on at this rate? What great changes will be witnessed by the younger generation of Americans who are just starting their careers? What will life be like in these United States of ours a hundred years from now?

These, and many other questions about the future of our country, I took recently to a man well qualified to answer them, Dr. J. Russell Smith, a celebrated geographer and economist, head of the department of Economic Geography of the School of Business, of Columbia University.

Back in 1899, when Doctor Smith was a young economist just graduated from the University of Pennsylvania, he was called upon to serve with the Isthmian Canal Commission, created by President McKinley, to determine whether the Nicaragua or the Panama route offered greater economic advantages for the future canal. This involved the study of the trade and probable future of every country that might use it. Fascinated by these investigations, the eager young man decided then and there that geography with a human slant to it, geography by which you could study the present and read the future, was the field for his life work. But it was necessary for him to go abroad to get the training he desired. That was in 1901. Since then, he has won recognition as one of the leading geographers of the world. He is the author of numerous textbooks, and other celebrated and authoritative works, including "Commerce and Industry," "Industrial and Commercial Geography," "The World's Food Resources," "Human Geography" (a book for children), and "North America," a remarkable volume of eight hundred pages in which he has recorded some of the things he has discovered about this continent, and what he foresees regarding its future.

"WHAT I should like to have you do," I said to Doctor Smith, "is to give the readers of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE a rational prophecy—based on your geographic studies and your familiarity with economic and industrial conditions—of the changes that may reasonably be expected to occur in the United States during, well, let's say, the next twenty-five or fifty years."

"That's quite a large order," replied Doctor Smith; "but we'll see what can be done about it. Some of the changes will have to be discussed from the point of view of the nation as a whole; others concern particular sections. Suppose we consider some of the nation-wide tendencies first.

"The greatest single change of the past hundred years was the rapid increase in the number of people inhabiting the earth. During that time the population of the world nearly doubled. A hundred years ago it was less than one thousand

Bringing the Next Fifty Years Down to Date

AN ARTICLE such as this is a high light in magazine-making. Practical, prophetic, vastly informative, it hits all of us right where we live. The industrial and economic future of our country—of ourselves, our children, and our children's children—is the fascinating subject that Dr. J. Russell Smith has chosen. And of all the men alive in the United States, he is probably best equipped to handle it.

Few of us can study the present and read from it the future. We are all so immersed in our own jobs that it is difficult for us to lift our heads for a fair view of nearby territory. But Doctor Smith, who has a rare knowledge of both economics and geography, and is handicapped by no prejudices or special interests, has read the signs of the times, and has interpreted them in terms of the future. He foresees a dangerous influx cityward, which, unadjusted, will eventually lower our standard of living. He predicts the rise of numerous small towns and the decline of the big city. He foretells the rise of a "new New England," and gives its geographical bounds. He suggests how the South can save itself, and why the peak of American civilization will be reached, not in the East, but in the Great Northwest.

Wherever you live, you will find statements in this article that are of vital interest to you.

millions. To-day, it is about seventeen hundred millions.

"The outstanding feature of this world-wide increase—a feature without rivalry in all history—is the multiplication of our own population twenty-seven times in a little over a century. You sometimes hear people speak as though they thought that in numbers we might continue to grow in the future as we have in the past. Imagine what the country would be like if we did! At the end of another hundred and thirty years we would have twenty-eight hundred millions, and after still another hundred and thirty years we would have seventy-six thousand millions! Either one of these figures is too absurd to contemplate. Life in America would be unbearable from sheer force of numbers!

"Although our population is increasing, the rate of this increase has declined markedly during the past three decades. In the early years of our history the rate of increase was about thirty-five per cent per decade. From 1900 to 1910, the increase was twenty-one per cent; from 1910 to 1920, fifteen per cent. And this rate must still further decline. On the basis of present indications, at the end of another fifty years, we shall probably have between fifty and seventy-five millions more than we have to-day. After that, it may increase slowly to two hundred and fifty or three hundred millions. Then—barring the discovery of great new sources of food supply and raw materials, such as might be opened up through synthetic chemistry—we shall, sooner or later, come to a point where the population can increase only as the standard of living declines.

"Though a decline in the standard of living in America may seem remote, we would do well to keep in mind this fact: The whole present industrial system is living on the very cream of the world's resources. We are using up the richest of our coal, oil, and ore deposits; we are scalping the soil of all continents. Here, in the United States, with our wealth of forests, we are prodigally using wood four times as fast as we grow it.

"Now project yourself into the future. Suppose we had only one sixth as much wood per person, that we had used up nearly all our copper, that we were short of wool and leather. Suppose that the oil supply were slowing up, so that we had to grow crops to make alcohol with which to run our motors! It is not hard to see how these, and other similar and apparently inevitable conditions, would pinch us pretty hard, and certainly tend to a lower standard of living.

"ANOTHER striking change that is already in swift process in America is what the economist calls urbanization. For some years now we have been hearing about the so-called back-to-the-farm movement; but from the economist's point of view there is no movement afoot worthy of this name. Few city people who move to the country go there to farm. They mostly seek it as a place of retirement, where they can get fresh air and quiet. The real drift of our population is in the other direction—to the cities. Even in Nebraska, we have communities which resemble much older communities in New England in that every farmer on the land is well over forty years of age.

"Everything indicates that this cityward drift is bound to go on. The intelligent and energetic young people in nearly all our rural communities west of the Alleghenies have acquired the habit of looking about them and sizing up the situation. If they do not choose farming as a future, they must leave the country. In this eventuality they are very likely to head for Chicago; later, they may come to New York.

"I remember how, a few years ago, when I came to Columbia University, this cityward and eastward movement of our young people, even from the Middle West, was brought home to me. I looked about at my own staff, and found that two of my three assistants were from Nebraska, one from Iowa, and our departmental secretary hailed from Missouri. In a university group of seventeen professors, eleven were from farm country west of the Alleghenies. This is only a slight indication of the broad tendency cityward. Tens of thousands of our young people have left good farms in the Middle West to go to the cities, where they are serving as teachers, professional and business men.

"The Roman Empire went through an exodus of this kind when her rural districts drained into the cities. So must we. The Roman Empire collapsed. I don't say that it will be disastrous here, but, presumably, it will bring about a number of acute conditions before an adjustment is made. One of these results undoubtedly will be a rural decline.

"BY RURAL decline I don't mean that necessarily the quality of our agriculture will be impaired. Rather, that the rural community will decline as a neighborhood. What makes a good neighborhood? Imaginative leadership and solid citizens working together for the most desirable things of life—good schools, good roads, churches, libraries, county fairs, games and recreation, cattle shows, flower shows, women's clubs, baseball games, swimming parties—fun! The poor neighborhood is one where there are not enough energetic people to keep up these educational and social activities. We already have such 'dead-alive' communities in New England. They are creeping into the Corn Belt, and they are bound to appear elsewhere.

"There are a few statistics that emphasize the extent of this cityward drift with startling clearness. In the early days of our history, three per cent of the people lived in cities and ninety-seven per cent in the rural districts. To-day, fifty-two per cent of us live in cities. During the decade 1910-1920, when the population as a whole increased fifteen per cent, the increase in our city population was twenty-six per cent. During this same period, the increase in our rural population was less than five and a half! If this tendency continues, it means that pretty soon we shall practically all be living in cities!

"Most of this city growth occurred in the region between Portland (Maine), Minneapolis, Chicago, and Washington, D. C. But the gains on the Pacific Coast were also striking. In that part of the country the ratio is about three city people to two country people."

"How long do you anticipate that this cityward movement of our people will continue?" I asked Doctor Smith.

"Roughly speaking," he replied, "for another thirty or forty years. At the end of that time, we can expect to have come to an adjustment between city and country, with perhaps about sixty-five or seventy per cent of our people living in cities and the remaining thirty- or thirty-five per cent in the rural districts. If the population continues noticeably to increase after this balance is reached, there will have to be subdivision of the land with smaller farms and more intensive agriculture. Acre by acre our land must be made to yield more in order to meet the needs of the increased population. And while intensive agriculture is less productive per man it is more productive per acre.

"CITIES! Small cities! Moderate-sized cities! The birth of these in considerable numbers, and the growth of many small towns and cities of from five hundred to twenty-five thousand to twice their present size, is another of the notable changes we can look for in America in the reasonably near future.

"The future of these cities lies in part with our foreign trade. A large foreign trade would mean more cities, because our exports are largely in manufactures, and manufactures entail more city dwellers. However, our present tariff policy seems to indicate that we have set our faces resolutely against encouraging a large foreign trade. Trade is the exchange of goods. We would like to sell, but, in effect, with our high tariffs, we place great handicaps on buying. And the high tariff costs for farmers' supplies has its inevitable effect on agriculture.

"Another possible change of great importance," continued Doctor Smith, "is the decentralizing of manufacturing industry. Many industries in the past have shown a marked tendency to centralize in certain cities and sections, the shoe industry in Boston, for instance, the clothing industry in New York. Quite recently, we have seen the shoe industry scattering over the country. It has become an important part in the life of St. Louis, as the clothing industry has of Chicago, and of half a dozen other cities. Back of the shifting of these industries, the principal influences are increased freight rates and consequently higher production costs, the ease of moving raw material, also the high cost of living in congested centers.

"We can foresee the time when it may be cheaper to transport raw materials for manufacturing to workers scattered in small communities than to transport the necessary food supplies when they are gathered in large centers. It looks very much as though we might have, on an extensive scale, a revival of manufacturing for the needs of the locality in which the factories are situated.

"Already factory owners are showing an inclination to seek the smaller towns. There are two factors which suggest that this tendency will go on more and more rapidly during the next fifteen or twenty years. One of these is the widespread distribution of electric power that is sweeping across the country with great speed. The other great factor is standardization.

"A certain automobile manufacturer is carrying on at the present time an important experiment in this connection.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

In a little village on River Rouge, Michigan, he has established a small factory, with fourteen employees who spend all their time making valves. These are the only output of the factory; but it produces all the valves that are needed in the great automobile works. A truck comes out each morning from the main plant with raw material, and takes the finished stuff back to the works.

"There is no longer any reason why the workers who produce some small standardized part for a complicated machine should live in congested manufacturing districts. The little pieces for the lawn mower or the automobile can easily be brought by truck or train from a small town or city located at a distance forty or, for that matter, four hundred miles away.

"A change of this kind will have far-reaching effects. It foreshadows the new industrialism. It doesn't mean that the actual volume of trade will be limited, but it does mean that we can look for the shifting of certain kinds of manufacturing from such places as Boston, Worcester, Detroit and Chicago to smaller cities, villages, and perhaps even to the farm homes in food-producing sections of New York, Michigan, and elsewhere.

"As one result of this trend, it is reasonable to look for the rise of a new New England in the fringe of the Appalachian Mountains, on either side, east and west, a new New England without any very large cities perhaps, but with manufacturing scattered throughout many small cities and towns near the source of raw materials and power, producing goods mainly of cotton and wood—textiles, lead pencils and phonographs, and such things as skates and rifles."

Dr. J. Russell Smith, professor of economic geography at Columbia University. With an unusual background, and an even more unusual vision, Doctor Smith is able to interpret our present and past industrial and agricultural growth in terms of ten, twenty, and even fifty years hence. He is an international authority on industry and on world food-resources. His books include "The Story of Iron and Steel," "The Organization of Ocean Commerce," "Human Geography," and "North America," the last being a detailed study of the resources and prospects of this continent. Doctor Smith was born in Purcellville, Virginia. He is fifty-three years old

A SHORT time ago, Doctor Smith, you spoke of certain changes that concern particular sections of the country," I suggested. "What about old New England? The South? The Northwest? What are the things a young man ought to know about changes due in various sections of the United States, from the point of view of his career?"

"Let's get a map and draw a line from Chicago to Albany, then to New York, to Atlanta, to St. Louis, and back to Chicago," was his response.

"This gives you an irregular geometric figure something like a rectangle. During coming decades the region contained in this rectangle will offer great business opportunities. If I were a young man seeking a business career, with almost immediate results, this is the territory where I should look for my future. Here is where more business men will get rich, and get rich faster, than in any other large section.

"At the present time, this region is increasing in population more rapidly than any other part of the country. Here we may expect the appearance of many, perhaps a majority, of those moderate-sized manufacturing cities of which I spoke a moment ago."

"What are the business opportunities that will appear in this area?" I asked eagerly.

"They will arise in connection with the industries that already flourish there," Doctor Smith replied. "Within this area are the finest coal fields, much of the iron and steel industry, and the center of population. It has good railroads and lake carriers, and can have good waterways whenever we decide to use the New York Barge Canal and the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. In view of these factors, it is perfectly feasible that in a machine-using era this area should continue to make the machinery, as it already does—automobiles, tractors, trucks, harvesters—and develop a host of new industries, arising, as I have already stated, out of its established manufactures and its great natural resources.

"THEN there is another region for which we can foresee a wonderful future—the Northwest!

"The particular section to which I refer consists roughly of fifty by four hundred miles on the Pacific Coast of Oregon and Washington in the Puget Sound-Willamette River Valley region, where are located the cities of Seattle, Portland, Tacoma, Everett, Bellingham, and a few others. A portion of British Columbia lies in the district, including Vancouver and Victoria. The population of this area is now about a million. It will almost certainly increase to five or six, perhaps ten, millions. A thriving land of cities in the midst of dairy farms and a rich garden agriculture, such as we find in the best parts of England and Belgium!

"To Dr. Ellsworth Huntington we are indebted for epoch-making observations in the study of the part that climate plays in the making of civilization. If the theory presented in his great work, 'Civilization and Climate,' were at variance with everyday experience we might look at it askance; but the experience of common men, and the history of many countries, seem to confirm his most important conclusions.

"Doctor Huntington's main conclusion, in brief, is this: a man feels more inclined to be active, and will do more physical work, at a temperature of about sixty degrees (fifty-five (Continued on page 78)

Strange Places Of Worship

By Archibald Rutledge

WHEN I asked my genial host where George Washington Alexander Burnsides Green was sleeping, he said, "With the hounds." Naturally, my curiosity was aroused, and, perhaps, better feelings also.

As soon as opportunity offered, I left the wide hearth before which a lot of us had been swapping hunting yarns, and strolled out into the starry Southern night. We were hunting deer on a remote plantation, so inaccessible that the only sound of really blatant civilization to reach us was occasionally the faint whistle of a locomotive, twelve miles, six swamps, and two rivers away.

Under great oaks I walked, toward a curious little brick building that I knew had been given over to housing the hounds—a yowling, restless crew, indispensable, melodious, but difficult to manage. Their control had been given to Wash Green, a negro as humble as he was efficient. On that same day I had been given cause to marvel at the occult finesse with which he had handled the swarming pack. But now the nature of his sleeping quarters troubled me.

Nearing the tiny quaint building, not larger than an ordinary smokehouse, I saw through its open windows the shadows made by firelight dancing and running on its walls. I did not want to open the door, for fear that some of the hounds would slip out; I did not want to knock, for old Wash might be asleep, and there was really no need to awaken him. I just went to the nearest window and looked in. What met my gaze was one of the most memorable scenes that my eyes have ever looked upon. It was such a picture as the heart carries for the rest of life.

I looked into a tiny brick-walled room, with a dirt floor. The only bit of furniture in the place was an ancient bench, sagging crazily at one end because there it had but one leg. A cheerful fire of pine and oak burned in the black chimney. Ranged in front of the fire in a variety of thoughtful poses were about fifteen hounds. Some of them looked unutterable things into the flames. Some drowsed with paws outstretched on their extended front legs. A few hung back from the mystic semicircle, as if they had not yet undergone the awful rites which would admit them to so august a council. But, while the dogs were interesting, the man was fascinating.

In front of the fire, with the lolling hounds all about, old Wash was down on his knees. He seemed looking into the fire, yet far beyond it. His hands were clasped in front of him with unmistakable fervor Down in the dirt and dust he was, literally among the dogs. And he was praying. A strange place for worship! A singular shrine! Yet adoration, I thought, is of the heart; and the soul's meeting with its Maker may be effected in all kinds of odd places.

I left old gray-haired Wash praying; and unless my judgment in such things is badly at fault, his petitions went as straight Home as those offered in cathedrals.

This subject of strange places of worship has long held a special interest for me; and I have tried to be on the alert to discover peculiar places of devotion and adoration. I have often asked myself, for example, what were the exact conditions under which a writer produced a masterpiece? In other words, what was the environment which afforded an author's spirit a chance to do his very best work?

THE answer, of course, must come from the writer himself. One day, when I was trout-fishing with Henry van Dyke, I asked him where he was when he wrote "God of the Open Air," the poem that is generally conceded to be his best. I can remember how his face brightened at the query.

"It was in the winter," he said, "and I was staying in a tiny vine-covered cottage near Augusta, Georgia. I was close to the beautiful quiet heart of Nature. It was therefore easy for me to write of the God of Nature. The airs were gentle; there were bird songs, and fragrances of flowers, and elemental beauty everywhere. Perhaps in no other environment could I have written that poem."

He who reads that noble poem will find it a hymn of worship, of thanksgiving, a song of adoration of the Creator. In a genuine sense, worship always means just that—the heart's spontaneous and primitive reverence for God, its childlike gladness in God. Therefore, true worship is a far greater thing and a far more frequent act than mere going to church or saying one's prayers. For example, in its broadest sense, worship is often associated with work, either in the thoughtful preparation for it, or in its actual performance, and this alleged sinful world of ours has far more unfeigned worshipers than the pessimists imagine.

BUT the human heart has a quaint and appealing tendency of being individual, of choosing, therefore, odd places for worship, and perhaps unusual forms of worship. The savage Pawnee Indian from the brow of some beetling cliff pouring out his wild chant to the Great Spirit is, essentially, as true a worshiper as the chanter of Psalms in some gorgeous church.

An understanding of some of these strange places and ways of worship, with a due appreciation of their significance, is one of the most heartening things I know about these strange, lovable, wayward yet winsome mortal natures of ours. Hearts don't like to be herded. Christ told his followers to be sure to pray in secret. He practically advised them to pray in odd and obscure places. He himself repaired to the lonely wilderness to restore his spirit.

Recurring for a moment to the proper environment for a literary worker, we shall find that almost every writer has an especial preference. Sinclair Lewis declares that he can do his best work on an ocean liner. Joan Sutherland, the gifted English novelist, has lately engaged a private airplane, and is making excursions several thousand feet in the air to gain a certain pitch of inspiration for her work. Clemence Dane says that she finds it practically impossible to work on her country estate in (Continued on page 199)

From a Ragged Rail Fence The Voice of God May Be Heard

"I HAVE always found it profitable to stop, look and listen at places other than railroad crossings," says Mr. Rutledge. "The top rail of an old fence is the kind of throne I simply cannot resist. From such a place, one can catch from the woodlands the fragrance of visions, can hearken with his heart to the soft breathings of nature, quiet in confidence, virtuous, wise. I have heard in such places the Voice of God. And what is it but that virginal beauty that speaks to the human heart. I cannot think that all of God's language is bound in the Bible, great though it be. Whatever makes us feel joyously that God and His divine love are near; whatever gives our spirits the support of the everlasting arms; whatever takes away our hatred and fills us with affection—that is the Word of God, the Voice of God. I hear it often from the top of a ragged rail fence, tenderly bound by wild grape and fairily overarched by sumac and blackberry canes."

HARDLY a man living has had a greater influence on the coming generation of men in this country than James E. West, head of the Boy Scouts of America. In the past seventeen years he has been a friend to more than six hundred thousand boys. More than that, he has been working with boys ever since, when he was only fourteen, he was put in charge of his younger companions in the orphanage that was his only boyhood home. Though a cripple, and without friends, he made his own way through school in spite of every possible difficulty and discouragement, and took care of two dependent boys while later fitting himself to practice law. Both photographs on this page show Mr. West at his home in New Rochelle, New York, the one above with his own children, Arthur, Marion, Bobby and Helen. He is fifty years old.

"Boys Will Be Scouts"

James E. West, executive head of the Boy Scouts organization, has been associated with children all his life—Out of the bitter loneliness of his crippled childhood, spent in an orphanage, has come a thorough knowledge and understanding of the needs of children

By Myron M. Stearns

IN THE days when Theodore Roosevelt was President, a young Washington lawyer parked his automobile outside a settlement house where an evening meeting was scheduled. Automobiles still attracted a good deal of attention at that time. This particular car was a small two-seater that steered with a tiller. The one-cylinder motor, concealed under the seat, could be locked, much as a modern car can be locked, by shutting off the spark with a switch key. But when the meeting was over, the car was gone.

The lawyer found it farther down the street in charge of a policeman. Also in charge of the policeman was a scared, struggling boy.

"Your car?" asked the policeman.

The young lawyer nodded.

"Have to get your name and address."

He made out a card, summoning James E. West to appear in court as a witness.

"But what's the charge?" young West asked.

"He was running off with your automobile," was the policeman's answer. "He's a bad one, anyway. I've had trouble with him before."

Next morning, when Freddie's (the defendant) case was called, Mr. West was on hand. The charge was "Operating an automobile without a license." It sounded rather ridiculous. But apparently the boy would get a prison sentence. He had run afoul of the law, and the law, as it was then operated, made no particular distinction between boys and men. Mr. West moved over to him.

"Have you an attorney?"

"Wot's 'at?"

"Have you a lawyer representing you?"

The boy shook his head.

"Then let me act as your lawyer. I'll see if I can help you out."

He rose and addressed the Court.

"Your Honor," he said, "although I was summoned as a complaining witness, I find that the defendant has been unrepresented by counsel, and have undertaken to act in that capacity."

The Court gravely recognized him as attorney for the defense.

Then Mr. West had the policeman recalled to the stand. By cross-examination he showed that Freddie had been steering the car while a dozen other boys pushed it down the street. The policeman grew red and apoplectic, angrily trying to back up the charge he had made. Then the young attorney took the stand himself, and was duly sworn.

"I happen to be the owner of this machine," he announced. "Before I left it I locked it." He drew from his pocket the key that locked the motor, and held it up. "The motor was still locked when this boy was arrested. All he did was to climb into the car. Then he sat there and steered it, while the rest of the crowd pushed it down the street. To give him a prison-school sentence for that would be a travesty on justice."

The case was promptly dismissed. The boy ran home. The judge gave the policeman a sharp call-down, and the incident was legally closed.

But it was not closed for James E. West. That was not his way. One of the reasons why his influence is so powerful in this country to-day is that whenever he sees something he thinks ought to be done, he immediately gets busy. This mischievous boy's case had shown him that the ponderous machinery of the law had no way of dealing satisfactorily with boys who had not yet "gone wrong," but who might be developed into hardened criminals through harsh legal methods.

He went to President Roosevelt and told him the story of Freddie. "What we need here in Washington is a Juvenile Court to handle cases like that," he explained.

"Right!" said the energetic Teddy. "We'll have one." And after the passage of the Juvenile Court law he promised a committee that went to him with the recommendation that West be appointed judge, that he would put him in charge.

TO-DAY at fifty, James E. West is the executive head of the Boy Scouts of America, a position he has held since its inception in 1910. His dynamic energy and willingness to act on his convictions have made him one of the most influential men in the country. Although he is lame, he is the picture of health and vitality, and he swings along with a vigor that makes his lameness seem only a trifle to be pushed aside. As an exponent of the strenuous life, of friendliness and activity and public service, he comes perhaps as close as anyone alive to duplicating his former friend and ally, Theodore Roosevelt.

Yet, when he was eight and a half years old, Jimmy West, after months strapped to a hospital bed, was returned, unwanted, to the Washington orphan asylum as a hopeless cripple. He made his way about from room to room on crutches, a pathetic little bit of humanity, without health, without education, and without friends, and apparently no hope of attaining them.

But before I start on the miraculous story of how James West made his way alone and almost unaided over one seemingly insurmountable obstacle after another, let me give you a picture of him at his work:

The National Headquarters of the Boy Scouts is located on the eighth floor of the Fifth Avenue Building, in New York City. In his big office Mr. West tells you cordially to sit down. As he talks with you, you feel that he is giving whatever you say full weight. There is no effort to hurry you, in spite of the fact that he is catching a night train to Cleveland, that he will be in Chicago the day following, that he will then come back for a flying visit to the office—and will be leaving for the Pacific Coast two days later!

On the rolls of the organization, which in no small measure owes its tremendous success to his personal leadership and direction, there are over 180,000 workers, stimulating and guiding more than 620,000 Scouts! Although a great share of the work is voluntary, contributed freely and gladly, the annual expenditures of the organization are more than six million dollars.

And now let's look at the long climb that led to this position of influence and country-wide prestige.

JAMES E. WEST was born at the Columbia Hospital for Women, Washington, D. C., on May 16th, 1876. He knew little about his parents. His mother, Mary F. Tyree, parted from her family when she married his father, James Robert West, a merchant from Tennessee, who died when he was a baby. In spite of the prominent position he has won, James West, since his parents' death, has never known a single relative in all the world. His mother left him no names or other means of getting in touch with his uncles or aunts or cousins on either side; he has never even been sure that there were any. During his boyhood he made no effort to reach his mother's people; he had a vague feeling it might be better to fight his battles alone. Now that his name has become widely known, he wonders, sometimes, how it happens that no word of kinship or inquiry has ever come to him.

The early years of James West's childhood ran close to tragedy. His mother had to put him in an orphan asylum when she was taken to the Providence Hospital, another Washington institution, on July 3d, 1882. A year later she died of tuberculosis. Of the one hundred and eighty children in the orphanage, Jimmy was the only one without any relatives. He was utterly alone. (Continued on page 169)

The Leading Case

Colonel Braxton brings the First Book of Samuel into court

By Melville Davisson Post

ILLUSTRATED BY
W. H. D. KOERNER

"And so," continued Colonel Braxton, "you attribute these dreams to Heaven?"

I WAS present at a trial in Virginia. It was a celebrated trial for its time and there was more than one marvel in it.

Among these wonders, for it was the May of early youth, was a girl. She was the defendant in this suit. The tragedies of death had stripped her on every side, and she was quite alone. And now this suit threatened to leave her beggared as well as orphaned. She came every day into the court-room with her attorney, Colonel Braxton, and sat primly beside him, as if she were already a woman of affairs.

And I adored her from a middle bench among the people of the countryside.

I went in with my father, who thought the trial would be instructive to me: I would see famous men and learn how such great business was conducted. The court-room was crowded and I could not have seen over it from my place if I had not been a well-grown, tall lad. The judge had been at one time governor of Virginia; the counsel for the plaintiff had been attorney general, and there was a sprinkling of celebrities about. The trial was in our western county that extended its line into the mountains, for here lay the great tract of land involved.

The girl's father had purchased the tract at a tax sale, and his title had been unquestioned while the property appeared of little value; but now, when it was discovered that the great coal beds of Pennsylvania extended southward into these mountains, there had appeared a gentleman from New Jersey, who claimed the lands under a patent from Virginia. He had come into court with the document, and a prayer to permit him to repay the purchaser or his heirs the amount of taxes and the legal interest, and retake the lands.

The girl holding my youthful worship came also from the neighboring city with her attorney, Colonel Braxton, to resist the claimant, and to hold what she had inherited. And so the great affair was on.

IT WAS an event of public concern. It rivaled in wide interest the annual visit of the circus and the county fair. The people came in from their farms and villages, and the town was crowded. It was the usual county seat, like a dozen others: the courthouse of the Virginia model, with its plaster pillars on a long portico paved with brick, of which the legend ran that they had been hauled in wagons overland from a sailing vessel in the Chesapeake. The offices of the circuit and county courts were on either side as one entered, and beyond them was the big court-room.

The arrangement of this room, in the old Virginia design, reflected a feeling now lost sight of; namely, a recognition of the people as the source of justice, as they were the source of authority in a republic.

And so the early court-rooms were designed to this end. Nearly the whole floor space was occupied with seats for the people, as in a theatre. Beyond a railing was the elevated bench for the judges, tables for the attorneys, seats for the jury, and the witness chair. And this detail of structure reveals the broad conception of democracy that moved our fathers in their affairs.

There was much speculation on the outcome of this trial.

The chimney-corner lawyers discussed it at the tavern, and laid down the law. And, strangely, their opinions were near to the governing legal principle in the law itself. They had sat for so long at public trials and had considered so carefully what had occurred there, and their memories were so retentive, that they were not so grossly in error on the law as the average citizen of our present age.

They held nearly to a man that the new claimant would prevail.

It was mountain lands; there had been no possession established in either party, and the ancient right ran for an owner in fee simple to redeem, where his lands were sold for taxes, if he came into court without laches, as they used the legal term; meaning, as I understood, as soon as one had the right and without wasting time about it.

BUT occasionally a hot-head stood out for the girl . . . and I was of that number. If I were on that jury she would get her lands! The law could go!

And I was met with grave rebuke that I shall always remember. If good men om worthy motives broke the law down one instance, evil men in another in-ance, from unworthy motives, would so break it down. And so there would e no principles established, and no clear-id rules by which men could be guided the conduct of their affairs.

But when I spoke of the pretentious entleman from New Jersey who came ere with his array of counsel, his maps d surveyors to dispossess a girl, they had tle to reply.

They stroked their big sunburned faces d were silent.

They liked the matter no better than I d. But here was their fixed procedure llowed by ancient usage. It could not for one and not for another. It could t be amended by the human heart. For is reason was justice indfold, that she ight not see the liti-nts—neither this l, nor the gentleman ming from New Jer-y.

ON THE afternoon that this trial took strange, inexplica-e turn, the court-room s crowded; the aisles re filled, and men od up along the ll. I could find no t, although I came early; and, standing, was moved forward the crowd until the ling across the hall rred me. And so I nd myself directly hind the attorneys' tables; close, as it ppened, to where Colonel Braxton and e girl were seated.

It would have been an uncomfortably se pack for an older person. But for me was a crowding into paradise—a look er the wall into the blessed city, where e heavenly creature that one worshiped elt. There was no strain or fatigue in is posture for me, I could have stood , thus pressed in by the crowd, to the d of time—until the earth wore away rning on its axis. To such extremity do otions move us when we are young!

She sat there primly, as in a nimbus. Surely of all lovely things she was the rfection of God's work. And the charm her smote me and, entering, occupied e heart as though that temple in the east had been swept and garnished, ptied of every occupant, and from the wn of life made ready and predestined her.

So, in such extravagance of metaphor, I regard Colonel Braxton's client. The back of her head was toward me, d I noted its perfection: the hair like a in of silk, the white column of her oat and the soft curve of the face nding to the chin; the little blue frock d the blue hat with a bird's wing on it. I could have put out a timid finger and ched the hem of that blue, heavenly ck, the ecstasy would have left my e transfigured; and men would have od about wondering how the sun had thus marvelously into this crowded ce.

The sheriff opened the court.

He was a big countryman with a bellowing voice that filled the room and could be heard in the street outside.

The case was called, naming the plaintiff and defendant. The judge directed the attorneys to proceed, and the trial was again on its way.

It had been occupied until to-day with the testimony of surveyors who had run the lines and plotted the tract, and with the record of earlier surveys. Washington had been through this region, and before him scouting parties for the Crown; crude boundaries had been estimated. The old surveys, inaccurate and overlapping, could only be disregarded.

And thus the judge in a manner held, so far as I could understand it. But there were some statutes that gave the State a title when unenclosed lands were returned delinquent; and this title was at the defendant's back. It held, unless the plaintiff's grant was valid.

And thus the issue narrowed to this grant.

IT WAS not of record; but this requirement had been explained away by the fact that the office in which such grants were recorded had burned down. It was a well-known historical event. And the court could take judicial notice of it; meaning, that it required no proof, as the fact was notoriously established. The whole case then turned upon one question for the jury:

Was the plaintiff's grant a valid paper?

The surveyors stood aside with their plats and blueprints. Only the great map tacked to the wall remained, enclosing the lands in question with broad red lines. It seemed a vast estate, a sort of empire, copied from an atlas.

The counsel for the plaintiff now put that gentleman on the stand.

He was the type of man that got my gorge up; to my eye everything about him was markedly Pharisaical: the hypocrisies and the pretentions that our Lord detested!

HE WAS a tall old man with a white beard trimmed on either side of his lank jaws to a point, and cut out at the chin. He had a stiff leg, which he supported with an ebony stick, and he was dressed like a minister of the Gospel. When he spoke his voice imitated the oratory of the pulpit. He had a misty eye, under a heavy lid; a cloudy eye, of a vague, pale color. It reminded me of tallow that had been melted and allowed to cool. It had that indefinite bluish cast.

I write no flattering description of this gentleman from New Jersey.

How could I admire him, when he stood before me as a marauder; a pretender to this empire that my divinity inherited; a legal freebooter coming to dispossess her of a kingdom!

For the fancy had taken root; she was a princess, and this great red-marked map of the wall behind the witness chair outlined the boundaries of her fairy kingdom!

I draw Mr. Ebenezer Ponsford with a heavy hand, and from a hostile viewpoint.

But the evidences that I perhaps distort were there, and marked by others. One could see the disagreeable impression that the man created. If the law was on his side, as it now appeared, the sympathies of the human heart were not.

But there lay a peril, as the chimney-corner lawyers in the tavern said, in this very point of difference in the litigants. All human sympathy was so overwhelmingly with the defendant that, to circumvent suggestion of a bias, the judge and jury were apt to swing unconsciously to the other side.

The foreign counsel shrewdly examined Mr. Ponsford.

A vital point was this one of laches.

Had Mr. Ponsford come into court as soon as he had the right, and had he moved with reasonable celerity? That was to establish; and, after that, the grant as a valid paper.

The historical disaster which had destroyed the records of the grants of that date, of which the court took judicial notice, saved Mr. Ponsford from the taint of negligence. There was no record of his grant, to advise him of his right. He had come into this court as soon as he had notice of his right to sue.

He said that this warrant had been discovered by him in an old trunk, at his aged father's death. It was among a mass of petty documents that had remained, tied up with old tape, and descended to his father from his grandfather's large affairs.

His grandfather had been a sheriff of some sort in the early time, and the documents, so bundled up, had been forms and old accounts of no importance; and so neither his father nor himself had ever thought it worth while to inventory what the trunk contained. But finally, examining these old documents, he had found the grant.

Neither his father nor he could be charged with delay in coming forward with this claim, since neither had any notice of his right. The father had gone out of life wholly in ignorance of the existence of this grant; and the present claimant had brought his action for recovery well within the period set out in the statute, and had moved it forward to trial with all diligence, and as rapidly as the pleadings could be settled and this suit put on the docket.

I UNDERSTOOD this as it was brought out by Mr. Wellington Monroe, the eminent counsel for the plaintiff, as the chimney-corner lawyers called him; for at the tavern they had not only appraised the counsel in this case and assigned them their position in our regard, but they had run forward in speculation on the difficulties each side would meet, and how such corners could be shrewdly turned.

This was one dangerous corner and Mr. Wellington Monroe had turned it. But there was another approaching! How was Mr. Ponsford to explain his initial finding of this important paper, and avoid the inference that the suddenly discovered value of these lands had no connection with that act?

And under the interrogatory of Mr. Wellington Monroe, he explained it in the strangest manner:

He had dreamed one night that his father stood in the hall beyond his door and beckoned to him. He had awakened in the dark, dismissed the matter as a fancy of mind, and returned to sleep.

Again the dream had appeared.

This time he did not awake until the morning. But through the day the dream continued to impress him.

He thought that the influence of the dream was the stronger because, in the legends of his family, such visions had been occasionally noted, and they had a definite intent; for example, in one instance, his father had lost an English ax.

It was in the day when such a tool was valuable, and his father was very much perturbed about the loss.

Evidently it had been stolen; but there was no clue.

That night his father had dreamed that the ax was hidden under an uprooted tree in a neighboring wood. He had awakened, as Mr. Ebenezer Ponsford had awakened. . . . But there was this difference; his father had received definite directions in his dream; and on the morrow at daybreak he had gone to the wood, located the uprooted tree, and recovered his ax.

But the plaintiff had no such definite direction.

Whither had the vision of his father gone, and to what end was he advised to follow?

True, he was at the time in financial difficulties.

This dream might mean some way out —if it had any meaning—and that feeling entered and possessed the man. Finally in the end, being so wholly in the dark about its meaning, and in such need, he had gone to a medium in his city, who, in a trance, saw a man looking through an old trunk in a cluttered attic.

The description tallied exactly with Mr. Ponsford's father and the old trunk which was in the attic of the house that had descended to him.

He had searched the trunk and discovered the warrant.

And when he had asked for legal advice upon its value he had learned of the coal beds under these wild lands it covered.

The witness put his extended hands together at the finger tips when he arrived at this point in his explanation, and his face grew long and sanctimonious.

Who could say about the dead! Or what one knew in the hereafter; or the concern one's father might have for him?

The hidden value of this inheritance discovered to his father in the World Beyond should be made known to the living son here. Who could say how great an effort that required? For no trivial gain could it be justified. And so, perhaps —the witness did not presume to say—the dream had come only when there was justification for it.

Mr. Ebenezer Ponsford moved here with a becoming vagueness.

This was all the business of a mystery beyond him. He testified only to the facts, and made no conjecture.

THE legal authorities I have cited about the tavern, afterward discussing this famous trial, were of the opinion that the plaintiff, Mr. Ponsford, had made here an exceedingly clever explanation, just the sort of thing to impress a county jury of the hills.

A definite intent in dreams ran with their scriptural beliefs.

And in every household there was some evidential story: deaths had been foretold; the guilty in a crime determined; and the like. There was Bible for a thing like that, in the vernacular of the country folk.

This book, in every item of its historical detail, was taken with a literal meaning.

Old trial lawyers, in that day in Virginia, advised the aspiring student for the bar to read it carefully; to have it, like his Blackstone, at his finger tips, for it was the only book the people knew.

And so, with this strange story of a dream and one speaking in a trance, Mr. Ebenezer Ponsford had put over on the dead the dangerous inference that shadowed behind his case.

Mr. Wellington Monroe introduced the grant upon which his case depended.

It was an old Treasury warrant, issued by Patrick Henry, Esquire, as such patents ran, Governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia in the year of our Lord, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, and of the Commonwealth the tenth.

It was on an old folded parchment; the description of the lands by metes and bounds so voluminous that it was written on both sides. It was yellow with age and so used that on a crease there was a hole clean through it, where the fold had worn.

It was written in script, after the fashion of that day, and there was the signature of the governor at the closing line, unquestionably in his hand, "P. Henry."

It lay now before the witness on the table, conclusive of his title.

MR. WELLINGTON MONROE turned the witness over to Colonel Braxton, with a little gesture, as of one who happily brings a difficult affair to its successful issue.

The dense crowd in the court-room leaned forward with anticipation: how would this eccentric lawyer open his defense?

And for some moments he made no move to open it.

He took up the warrant and looked it over, turned it about, and put it down before him. There could be nothing new, in its legal terms, to see. It had been on file, and Colonel Braxton had had opportunity, like other counsel, to look it over.

It was like an unconscious act covering some mental introspection.

And in the interval I regarded Mr. Ebenezer Ponsford, his long body comfortably at ease in the witness chair, his stiff leg extended and his pink face, between the fleeces of beard, composed for victory. And my loathing for the creature deepened.

He seemed by his very age, by his very infirmity of lameness, to have taken a base advantage.

How could any one of us champion the girl against this lame old man!

By these infirmities he was beyond the swing of our clenched hand. I had got myself in fancy, in the romance of such a mood: in the very cast and costume of it —a rapier in my hand, going down the steps of a château in the morning sun, in a ruffled shirt, to defend her kingdom.

But how could one run such a creature through! I could have spat my derision!

Colonel Braxton's opening seemed a mere courteous review.

"Mr. Ebenezer Ponsford," he said, "let us see if I recall your direct evidence correctly: you belong to a family that has had favor of dreams?"

"We may say that, sir," replied the witness. "Heaven has on occasion, by that agency, helped us to recover what others wrongfully withheld from us."

"And so," continued Colonel Braxton, "you attribute these dreams to Heaven?"

"That, sir," replied Mr. Ponsford, "should be the revered conclusion; all favors are from Above."

The attorney moved his hands in a vague assent.

"Heaven sent you a vision of your father?"

"Yes."

"It beckoned to you, and twice in your dream you saw it?"

"That is precisely the truth, sir," Mr. Ponsford answered.

"And then," the attorney continued, "this favor of Heaven ceased. The vision did not return. You could get no further direction from On High. You slept on, Mr. Ponsford, and in your perplexity you no doubt prayed Heaven for a further vision."

"Now upon that especial point," said

The warrant had been discovered by him in an old trunk. It was among a mass of petty documents that had descended to his father from his grandfather's large affairs

Mr. Ponsford, "I have not spoken in my direct examination; but, as it happens, you divine correctly. I did seek by the means you name, a further guidance from Above, if it were the will of God to so direct me."

"But there was no response to the invocations?"

The witness shrugged his shoulders.

"I got no further direction in a dream."

"And now, Mr. Ponsford," the attorney went on, "you were in grave perplexity; further communication with Heaven was denied you; you were, as you tell us, financially in distress, and, so beset, you went to a spirit medium."

The witness stroked the wedge points of his beard.

"It seemed a sort of folly," he replied; "I have never held such persons in regard, but as it happened it was fortunate for me."

"Ah!" said Colonel Braxton, "but was it fortunate for you?"

The exclamation coming suddenly and with vigor seemed to fill the court-room.

"You are a very tall man, Mr. Ponsford."

The expletive, the sudden driving query and the irrelevant statement added, lifted the audience into a dramatic tension.

The people leaned forward in their seats.

The interest in the court-room did not disturb the witness. He was accustomed to the exigencies of legal trials. He did not expect a suit at law to sail happily into port without the buffeting of some cross-currents. But there was, I thought, a shifty apprehension in his face for all its amiable composure.

"Now, Mr. Ebenezer Ponsford," continued Colonel Braxton, as in explanation, "it is a custom in the law courts, when a case comes up, to cite a precedent, a leading case in which the facts are parallel; and I am able, I think, to cite such a leading case, precisely on all fours with your story. It is the case of a tall man like yourself, who, having been accustomed to directions from Heaven, and finding that aid cut off, and being, as you were, in grave perplexity, had recourse to a medium. You (Continued on page 98)

Ten Ways To Make A Fool Of Yourself

By Ellis Parker Butler

THE reason people come to me when they want to know how to make fools of themselves is because they know I am an expert at the job, having been all the kinds of fool there are except the one who blows down the barrel of a shotgun to see if it is loaded. I escaped that by never having had a shotgun. However, I did the best I could with a Fourth of July pistol that used .22 blank cartridges. I placed the nose of the pistol against the palm of my left hand in order to see why the trigger did not work.

Old Doc Thompson dug out the wad and I fainted only once. People who knew me said it was a wonder I had not been biting the pistol barrel to see if it was metal. They should have known that I would not put my mouth to metal on a hot Fourth of July day—I usually did that in zero weather.

The boys out our way, when they wanted to make fools of themselves by freezing their tongues to cold metal, usually stuck their tongues against barn door locks or lamp posts. But I was a bigger fool than that—I stuck mine against an iron pillar that held up a porch two stories above the street, and the only way to get loose was for folks to tear down the building or rip all the skin off my tongue. They let the building stand.

Since then I have discovered—without outside aid—practically every way of making a fool of myself that can cause a man to blush at his own idiocy. The only thing that troubles me in recommending ten really satisfactory ways of making a fool of yourself is deciding which to select and which to leave out. I think the best thing I can do is to pick out ten infallible ways of looking absolutely foolish, and then throw in a few more suggestions for good measure.

Not so long ago, I wrote an article about what a fool I had made of myself in buying stock in a couple of companies that did not have the vigor even to blow up. When I had put some thousands of dollars in them they gave forth a low, hissing sound like that made by a pink rubber pig as it deflates, and simply lay down and expired, like a sick jellyfish. It was a fine article and full of good advice. When it had been printed, several banks and investment concerns asked permission to reprint it and broadcast it as a warning to others not to buy fool stocks.

I TOOK the money the editor paid me for it and bought one hundred shares of oil stock. To get this stock, I had to go to Bowie, Arizona, take a branch train to Globe, Arizona, take another train to Miami, Arizona, and there sit up till three o'clock in the morning entertaining an oil-stock salesman I had never seen before, until he was willing to sell me one hundred shares in an oil company of which I knew nothing. The name of the company was something like "The Oklatexomexokan Oil Company," and it was a sure winner. The trouble with most oil companies, you see, is that they own wells in only one place, and if those wells go flooie the whole thing goes flooie. But that could not happen to this company; it owned one sixteenth of an acre in one place and half a square foot in another and one hundredth of an inch in another, and anybody could see that there was not one chance in a million for all those oil lands to go bad at the same time. Such a thing was impossible. It is also impossible for me to sell the hundred shares for two dollars.

Every sucker has been warned by the wise guy that "A fool and his money are soon parted." But the fool who parts with his money quickly is a mere amateur at the game. It takes a professional to save up his money and then buy icicles with it. I have been that sort of professional most of my life; almost anyone who has shown me an icicle, saying, "How about this for genuine alabaster?" has been able to sell it to me, and all I had left by the time I got home was a piece of wet wrapping paper.

ANOTHER excellent way of making a fool of yourself is to get raging angry on a momentary provocation. I go in for that quite a little, and I find it very efficacious. One night, when I was a young fellow, I was walking down the street on my way to do some work in the office and I passed three fellows, one of whom was eating an apple. When I was ten feet beyond them an apple core hit me in the middle of the back.

It did not jar me much, because I had on an ulster that weighed as much as I did and was an inch or two thick, and under that a suit of clothes and a set of the good old red woolen underwear that would bend but not break. But I was so angry that I turned right around and walked back and drew back my fist and aimed a terrible blow at the face of one of the three. I weighed then one hundred and thirty pounds, and was so strong that if I put my full weight on it I could break the point of a lead pencil, unless the lead was too hard. But I did not hit the young fellow in the face; he drew back his head and I hit him in the neck. His neck was as hard as a locust post, and if I had not had gloves on I would have skinned my knuckles.

As soon as I hit the young man I knew I had made a mistake. I had plenty of anger but not enough velocity for that sort of thing. I had the sort of muscle that takes two blows to swat a housefly—one to stun it and the next to complete the murder. I knew even more certainly that I had made a fool of myself when the light from a store window showed me that the man I had hit was the middle-weight champion of eastern Iowa. He was fairly well celebrated on account of being champion but mostly because of his habit of picking a street fight whenever he could, and then leaving his victim an unconscious wreck with one ear chewed off.

I BELIEVE the reason he did not murder me on the spot was because he had mangled his last six victims so badly that the police had told him he would get six months in jail for his next massacre; but I did not know that then. Friends told me later, when I was in bed getting over my case of nervous prostration. As soon as I saw whom I had hit I walked hastily away and turned into the post office. I had never seen such a vacant post-office lobby, but I managed to open our firm's letter box and take out the contents. It was one blue card and it bore the words "Box Rent Due," and I remained there and read this for a quarter of an hour while the middle-weight champion of eastern Iowa stood in the vestibule glaring at me through the glass. I had just turned the blue card over to read what was on the other side when he became impatient and entered the lobby. He walked up to me.

"Say, what'd you mean, hittin' me in the neck?" he growled at me.

I tried to say something—possibly my prayers—but my Adam's apple got caught on my epiglottis and I could not make a sound.

"I could bust you one that you wouldn't know nothin' for six weeks, see?" he said in an unpleasant tone. "I didn't throw no apple at you. You thought I throwed that core at you, didn't you? Hittin' me like that when I didn't throw no core at you! You got to fix it up with me, see?"

"How?" I managed to say.

"You ought to buy me a glass of beer, anyway," he said.

It was twenty years before I told anyone about that little episode, so I know I made a fool of myself when I let myself get mad enough to hit a prize fighter in the neck; otherwise I would have bragged about it. Nine times out of ten, when you let your anger flare into action or speech you are hitting a prize fighter in the neck, or, more likely, hitting yourself in the face and giving yourself a black eye. You are pretty sure to be some sort of ridiculous figure, whether the person you flare up at is your boss, your wife, or the sharp end of the rocking chair.

I will pass over the original ten great warnings against being a fool that the Ten Commandments set forth, since every sane man knows he is a fool to commit murder, to steal, or to break any of those well-recognized basic rules. But how about the man who sits down to break a record by eating, let us say, six thousand clams or a cord of mince pies?

I remember a Thanksgiving, some years ago, when I ate so much turkey and mince pie that I had to lie on the floor and groan. It was not on a bet; but I had an eating mate, and we just kept each other company in our jaw work. I do think I made a fool of myself by overeating. The other man is dead now, and, oddly enough, he died of acute indigestion. I am still alive, but that is probably because the fool-killer did not find me at home when he called here—I was over in New York overeating at a banquet. I remember what a fool we always thought the man who overloaded his horses; but a man's own insides are more easily wrecked than a horse's are. A man will measure his horse's food to the ounce, and then go in and eat until he is pop-eyed, or pour enough liquor into himself to kill a herd of elephants, and still expect people to think he is a sane human being. The newspapers usually say "No flowers."

AND when it comes to doing things for which a man is not trained, such as the time when I tried to make my first extemporaneous speech—well, you can put that down as the fourth way of making a fool of yourself. As nearly as I can remember, when I made my maiden effort there were two million people present, each with six sets of eyes; and the only word I could remember was "Ah—," so I repeated it until the redness of my face hurt the entire twelve million eyes, and they turned away with loud sneers and talked about the Entertainment Committee very unkindly. So I sat down, and wiped my perspiring face with a piece of lettuce, including the mayonnaise.

Nearly every man who agrees to make a speech takes his reputation for wisdom in his hands and throws it to the wolves. But how a man is to learn to make a speech without making a fool of himself, I don't know. Out at Billings, Montana, in their Rotary Club, they told me they had a system that was pretty sure to cure or kill him. Each man in turn had to make a ten-minute speech at the luncheons, and if he could not speak he had to stand silent during the ten minutes allotted to him. After the second or third period of standing mute, he usually managed to say something.

An equally idiotic way of making a fool of yourself, so equally idiotic that I'm lumping it with speech-making, is "bitin' off more than you can chaw." For instance; Napoleon, a son of sunny Corsica, butted into a Russian winter, and had to walk home to Paris with nothing much left but a couple of chilblains and a lot of experience. Napoleon's dead, but the annals of American business are black with the names of men who threw up jobs they could handle to take positions they could not swing, and who dropped out looking considerably like what you are warned not to call your brother.

I'LL wager that the automobile has taught folks more ways of making fools of themselves than any other modern invention.

What, in the name of all that's sensible, are you making of yourself when you drive your car out on a slippery road without chains, coast down hills past signs which say "Go into second gear;" try to beat the train at the railroad crossing, or strike a match to see how much gas is in the tank?

And what kind of fool is a girl who takes a chance ride with a strange young man who slides up to the curb in a gaudy runabout and a smile? "Thanks for the buggy ride, kind sir." Well, maybe! But more likely than not she'll wear out the soles of her shoes walking home.

Then there is the hurry-scurrying fool who is always flirting with death in order to save a split second of time. Not having any martyr blood in my veins, I feel that the most important thing I can do is to keep alive, because if I die there will be no one else (Continued on page 124)

If You Ask Me:

It isn't what you get that proves you a "sap," but what you pay for it

A WISE man and a foolish one might each invest money in the stock certificates of a wild-cat oil well company, and the first thus prove his wisdom and the second thus prove his folly. The wise man might buy the certificates as scrap paper and the foolish one might buy the stock at par.

The proof of the "sucker" is the price he pays.

There are exceptions, of course. If the lot adjoining your residence is priced too high, and you want it in order to give yourself more elbow room, the fact that you pay more than anybody else would doesn't prove you a "sucker." It isn't poor business to pay what a thing is worth to you, however little it may be worth to anybody else.

The "sap" who is the butt of the world's ridicule is the simpleton who pays more for a thing than it is worth to him.

The word "sap" is used to describe all persons who are foolish, but it is used also to describe anybody held in contempt. Thus the hard worker, the generous man, and the giver of alms are "saps" to the cynical, superficially-clever people who at present so noisily occupy the foreground of American life.

If you are inclined to think yourself a good bargainer and a good judge of values, here is a test by which you may determine whether you have in yourself any of the folly you delight to ridicule:

How much did you pay for what you have? How much do you pay for what you get out of life?

I have a friend who wanted a million dollars and got it; but he paid too much. While he was getting possession of his million, his family went to the dogs.

I know another who had uncommon talent in music. He wanted fame, and paid in advance. He's in a sanitarium now, resting his nerves.

Perhaps you want social leadership in your community. Well, it can be had; but there is a price to pay. I know two "social leaders" who look fagged, and take something at night to make them sleep.

I know a child who is keeping one grade ahead of other children of her age. By keeping ahead she feeds the vanity of her parents; but she pays. There aren't any roses in her cheeks.

The "sap" you scorn because he hasn't all that you have may have examined the price tags and decided the things were too dear.

I am not suggesting that you stifle ambition and desire and deny yourself pleasures. You have but one life to live, and the time to enjoy it is now. The time to take a piece of cake is when the cake is passed.

But when you sit down and order for six without reading the prices on the menu, you are taking considerable risk. Few things are more embarrassing than a bill that is surprisingly large.

It isn't miserly to look at the price tag; it's just common sense.

And, no matter how clever you feel or how sophisticated you are, if you pay Life more than the things you get from it are worth, you are intimately related to the Sap family.

Shooting Stars

By George W. Gray

PHOTOGRAPH FROM YERKES OBSERVATORY

Halley's Comet

ON a clear, cold, Sunday night in February, 1913, two men were tramping the white hills east of Georgian Bay, in Canada. It was shortly after nine o'clock when they stopped to rest, and one was bending down to adjust the straps of his snow-shoes when the other exclaimed in an excited voice, "Look! Look!" He looked, and what he saw was the sight of a lifetime—the stuff that dreams are made of—a story to tell to children and grandchildren.

He saw a fiery red star coursing along the southern sky, moving with stately and unhurried calm. It seemed to drift through the ether without any effort. A long stream of fire sparkled behind and faded at the end to a dull glow like dying embers.

Hardly had this apparition passed when a flock of five other stars followed, moving in mass formation, as though they were attendants upon the more important lead star. They too threw out fiery tails. After them came another and larger group; and the glorious procession continued until four separate fleets of shooting stars had passed. They disappeared into the southeast.

"'Pon my word," said one of the men, describing his sensations on seeing this celestial parade, "I don't think I could have been more surprised if they had swung about and had sailed back into the west, from where they came."

But the meteors sailed straight ahead. By the time they were passing Toronto the lead star had broken into a group of smaller stars, which formed a brilliant luminous mass. Behind this came an enormous white tailless star of extraordinary brightness, followed by a cortège of red stars. Many people in Ontario heard a rumbling like thunder immediately after the passing of the meteors. The ground trembled, windows rattled, as if the earth were in the throes of a 'quake. Other people in the same region reported that they heard no noise and felt no 'quake, though they were thrilled by the magnificence of the heavenly spectacle.

The meteoric fleet passed directly over Buffalo, short-cut across a corner of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and swept through the electric-lighted sky of New York. But if any of New York's millions saw it they never reported the fact.

Pursuing a straight-line course, the meteors sped into the haze of the Atlantic Ocean. When sighted at Bermuda their appearance had still further changed. The white star, which was second when seen near Toronto, was now in the lead, and had broken into two enormous violet-white fireballs. They glowed like arc lights and to the observer seemed as large as the moon.

The meteors were last sighted by an officer on the ship "Newlands" in the south Atlantic, three thousand miles beyond Bermuda, still going strong.

THE sense of awe inspired by the majestic movement of these luminous bodies is indescribable. One man, in reporting his experience, said: "It took nearly three minutes for the stars to pass. It was a pageant of unsurpassable beauty."

Quite in contrast with this celestial spectacle of 1913, which sailed on into the southeast like a fleet of Olympian airships, is the experience of a ranchman near Mazapil, Mexico. "It was about nine o'clock in the evening of November 27th, 1885, and I went out to the corral to feed certain horses," reports the ranchman. "Suddenly I heard a loud sizzling noise, exactly as though something red-hot was being plunged into cold water. Almost instantaneously came a heavy thud. The corral was flooded for a fraction of time with a phosphorescent light, and the air was filled with bright sparks.

"When I had somewhat recovered from my fright I brought a lantern, and found a hole in the ground. In it was a ball of light. Fearing that it would explode, I moved some distance away. After a while I returned, and found in the hole a hot stone which I could barely handle. All night it rained stars; but I saw no others fall to the ground; they all seemed to go out high up."

To-day that "stone," which weighs about eight pounds, is one of the interesting exhibits in the National Museum in Mexico City.

So some meteors sail through the sky, others drop to the earth, and others burn up in the air. But what are meteors? Where do they have their origin? How do they affect the earth? Are they dangerous to human life?

Perhaps every reader of this article has asked himself such questions as he watched a streak of light shoot across the sky, so alive and aggressive in contrast with the familiar friendly stars of the firmament. There is scarcely a

The Comet

By Arthur Guiterman

BEFORE the dawn of mirth
When all were dull and crass,
A Comet struck the earth—
'Twas made of laughing gas.

And folks together hurled
In sevens, nines, and twelves
Got laughing at the world,
Each other—and themselves.

And as they laughed, they saw
What paltry gods of tin
Were those they held in awe,
And oh, what fools they'd been!

They laughed away their hates,
Their cruelties, their lies,
Their ponderous debates,
Their every proud disguise.

A merry thunder tore
The mists that blinded men. . . .
It happened so before,
Why couldn't it again?

I pray for all I'm worth
To see it come to pass—
A Comet strike the earth

Clear night when meteors may not be seen, and at certain seasons they are numerous, and appear in showers. What do these shooting stars, these "wanderers" from the solar system, say to the men who study the heavens and who are wise in the doings of celestial bodies?

It was to ask such questions that I visited the Harvard College Observatory. Since 1924 special researches in meteors have been in progress at this historic astronomical station in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

"Meteors are fragments of matter in space," explained Dr. Harlow Shapley, director of the observatory. "Every day, as the earth whirls along its journey around the sun at the rate of eighteen and one-half miles a second, it encounters millions of these fragments, many of them traveling much faster than the earth. Some of the meteors are scarcely larger than grains of sand. Others weigh many tons. But, whatever the size of the body, it seems to be without light or heat until it strikes our atmosphere.

"The moment the meteor enters the earth's atmosphere, its pace is slowed down by the friction of the air, and its outer surface is heated by the same process. Were it not for our blanket of protecting atmosphere we should be pelted continually by these bodies, for it is conservatively estimated that not less than ten million meteors strike the earth's atmosphere every twenty-four hours.

Nebula in the constellation Cygnus (the Swan) called from its shape, "North America"

"TO THE casual watcher of the sky, meteors may seem interesting only as a display of nature's fireworks. But to the astronomer they are objects of serious study. It may be that some of the secrets of the stars may yet be unlocked to us by these seemingly accidental wanderers into our atmosphere. My own work in astronomy has been almost wholly concentrated on stellar distances and the structure of the sidereal universe. But I am interested in meteors for several reasons," said Doctor Shapley.

"In the first place, they interest me as specimens from starry space. There are many theories of the origin of meteors. Some have tried to account for them as projectiles thrown out by the mountains of the moon ages ago, when the moon was young and its mountains were active volcanoes. Very few astronomers hold to this theory to-day, however. Another hypothesis is that meteors are the débris of planets that have broken up, or are material left over from the birth of our earth.

"Meteors are also explained as fragments of comets—and many meteoric authorities agree that this is a sound theory of the origin of some meteors. It has been discovered that many meteors move in well-defined paths, and in several instances the path of a stream of meteors corresponds to the path of a well-known comet. That curious chunk of material, for example, which fell into the corral at Mazapil and frightened the Mexican ranchman, is believed by many authorities to be a fragment of Biela's comet, which has not been seen since 1852. The paths of the shooting stars seen that night were traced back by astronomers to the orbit of the lost comet, and it seems a safe assumption that Biela's comet broke up into a stream of meteors.

"Allowing for all these explanations, however, there still remain many sporadic meteors which cannot be accounted for as parts of our sun's family. It is fairly definitely proved that they come from the region of the stars."

"How is it proved?" I asked.

"By the velocities of the meteors," answered the astronomer. "Twenty-six miles a second, at our distance from the sun, is called parabolic velocity. It is the best the sun alone can do. We know that when a body moves into our atmosphere at a rate greater than twenty-six miles a second it is traveling in an orbit or path which begins in infinity and extends into infinity. It must come from the stars. Meteoric velocities as high as seventy-five miles a second have been reported."

WHEN you pick up a meteorite—such as may be seen in any one of dozens of museums—it is thrilling to think that you may hold in your hand a piece of a star that disrupted millions of years ago, finally to be captured by our earth.

"There is another possibility as to the identity of these visitors," continued Doctor Shapley, bringing up his second reason for interest. "We find in space not only the separate heavenly bodies which we know as stars, but, in addition, vast clouds of matter called nebulæ. Some of the nebulæ are bright. But there are other nebulæ that give no light. In the southern skies, near the Southern Cross, is one known as the Coal Sack. It is seemingly just a patch of pitch darkness, and was long thought to be starless space, 'a hole in the heavens,' as Herschel phrased it. We know now that it is an enormous mass of matter.

"A third reason why meteors are scientifically significant is found in the opportunity they give to study the upper atmosphere. Explorations have reached the North and South Poles and all the accessible regions of the earth's surface, but little is known of this gaseous blanket which envelops our earth. We are not even sure how high up the atmosphere extends. It is certainly not less than one hundred miles, and may be twice that.

"Into this envelope of gas which encloses us, darts from time to time combustible matter in the shape of meteors. By studying what happens to them in the atmosphere we may get new light on what is happening in far-away stars. Moreover, the information obtained from the study of our atmospheric covering may prove to be of practical value in other fields. It is quite possible that our weather and airship navigation may be affected by the currents, temperature, stratifications, and other conditions of the upper air.

"My final point of interest is the chemical make-up of meteors. Of what is the universe made? Are the stars of the same substance as the earth? Those are leading questions for astronomers and physicists, and the light of more than two hundred thousand individual stars has been analyzed and studied here at this observatory in the effort to answer such questions.

"METEORS which fall to the earth give an opportunity to do more than study starlight. They may be handled, broken into, examined under the microscope, submitted to chemical tests.

"Thus far we have not found any new elements in meteorites; but we have found unique combinations. Meteoric iron has a different texture from manufactured iron, and it is always in alloy with nickel. An extraordinary block of material was found in 1924 embedded in the sands of the Sahara Desert, and its appearance suggested that it was probably a fallen meteor. Analysis showed it to contain a new kind of iron. Heretofore, three kinds of meteoric iron were known. The Sahara block has contributed a fourth, and scientists are awaiting further news of this find with keen interest."

Meteor research at the Harvard College Observatory is centered on photographic records. For forty years that observatory has been taking pictures of the stars almost every clear night. It now has more than three hundred thousand negatives, covering every section of the heavens. Three years ago it was decided to make a systematic search of these photographs to see what meteors might have been caught by the camera (Continued on page 175)

In the center and to the left in this photograph appears one of the most remarkable of the dark nebulæ, situated in the constellation Orion. It is believed by astronomers to be part of an immense dark mass which cuts off the light from the distant stars, and leaves visible only those stars which lie between it and the earth

The trail of a quadruple meteor. A strong magnifying glass used upon the original photograph shows that there are the trails of four individual meteors in this long streak of light, which was photographed at the Harvard Observatory, in Cambridge, Massachusetts, October 3d, 1910. The enlargement of the trail at irregular distances to form curious spindle-like shapes is one of the unsolved meteoric secrets. Whether it indicates explosions of the meteors, or different stratifications of the atmosphere, is a problem which the meteoric astronomers are trying to solve

Getting Away From The Grind

What vacations mean to your health and happiness—Why you should take them, where you should go for them, and how you should act after you get there

By William S. Sadler, M. D.

A MIDDLE-AGED MAN sat in my office the other day and told me the story of his loss of pep. "My brain's acting 'cobwebby'," said he. "I can't think clearly; I'm beginning to lose interest in my work, and I'm making serious business blunders."

In an effort to get to the bottom of his trouble, I inquired: "Do you take regular vacations?"

"I haven't had a real vacation in fifteen years," he replied. "I've been too busy. And I have enjoyed my work so much that it has been play to me. As a matter of fact, I have never had any trouble with my health until the past six months."

After studying this man's case thoroughly, I came to the conclusion that his utter neglect of annual vacations, and his failure to indulge in some fad or hobby at week-ends, were the chief causes for his failing efficiency and depleted store of health energy.

I have discovered that about eighty per cent of my patients take regular annual vacations. The remaining twenty per cent either take a vacation every two, three, or four years, a little extra time off when they are making a business trip of some sort, or no vacation at all. Now, it's my firm belief it is imperative that the American people should form the habit of taking each year a vacation of at least two weeks.

Therefore, right at the beginning of this article, let me emphasize the necessity of having a vacation item in your budget. Vacations are not a luxury; they are, from the health standpoint, a necessity, and the annual vacation should become a matter of fixed habit.

In fact, there are a great many people who would greatly benefit by having two weeks' vacation twice a year. In the case of certain high-strung neurotic individuals, men and women who are not in robust health, those who are over fifty or sixty years of age, I strongly recommend a semi-annual vacation.

When you begin to dream about your work; when you are getting "touchy," and people begin to "get on your nerves," when you lose control of your temper—then it's time to take a vacation.

What do we hope to accomplish when we actually enter upon this annual vacation? I suppose most of us aim for physical benefit. And there is no doubt that, by relieving the physical body of some of the stress and strain it bears throughout the year, we add to its recuperative powers and contribute directly to the prolongation of life. The weekly rest day is, of course, designed to accomplish this purpose; but it is well to augment these periods of relaxation with the annual or semi-annual periods of longer and more marked relaxation, and change of activity.

But the real benefit of a vacation is not just physical—it is more psychologic and neurologic. The break in the monotony of working and living that a vacation affords is its greatest value. Monotony is a deadly influence upon the human mind. By nature, we crave excitement. So if we don't get a reasonable amount of it in a normal fashion some of our less controlled fellow beings are tempted to go after it in questionable lines, whether it be the taking of exhilarating or intoxicating drugs, or the indulgence in unsocial exploits on the border lines of vice and crime. There Many lifelong (Continued on page 181) fore, as variety is essential to human health and happiness, we should plan for it in sane and legitimate channels.

We must not forget the fact that physical sleep is of very little value in resting the mind and nervous centers. Of course sleep serves a purpose as far as the physical recharging of the nervous batteries is concerned; but the real rest of mind comes from change of activity, from play, from doing something we dearly love to do. During a vacation, don't make the mistake of forcing your mind to do something it does not like to do.

ANOTHER valuable thing about a vacation is that it gets us away from our work, and gives us a long-distance viewpoint of what we are doing. As a result, we come back feeling fit for new struggles, increased efforts, and new achievements. Of course it sometimes goes hard for a few days while we are getting back into harness. We are all more or less lazy. But after we have poked ourselves up a bit, things look different. We have new ideas about solving some of our problems. Even the routine affairs of office or home are not quite so wearing as they were before we betook ourselves off for a holiday.

On a vacation you meet new people, view fresh scenes. You create a background for the birth of new ideas concerning your jobs, and for months after you return from a happy holiday you find that you are less conscious of the grind you are in. If tired and overworked housewives could get away from the children for two weeks, how glad they would be to get back, and how much more the children would appreciate Mother!

Another fine thing about a vacation is that it helps you to enjoy your week-end holidays to better advantage. It makes you appreciate the recreational and relaxing opportunities of your shorter periods of rest and change.

A vacation can be so planned and managed as to contribute enormously to one's culture, not to mention the fact that it may also enlarge our capacity for living, thinking, and otherwise enjoying our feelings.

What's Sauce for the Gander is Sauce for the Goose

"MARRIED folks must sit down and work out proper plans and make suitable compromises on this matter of the annual vacation," says Doctor Sadler. "Vacations are made for wives just as much as for husbands, and wives sometimes need them more. I fear men are altogether too selfish about this vacation business. I know any number of men who see to it that they get a vacation once or twice a year, with never a thought about their wives having a vacation. Mother stays home with the children, while Father goes off to recuperate.

"It is always possible to find some place in which each member of the family can enjoy a vacation to his own liking and in accordance with his individual needs. Some can have excitement and change; others can have rest and solitude. They can have the same headquarters, but varying activities."

"Pity and Need Make All Flesh Kin—"

Diamonds

The story of a woman who played the game, even when there was no gallery to applaud

By Margaret Culkin Banning

ILLUSTRATED BY LESLIE L. BENSON

It grew stiller in the room. The street noises below had nothing to do with her, no connection whatever

"YOU'VE got your diamonds, Maud," said Alva admiringly. "They ought to keep you pretty easy in your mind."

Maud looked down at her hands, spreading the fingers apart appraisingly and moving her hand into a vagabond ray of sunlight that strayed through the restaurant window.

"Yes, I've got them," she agreed.

"I've always admired that cluster with the thirteen cut stones. Not that the solitaire isn't a beauty, and the others too. And the bracelets. Where's your bar pin?"

Maud pressed her bosom.

"Inside," she said reassuringly. "But you haven't ordered, Alva. The club luncheon here is always good. Try that marshmallow pudding."

Alva considered. She was a large woman, with a face which showed signs of so much handling that it had become loosened in outline. A stylish woman, with the look of a camp follower of fashion, a hunter in bargain basements.

"I guess I will. You know," she added confidentially, "with these club luncheons it's just as cheap here as anywhere, isn't it? Considering what you get and the service and all."

"Absolutely. It's so near to the apartment that I come here off and on. Gets me out. I don't eat any breakfast. I don't cook anything there much any more. There's a lot of places where you can get a good plate dinner, reasonable too."

"No wonder you keep your looks, without breakfast. You look just about twenty, Maud."

"I don't feel it."

"Of course, you wouldn't, just yet. With the shock. Still, it's a good six months since poor Bill died, isn't it? You still living in that same apartment?"

"Couldn't get rid of it," said Maud. "Bill had one of those prison-term leases, and I couldn't sublet it. It's been a bad winter for things like that in New York. My lease runs out next week, though."

"You'll miss it," said Alva sagely.

Maud shrugged.

"Not me. I'll be glad to be rid of the place. Of course it was nice just at first not to have to make a change, but—" She stopped. "Oh, I don't know, Alva. I never cared much for that apartment. It was Bill's idea. He liked to make a showing, you know, put up a big front. That was Bill."

"HE WAS awfully generous to you, Maud. There's not a woman I know has got such diamonds."

"I know. But when you think of the money he threw around, it makes you kind of sick." She smiled a little bitterly. "I never could get anything put aside, Alva. The best I could do was the diamonds. Not even a stick of furniture to call my own."

Alva's imitation eyebrows went up.

"I thought you owned all that stuff!"

"No. We rented the place furnished. Here's our lunch at last. The club lunch over there, waiter—soup here. And give me the check."

Alva waived conversation and settled herself to the business in hand. The girl opposite sat idly over her soup, watching people drift past.

"Where are you going to live now?" asked Alva. "Say, these scallops are good. Try a few."

Maud shook her head.

"Oh, I can live anywhere. It depends on what I do. That was what I wanted to talk to you about."

"You mean Bill didn't leave you very well fixed? Not that I want to be inquisitive, dearie."

Maud ignored the apology.

"THERE wasn't very much," she said. "It was so terribly sudden. Bill wasn't the kind of person to think about dying, and he never was much on this rainy-day proposition. He had a few bum investments. I've been going over those, cleaning up what I could. There was some insurance; but I had the expenses to meet out of that, and the rent ate a hole into what was left over. And he had a lot of other people's IOU's. But of course I wouldn't try to collect on those. Bill would turn over in his grave if I did. You know how he was."

"Why don't you come back to the beauty parlor? Jensen would take you on in a minute, and the place has been all done over. Nice little booths, fancy colors."

"I don't want to work for Jensen again. I don't want to go back to hotel stuff. You know, Alva," she leaned forward, excitement rising in her pretty face, "this is what I thought: I'd get a little place of my own, up-town. There are some of those shops in good neighborhoods, where you can pick up a good steady trade. Nice people, too. I know a place on Seventy-eighth Street they're about ready to let go cheap. The woman who's been running it had to have an operation, and didn't make a good come-back.

"I thought maybe you'd go in with me, Alva. All we'd need would be a couple of girls for shampoos and manicures, and one of those half-breed barbers who look French. The place could be all done over—pretty, you know, Colonial style or something like that. If we put in a couple of thousand apiece that would do it, machines and all. I've got an option on it, nothing signed up yet. Would you like to see it?"

Alva shook her head.

"The trouble is," she objected, "that it's too big a responsibility. I can get pretty nearly any salary I want from Jensen now, within reason. I do a better permanent than he does, and keep those girls in order, too. And it's clear money. Where, the other way, you carry the whole load. I'd certainly like to, if I could; but I don't see my way clear!"

"WELL, maybe I'm crazy. But I'd like to have something of my own."

Alva's face grew more cushiony with her soft, friendly smile.

"As for that—with your face, dearie—you'll be having a man of your own before very long, no disrespect to Bill intended."

"No. Bill was a dear, but once is enough."

"You just wait a while," said Alva wisely, putting down her fork reluctantly. "Well, I certainly enjoyed myself, dearie. I've hardly caught a glimpse of you these last six months. Next time you're down around the hotel, drop in, and we'll have lunch on me. Can I get a subway at the corner? The bus gets held up so."

"I'll go with you," said Maud, slipping into her coat and taking care of the waiter.

"About that shop," reverted Alva as they went skillfully through the crowds; "you let me know what you do. If you really take the place, and want me with you after you get started, I might leave Jensen. But to go in now would take nearly every cent I've got put by. And I've got my mother, you know, and have to stay pretty sure of my bread and butter. Come in some day next week and let me show you our new shingle. Nothing in New York like it. You've got just the face for it, too."

"I can't, next week. I promised to go and visit Bill's mother for a few days. She lives up-state. She's been at me to come, ever since. I thought when I moved out of the apartment I'd take them the few personal things Bill left."

The subway express shot violently up to them, opening its doors to swallow Alva, and was rushed away on the instant. Maud went up the steps again into the sunlight, and paused, deciding which way to turn. She was tired of window shopping and there was no other kind she ought to do. She turned her steps with reluctance back toward Fifty-third Street and home.

The apartment was on the third floor. A lazy colored elevator boy took her up to that level, and she opened her door as usual to stillness. It had been like that ever since Bill had gone, very still.

Orange sunfast curtains at the windows, the big spongy davenport and chairs that Bill had loved, several tables, a glassed bookcase, with some of the books Bill had bought on trains behind its doors—those were the furnishings which they had rented for three years. The only signs of their occupancy were the stray books, a few ash trays and magazines and, here and there, some burned holes in the carpet and upholstery.

It was a fragment of an old house, this apartment, and between the living-room and the big bedroom was an alley, made into a kind of butler's pantry. There was an electric stove there and a porcelain sink, and above them many glasses, and an incomplete set of dishes. Maud used to get breakfast there when Bill was alive—toast on the electric toaster, eggs in the pan above, and coffee in the percolator. She couldn't do it now. It was too ghostly.

She caught Georgia's eyes once, shifting from the pinhead diamond that still adorned her own finger in memory of her miserable marriage, to the clusters on Maud's hands, and back again, in discouragement

Everyone had always said that it was a great arrangement for evening parties. Maud could almost hear Bill's cheerful laugh now, mixing some concoction—how many hundreds had he mixed to the sound of his own voice, shouting jokes to the guests in the living-room! Bill's friends. They had fallen away like shadows after the funeral—before, many of them—not in unkindness, but because it was Bill who had gathered them together, not Maud.

Behind the pantry kitchen was the bedroom, with the bath opening off it. Against the wall was Maud's trunk, the wardrobe trunk with blue velvet padding. Bill had bought it when they took that trip to Cincinnati, one day when he was flush. Poor Bill, with his sense of living high while you had it, and his sense of height of living taken out in food and theatres and parties and flash automobiles bought on time. Well, she'd got rid of the car, anyway. No more payments on that, and she'd just about broken even on the resale.

She turned the light on over the vanity and looked at herself, not indulgently but critically. According to Alva, ten years of marriage had worn lightly on her; but Maud wanted to be sure. It wasn't that she begrudged those ten years. Only, she'd have to start all over again now, as she had at twenty when she married Bill out of the beauty parlor at the Hotel Morocco.

He was thirty-five then, and so big and honest that she had expected to have a home and all the rest of it, after the elaborate wedding trip was over. But it didn't work out that way. You couldn't do it with Bill. He was city spoiled. He didn't want that kind of thing, and you couldn't put it over on him.

HE'D fallen for her all right. All the clothes she wanted, all the theatres, the silk lingerie and expensive apartments or hotel suites. He was a master automobile salesman, and he did make money. But where was it now, wondered Maud—and a long line of theatre ticket stubs and dinner checks and hat bills and dress bills seemed to form an endless chain in her mind. When you put your finger on the chain, it was dust.

But there was enough health and youth to begin again, thought Maud. As well as the diamonds. Four thousand dollars' worth, according to every jeweler; enough to take care of the beauty parlor investment, even without Alva.

"I told you to follow me," Bill used to say proudly, every time he bought her a new ring, or a bracelet, "and you'd wear diamonds! I told you so when I married you, baby, didn't I?"

He had died after two days of agony. Thinking of that horror, Maud was glad for the thousandth time that she had never let him down about his presents, that, after all, she'd played the game his way, since he wouldn't play it as she wanted to.

She pushed the window to the top, and began putting things into the drawers of the wardrobe trunk. One drawer, the lowest one, was carefully lined with tissue paper. Into it went a curious collection: The two linen sheets she had bought one day, the luster vase, packed in cotton, the three baby pillow covers of real filet, and the baby pillow itself. The little picture which she had looked at for weeks in the gallery window on upper Fifth Avenue, and gone in to price and, finally, very embarrassedly, to buy—which had never hung on the wall in the company of the "French prints" that formed part of the decoration of the "furnished apartment."

It was a small brown etching of birches bending in the wind. She had shown it to Bill, and he had asked her if it came as a premium with the coffee, and told her she was a sweetie but she certainly had no taste in art. There was also the red box, which was, after all, just a red box, so she hadn't shown that to Bill at all.

IT GREW stiller in the room. The street noises below had nothing to do with her, no connection whatever. This was what happened often lately, this awful stillness, the knowledge that nobody would come in, that there was nothing for anyone to come for, nobody to ring the telephone. Hour on hour she had borne the stillness, until she seemed melting into it.

Suddenly it rang—the bell of the telephone—jangling into the quiet as if it were playing a trick upon her hushed nerves. She took it up hurriedly.

"Is Mr. Dudley there?" asked the voice.

"No," said Maud. This had happened often during those first weeks; but it was getting even harder to say it now. "He—"

"Can you tell me when he will be there?" the man went on impatiently.

"Mr. Dudley is dead."

The voice at the other end of the line gave a queer little gasp of astonished embarrassment.

"Why, that's awful. I hadn't heard of it. Who's this, Mrs. Dudley?"

"Yes."

"You don't remember me, probably. This is Mark Wooley—from Schenectady. I was out at your place last winter one night."

Maud remembered vaguely. A tall man who hadn't fitted in very well.

"When did this happen? I'm terribly sorry, Mrs. Dudley!"

"Six months ago. It was angina. He had had a couple of attacks before, but he hadn't guessed what they were."

He wanted to know about it, and she fell back into the little patter of sentences with which she had explained so often what the surface was that lay over the depth of shock and pain.

"I can't tell you how I feel. I came into town to-day and thought I'd look Bill up and have him put me on the trail of a new car. I thought we'd have dinner together, maybe. Isn't it fierce! You never know, do you? How are you getting along, Mrs. Dudley?"

"Oh, I'm all right."

"Living alone?"

"Just now I am."

"Well, you certainly have my deepest sympathy."

He hesitated, and she could think of nothing to say.

"I really feel most apologetic, calling up this way. I'd really like to come out and see you. Or, I wonder if you would like to get out and have a little dinner somewhere. We can go anywhere you say. Now, don't hesitate to turn me down if you feel like it."

"Why, I think it would be nice," said Maud, thinking quickly of the price of a dinner saved. "Only, you mustn't feel you have to ask me or anything like that."

TWENTY she looked that night, as she stood ready to go out, as if her ten extra years had been miraculously and generously canceled by life. She wore black satin, as lustrous as her skin was soft and white; black satin, from the gentle little folded turban of a hat to her slippers with their rhinestone buckles. It was a cheap dress; but it was cleverly cut, and plain, so that against it the diamond bar pin glittered magnificently. She was wearing all her diamonds, because it made her nervous to leave them in the apartment, and she had cleaned them carefully, so that no facet would lose its chance to catch the light. Maud was meeting Mark Wooley at a fashionable restaurant. It seemed better than to have him come to the apartment, and less melancholy.

She wrapped her coat, also of gleaming black with a hint of mauve in the lining, around her, and walked into the anonymity of the side street and over to the Avenue. The magic of the street seemed to steal into her blood with the sense of life and youth and participation, and she caught back the impressions she gave to people as she walked along, so smartly, as if her limousine waited just around the corner.

She had forgotten Mark Wooley's face; but as soon as she saw him it again became familiar. He was good-looking, with the appearance of a man who always bought suits in one place and rarely varied their cut or color, and he had the ill-at-ease manner of a man to whom restaurant dinners with ladies are unusual.

Maud liked him. She put her white, diamond-heavy little hand in his and took the sympathy he offered, guessing from the somewhat started deference in his manner that he had underestimated her beauty and charm. Maud let him manage the party. Back in the old beauty parlor days, it had been necessary for her to know a good deal about men, about their vanities and simplicities and evasions, and the way lights and food and the sense of being isolated in a crowd with a woman went to their heads.

SHE knew that Wooley felt that stirring attraction, before he knew it, by the way his eyes stayed on her face and by his eager, serious talk about life and death, and his business and the way he lived, alone in Schenectady. But she felt, too, the check somewhere in his admiration, the resistance in Wooley to his own mood.

"Must be lonely for you," he said, as they grew deep in confidence.

"It's awful, sometimes." She felt it again, that pressing quiet, and tightened her lips. "Awful."

"You've been used to a lot of gayety too. How Bill did like a good time! I remember that party at your apartment, and how dumb I felt!"

Maud had always felt dumb at those parties too. But she didn't say so. It didn't seem quite loyal. She only laughed.

"You weren't," she denied.

"Yes. I'm that kind of fellow. Heavy leather, you know." She caught his eyes rather intensely on her face, on the rift of white throat that came above the black satin. They fell to her hands and the diamonds. "It's good of you to waste time on a person like me, Mrs. Dudley. I'm not used to much of anything. Up there in Schenectady a fellow gets a house, a garden, a good substantial car that he runs five or six years, and calls it a day. I suppose we live a month on what it sts to live a day down here. Up there, think I've got something, you know. ome down here, and rub up against some the people and the cars, and it doesn't el like much."

"Oh, a lot of this is bluff—don't fool urself."

He looked smilingly at the diamonds. "They're not fake, are they?"

With her sixth sense of perception of men, Maud could tell that he was thinking her a luxury-loving woman, a woman wanting gifts and jewelry and expensive apartments, and getting them

"No—they're real enough!"

She had a sudden impulse to tell him ow wrong he was. He took the diamonds s the index of her, and imagined the rest f her living built to that scale. She anted to tell him that the diamonds ere all she had, and that the house and arden in Schenectady, the occasional ar, the trip to New York now and then, eemed wealth to her. But she didn't. he sat there in her black satin dress and oked rich and petted, and smiled the weet, reluctant smile that made men ant to be with her.

"Bill was certainly devoted to you," aid Mark Wooley. "I remember that ight he asked me to come out how he as talking about you, and what a beauty ou were, and how he couldn't do enough or you."

HIS eyes were again on the diamonds. With her sixth sense of perception of nen, Maud could tell that he was thinking er a luxury-loving woman, a woman anting gifts and jewelry and expensive partments, and getting them. She hated aving that thought of her, and especially aving this man think it, because of his indliness and his respectfulness and the bvious innocence in his talk. She opened er mouth to speak. But no, she couldn't how Bill up.

"Bill certainly was good to me," she aid.

Mark suggested a theatre, but that was ne sign of mourning she had pledged erself to in the oblivious city—staying way from shows, the amusements Bill ad loved best. So they took a taxi and et down the top, though Mark was olicitous about the possibility of her eing cold. For two hours they drove bout the magic city, and its beauty nally drove them to silence; but they hared the silence.

It was after eleven when he left her t her impressive apartment door, a little disheveled from the ride, but all the prettier for that and for the wind color under her rouge.

"I'm afraid it's been a dull evening," he said.

"No, indeed," said Maud.

"You've been awfully good to come out with me. I know how much brighter your usual crowd is."

Maud thought of that crowd, dissolved into space now, but held her peace.

"Good night," he said; "and—" His eyes fell on her rings as he took her hands, and he checked himself. "Good night, and thank you again for coming."

"Good night," answered Maud. She watched him run down the stairs. She knew he was going away, that he would have no reason for coming back, that he had misunderstood her completely.

She went in to meet the stillness, and, pulling on the light above the vanity, sat down before it. Suddenly she stripped the rings from her fingers, the bar pin from her breast, the bracelets from her arm and, tossing them in a twinkling heap under her p llow, threw herself on the bed face downward.

THERE was nothing rustic about the Dudley house, where Bill's mother lived, nothing in the least picturesque. It was old and shabby without gaining any dignity from its age, a stupid wooden house that had always been stupid. Yet Maud had not been in the house more than a few hours before she discovered how intensely Mrs. Dudley respected her home. She found out many things in the first few hours, including the strange feelings of Bill's family about her.

IT HAD never occurred to her until then that the Dudleys had any definite attitude toward her. She had seen her mother-in-law only twice; once when they had stopped at this house for a few hours during their dashing wedding trip, and once at the undertaking parlors from which they had buried Bill, when the elder Mrs. Dudley had wept bitter, passionate tears.

Maud had cried too, but more in pity that Bill's good times were over than in actual grief at the loss. As for his people, they had never really seemed to belong to Bill, but to be somehow accidental in his life; to be remembered at Christmas with some expensive gifts, and that was about all. They had never spent any holiday with the Dudleys. It was always around holiday times that Bill made his biggest sales, and there were always parties to celebrate the sales.

Yet here were the Dudleys, and now Maud was finding (Continued on page 117)

Keep Your Ear To The Ground—You May Learn Something!

Believing that the human race was given ears for use rather than for adornment, John G. Lonsdale "listened in" on commercial needs and met them—In pursuing this policy he built a railroad, opened a brokerage office, and put on its feet a tottering bank that is to-day one of the greatest financial institutions in the Southwest

By William S. Dutton

WHY doesn't somebody build a railroad between Little Rock and here?" demanded folks in Hot Springs, Arkansas, thirty-odd years ago.

John G. Lonsdale, at that time, wasn't yet twenty years old, and he hadn't capital enough to buy even a second-hand caboose. Nevertheless, he built the desired railroad! That road—the Little Rock and Hot Springs Western—is still in operation to-day.

Millionaires and multi-millionaires spent vacations at Hot Springs—such men as John W. Gates, Ogden Armour, Cudahy, of packing fame, the Moore brothers, Leeds. The stock markets of Chicago and New York rose and fell on the words of these men.

"Why," they demanded, fretting about the lobbies of the Hot Springs hotels, "doesn't somebody run a direct telegraph wire into this place and open a first-class brokerage office?"

"All right," said young Lonsdale, and got busy. He established the direct wire and opened the first-class office. It was not long before the firm of J. G. Lonsdale and Company was one of the most famous west of the Mississippi, with an office in New York. More than once Wall Street hesitated—"pending word from Hot Springs." And John Lonsdale had not yet touched thirty!

Twelve years ago the great National Bank of Commerce, in St. Louis, was tottering. In a single stroke it had to charge six million dollars in questionable assets off its books, something few other banks in America had done up to that time and continued in existence.

"Get Lonsdale!" suggested a director who had millions swaying in the balance.

So, one morning, Lonsdale quietly hung up his hat and coat in the National Bank of Commerce, as its president. He was forty-three, already a figure in Wall Street, where he had been earning two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars a year. But in the city of St. Louis he was virtually a stranger.

Before five years had passed a St. Louis newspaper said of this stranger: "Come to think of it, we'd about as soon have John Lonsdale as a new free bridge, a great factory, a new Forest Park, or a new Art Museum. He is one of the most valuable assets St. Louis has acquired in fifty years."

They Also Serve Who Only Sit and Watch

MR. LONSDALE relates this incident: "Once a woman said to me in despair: 'My husband is fighting for his business life, and I have to sit helplessly by, because of my ignorance of his affairs.'

"'Madam,' I answered, 'he would have quit long ago but for one help that you've given unstintingly. That help has been your faith in him. It is due to your faith that he is fighting.'

"I believe that more victories in this world have been won at its firesides than on its battlefields. Behind more than one brilliant achievement tands the faith of one, perhaps humble, who could only sit by and watch."

How did John Lonsdale become such a valuable asset?

By keeping his ears open to expressed needs, and meeting those needs. By doing what other folks kept wondering why somebody did not get busy and do. Every day in your own circle you hear—"Why doesn't somebody start this?" or, "Why doesn't somebody build that?" In his circle Lonsdale has been that Somebody!

A mighty approachable Somebody, I found him. A lot of these big bankers stow themselves away in some inaccessible sanctum, every passage to which is barred by a member of the Royal Guard. But not John Lonsdale. One of the first things he did when he became a bank president was to reverse the usual order: he established the stenographers in the private offices and put the bank's officialdom out into the open. Lonsdale himself took a desk within hailing distance of the main door.

I was told of a visitor to the bank who asked to see Mr. Lonsdale's secretary. The person to whom the inquiry was addressed explained, in a drawl as broad as Dixie, that the secretary was very busy at the moment, and couldn't possibly be disturbed.

"Perhaps I could do something, sir," he suggested.

"I want to see Lonsdale," snapped the visitor. "Who are you?"

"Lonsdale, sir," was the answer. "My secretary won't object. Come right in, sir."

He is more accessible than the bank janitor, and he doesn't care a straw about the cut of your clothes or the size of your pocketbook. As an Arkansan might put it, "Jawn keeps the dawgs tied and the gate hinges greased."

"Why shouldn't I?" he wants to know. "If a man has enough faith in me to trust me with his money, I reckon that I ought to be ready to trust him with some of my time. I'm complimented every time a man comes through that door. If they didn't come we wouldn't have a bank."

That's Lonsdale!

Born in Memphis, in 1872, he comes of heroic stock. When the scourge of yellow fever swept up the Mississippi from the Gulf in the late seventies, it took one of its greatest tolls in Memphis. Panic seized the city. By the hundreds and thousands the inhabitants fled, until business stood idle and homes empty. Yellow fever was then still a medical mystery, and before it (Continued on page 130)

John G. Lonsdale

JOHN G. LONSDALE, since 1915 president of the National Bank of Commerce, St. Louis, has spent a good part of an interesting life in doing things that seemed impossible. One of these undertakings was the building of a railroad without capital after the road was nearly wrecked by a man whom he had trusted. Mr. Lonsdale was born in Memphis, Tennessee. Left an orphan at the age of six, when his father and mother gave their lives in helping to conquer a yellow fever epidemic, he went to live with an uncle, first in Kentucky and later in Arkansas. For ten years before he went to St. Louis he was a partner in the banking and brokerage firm of Logan and Bryan, New York. He is shown here with his son.

LAKE WESSERUNSETT (right) in Central Maine, to which more than three thousand people come every week during the summer season to see famous actors play in the Lakewood Theatre.

HERBERT L. SWETT, manager (left), and Howard Lindsay, director (right), of the Lakewood Players at Lakewood Park, near Skowhegan, Maine. The accompanying article tells how the pergola in the background played an interesting part in the development of Lakewood. It has taken Mr. Swett twenty-seven years to change a shabby amusement park into the beautiful Lakewood Park of to-day.

THE theatre (above and left) at Lakewood Park, "the playground of Central Maine." The windows, hung with gay cretonne, and filled with flowering plants, open on the forest instead of on Broadway; but the theatre is well equipped with all the modern aids to dramatic production. It will seat seven hundred and fifty persons. A new play is put on each week, with freshly painted scenery and new settings, made by the company's own scene painter and carpenter.

Broadway Comes To Lakewood!

In a Maine woods theatre, six miles from the nearest town, a group of Broadway stars produce high-class plays every summer season—Capacity crowds at each performance prove Herbert Swett's belief that "the best is none too good" for country folks

By Allan Harding

THE final curtain had fallen; and the audience, still laughing over the comedy which had just ended, was moving slowly toward the exits. It was the first night of a new play by Howard Lindsay and Bert Robinson, familiar figures in the metropolitan world of the theatre.

The cast, headed by Arthur Byron, was a striking one. Even the "Voices Off Stage" were the voices of actors well known on Broadway. The settings were carefully built; the scenery excellently painted. The house was crowded and the audience enthusiastic.

In short, the whole atmosphere was that of a typical Broadway production in a first-class New York playhouse.

But—when the spectators reached the exits they did not step out into the blaze of the Great White Way! No clanging of street cars or hooting of taxicabs assailed their ears! And although it was early in August no wave of heat met them at the wide-open doors.

Instead, they passed from the brightly lighted theatre straight into the velvety darkness of the Maine woods. Through the trees came a cool breath of wind from a lake, whose little waves could be heard swishing softly along the shore. The noise and heat and glare of New York seemed a million miles away.

It was an extraordinary experience. Imagine seeing first-class actors produce first-class plays in a well-appointed theatre away up in the Maine woods! And not for one night only, but six nights a week for a season of thirteen weeks! Some of the fish stories from those same Maine woods are easier to believe.

And here is something else which will tax your credulity. This theatre seats 750 persons. Many nights the company plays to capacity houses! The weekly attendance averages 3,500; almost 600 a night. Yet the theatre is six miles from the nearest town.

"Then where do the audiences come from?" you demand.

The answer is that they come from as far as seventy-five or even one hundred miles away; from the Canadian border on the north to Portland on the south; from Bangor on the east to the New Hampshire boundary on the west.

If you want to measure the appeal of this unique theatre, look at a map of the region from which it draws its audiences. Much of that region is wilderness. Other portions are sparsely settled. There are many towns and villages, to be sure; but, taken all together, they do not contain as many people as you will find within a mile or two of a Broadway theatre any night of the season.

When Governor Brewster came to this playhouse in the heart of the woods he declared that it ought to be called "The Mousetrap." He was thinking of the familiar saying, that if any man builds even a better mousetrap than other men have built, the world will make a pathway through the wilderness to his door.

PEOPLE do come, some of them actually through the wilderness, to the door of this theatre. And they come because one man has had the vision, courage, and patience to create something that is worth the journey. The Lakewood Theatre is only one detail, although it is the most unusual one, in the vision he has been striving, for twenty-five years, to realize.

A man with less courage and less patience would long ago have lowered his aims. But Herbert Swett has stuck to his conviction that there are people everywhere, and a great many of them, who want the really fine things of life; the things which are fine, mentally, morally, and physically.

The story of the Lakewood Theatre begins with this one man; but it does not end with him. Into it come other characters: the men and the women who, by their eagerness for the really fine things of life, have justified his faith in them.

The story begins about twenty-five years ago, with a chance meeting between two young men at Bowdoin College, in Brunswick, Maine. One of them, Mr. Briggs, was already a graduate. The other, Herbert Swett, was just about to receive his diploma.

Briggs, who was a woolen manufacturer, had married the daughter of General Shepherd, one of the leading citizens of Skowhegan. Not long before the Commencement Week meeting between the two former college friends, General Shepherd had died. His son-in-law, Briggs, was temporarily managing the business interests of the general's widow.

It was a burden he could not carry indefinitely, and he was looking for someone to whom he could entrust it. Swett, in his management of various college activities, had proved himself able, energetic, and loyal. So Briggs asked him what he was going to do after graduation.

"Haven't decided," was the answer.

"Why don't you come to Skowhegan and take charge of Mrs. Shepherd's business affairs?" said Briggs.

They talked the matter over; and as a result of that chance meeting, the young Bowdoin graduate undertook the management of the Shepherd estate.

Among the interests involved was a street railway property owned by the Somerset Traction Company; and one of its assets was a small amusement park on the shore of Lake Wesserunsett, then called Hayden's Pond, six miles from Skowhegan.

This car line served the country folk who lived near it. But its chief revenue in summer was the nickels paid by the townspeople for their outings at the park.

It hardly deserved to be called a "park" when Herbert Swett first saw it. The lake shore at that point was low and swampy. As one approached by the road, the only "view" was the ugly rear of a cheap hotel, decorated with ash heaps and garbage cans. The amusement devices were crude; the grounds littered and unkempt.

At one side stood a bare, barnlike theatre which would seat a few hundred people. Inside and outside, it was about as ugly as it possibly could be. But to the young man who, even then, had a firm faith in the finer instincts of human nature, this old barn of a building suggested far-reaching possibilities.

Admission to the theatre for people who rode on the electric cars was but a nickel, while those who lived in the Grove were admitted for ten cents.

AT THE time of Swett's advent, in 1901, a summer stock company had been engaged to present plays in this theatre, under the direction of James Durkin, an experienced stock actor.

You can imagine how much money, or, rather, how little, the players received when the admission was only a dime or less. Yet they put in the season there and did as good work as was then possible.

There are two groups of characters in this story who share the honors with Mr. Swett; and I am going to pay my respects to one of these groups right now.

This summer will be the twenty-seventh consecutive season of the Lakewood Players, which is believed to be the longest uninterrupted record of any stock company in the United States.

Now, I want to ask you to analyze your feeling about actors in general, to place beside this feeling the facts concerning the Lakewood Players, and to see whether they agree.

Isn't it true that actors seem rather artificial to you? Don't you think of them as caring only to be in the limelight of the stage, to breathe (Continued on page 144)

The Hill Of Two Names

"A woman is a woman, born East or West—"

By Wallace Smith

ILLUSTRATED BY STOCKTON MULFORD

THERE was a good deal of talk through the county when Marjory left David Harleigh. There was a good deal of talk, anyway, that year. For it was the year that the bottom dropped out of the wheat market.

Fortunes were erased as quickly as a child's arithmetic sum is wiped off a slate. Splendid homes were sold or mortgaged, to meet financial crises. There had been bargains in luxurious, shiny automobiles that season, had there been enough money to take advantage of a bargain. Sons and daughters were recalled from schools in the East.

There was a lot to talk about in the county, the life of which was its great wheat fields. But it was Marjory's desertion of David over which women whispered most, and over which men shook their heads. Fortunes built on wheat must fall when wheat fails. Fortunes come and go in the wheat country—but not wives.

Wives in the wheat country may sigh a little over the surrender of recently accustomed luxuries; or weep a little. But they do not run away. They stand by their men, steady them, and help them make ready to renew the struggle with the cruel, golden earth.

"But she quit," the county accused. "Marjory Harleigh came when Dave was rich and life was soft. And she ran away when he went broke. Poor Dave!"

IT WAS a long time before the county heard all of the story of Marjory's strange desertion. Even to-day it is not clear as to some of the facts. For instance, the scene between Dave and Marjory in the Harleighs' big home in Wendelville, the metropolis of the Oregon wheat country. Harleigh had bought the house—for her—the year before.

It was not big Dave Harleigh's way to bother her with the details of his misfortune. She knew, though, that the house had been sold to meet the last of his obligations. She knew that he was going back to the Harleigh ranch, at the far edge of the county, to start all over again—plowing and sowing: long, monotonous labor.

She must have sensed in her silent husband his shame at personal failure, a shame he felt most strongly before her. Yet good men are smashed with those less thrifty, when times go wrong in the wide country—whether it's wheat or cattle or sheep.

On that last night, in the snug library of their home, it was almost as if she faced a stranger. Harleigh kept aloof in the mantle of his hurt and his pride. He came to where she sat under a shadowy lamp. For a moment her heart beat a little wildly. But when he bent over her it was to place a packet of currency on the arm of her chair.

"There's five thousand dollars," said Dave Harleigh. "That's all there's left. It's yours."

She didn't understand. He hurried on. It was as if he were reciting a carefully rehearsed speech.

"It's all right," said Harleigh. "It's money I've had laid aside ever since I brought you out to this country. You can take the car too. A big car like that will be no use to me on the ranch."

"But, David dear—"

"I'm going back to the ranch alone," he declared. "It's going to be a tough game. Hard enough for a man; but impossible for a woman. And a woman like you—"

She was very pale.

"You don't want me, David?"

"I want you to go back East." His voice was emotionless, mechanical. "When I brought you out here I was fool enough to think I could make you happy and comfortable. Forgive me. Now it's back to the dust and sweat and dreariness of the ranch."

He raised his hand, like an automaton, to stop her when she tried to speak.

"I've thought it all out, Marjory. I know this country. It's best you go back. As soon as you can. To-morrow. You can leave in the car, as if you were only going for a drive, and take the train somewhere down the line. It'll save talk. I'll stay here a couple of days and clear up the last of my business."

IN THREE days he started for the ranch, in the saddle and on the back of his favorite horse. There wasn't the old elation though, feeling the big buckskin under him. Dave Harleigh, so silent and

"Yes, it's the best way," thought Dave. "It's best—but it's going to be mighty lonely without her!"

"But David's men are loyal, aren't they?" Her eyes were glowing. It made Uncle Jud a little bold so sure of himself, was remembering the scene in the library.

Marjory had been so very pale. She had been sensible, though. No woman's nonsense of words. She had taken the package of bills. She had even managed to smile, the next morning, when she said good-by.

The ears of the buckskin twitched back for the sound of Dave's voice. The big horse was climbing the long, lazy hill which is known by two names in eastern Oregon. Neither of these names is essential to this story. From this hill of two names one looks down and across the great crazy-quilt of the wheat country; upon an allegory of a nation's wealth and strength. Other fertile fields show a green as prosperous as the color of a fresh dollar bill. But here is the color of gold—a hue as mellow and as metallic as a gold piece newly minted.

The dullest mind, from the crest of the hill of two names, must be inspired by the endless, heroic panorama. Wheat and the color of gold. The food of the world. The stuff for which nations tear at each other's throats. A mighty romance, this vision of growing wheat.

THE big buckskin halted on the crest of the hill of two names. His great head pointed far across the plain. There was home and good pasture and sweet water for the buckskin. From the distance came a crimson reflection. The sinking sun, discovering a hidden rill.

Quickly and daintily, the horse's hoofs picked the trail down the hill. There were still miles to go.

The crimson glint of the sun had marked the creek on the Harleigh ranch. The creek was dry three months of the year. The ranch-house itself was lost in its background. It was the color of the brown-gray earth around it. For days on end a patient, pitiless wind blows across the wheat country. It sifts a brown-gray powder everywhere. The dust drifts, like fine snow, under doors and through window frames. After three days of dust-laden wind, every living being on the ranch takes on the color of the earth.

The Harleigh ranch-house had been there for fifty years. Ten years before that, Colonel Harleigh had settled on the bank of the little creek. There had been no yellow haze over the country when the colonel drove his ox-team across the hill of two names. Nor can it be said that the colonel was possessed of the long vision traditionally ascribed to pioneers.

As a matter of fact, the colonel had planned to go many a day's march farther into Oregon. But Fate stepped in. Fate in the guise of Elmira, the colonel's off-ox. Elmira had been a rebel since the beginning of the journey from Illinois. At this particular spot he bellowed his last, reproachful protest—and died.

It meant the end of the march. The next morning the colonel shaped a tent out of his canvas wagon cover. He set out some poplars. The West is still rich with the poplars that the pioneers brought with them as reminders of home. The colonel also unshipped a primitive plow. Thus it was that the name of Harleigh came to be written large across the pages of wheat-field history.

David Harleigh was the colonel's grandson. In the fall of the year that wheat soared to a record price, David Harleigh took the reward for which he and his father and his grandfather had toiled at Dry Creek. Since his boyhood, David had taken his place with the hired hands. He was thirty when the big year came to the wheat country.

Thirty and a full figure of a man, deep of chest, broad of shoulder, and lean of flank. He had grown powerful under a burden of hard work that would have torn down the body of a lesser man. The mark of the wide plains was in the Indian bronze of his face and the weathered edge of his gray eyes.

At thirty, there had grown on him a habit of silence, almost grim silence. This had come from an accustomed, chosen solitude—a way of keeping his emotions and his problems to himself. He gave his words to few men and his thoughts to fewer.

THE only man who approached his confidence was Jud Rolland, his ranch foreman. And Uncle Jud's liberty was that of an old retainer. Jud Rolland had worked for Dave's father. He even had a memory of the pioneer colonel.

Jud and Dave kept house together, in the haphazard way of bachelors. That, of course, was before the coming of Marjory.

"You're just like your paw," Uncle Jud told Dave. "Close-mouthed as a sprung bear-trap. Just got to think things out by yourself."

"It's a poor man," replied Dave, to the familiar complaint, "who can't make up his mind without help."

"But sharin' your troubles with a friend," argued Uncle Jud, "lightens the load you're packin'."

"That's a pretty sentiment," Dave smiled grimly, "even if it isn't any truer than sentimental sayings are likely to be. Nobody's going to tote your troubles for you, or any part of 'em. All you've got rid of is words—and that kind of words don't weigh very much."

"Your paw was just that mule-headed too," sighed Uncle Dave, and hurried to the stove to rescue the scorching beans.

Uncle Jud spoke another worry on the day when Dave Harleigh came riding back to the ranch-house after a final trip of inspection around his property. That was the year of the record wheat. Uncle Jud knew that Dave Harleigh had become a wealthy man. It worried him.

Dave came into the house and was in the midst of washing up before he spoke.

"Work's done for this year," said Dave. "I'm leaving you in charge of the ranch for the winter. I'll be back long before spring planting."

"Now that you're rich," offered Uncle Jud, "I reckon you'll likely go in town to live, and learn to ride one o' them postage stamp saddles. Likewise as not, you'll join the country club, and play this golf game in cute knee panties."

Dave laughed and threw the towel at him, a towel the color of unbleached linen, which this towel was not. The wind had been blowing steadily for three days.

"Slander me like that again," said Dave, "and you and I are going to tangle some, Uncle Jud. You know what I've always thought about soft living in Wendelville. Well, I haven't changed my mule-headed mind about that. Not a little bit."

"But you're pullin' up stakes here at the ranch?"

"Just for a vacation. I'm going East. To New York and places like that. I'm going to see if the sun really comes up there, instead of across the Utah line. And I'm going to look at the little fishes in the Aquarium, and ride on top of a bus, and see the latest moving pictures."

"Them Eastern cities is plumb wicked, Dave," this was a new worry for Uncle Jud. "Remember I was East once myself—to Kansas City."

IT WAS in New York that Dave Harleigh met Marjory. She was there, studying music. She went with him to the Aquarium. He went with her to concerts. They were married in the East that winter, after Dave and she had visited her family in Connecticut.

That visit had been Dave's idea. It seemed to him the honorable thing to do. Marjory smiled at the frank simplicity of her capable, big lover. She was far from fully measuring, in his quiet insistence, his long habit of deciding things his own way.

Strange communications disturbed Uncle Jud back in Oregon. Almost gossipy letters they were, considering the mule-headed, silent one who had written them.

Uncle Jud was ordered to get the old ranch-house in order for its new mistress. A new kitchen range, first of all. Some rugs and pictures and curtains and things. If the job stampeded him, Uncle Jud might get the wife of a neighboring rancher to help him. Uncle Jud could look after getting the house painted, single-handed. He was also to make a special trip to Portland to buy a piano—a grand piano. And see about engaging a maid.

There was one remark in Dave's letters that Uncle Jud scowled over in the days of "fixing-up" for the home-coming of the rancher and his bride.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

"It won't be for long," wrote Dave; "but I want it comfortable as money can buy while she's there."

Uncle Jud couldn't make it out.

"I hope he ain't took to them Eastern notions too tumultuous," he mused, "and is figuring on a divorce before he's hardly pitched."

Uncle Jud scorned the suggestion of feminine assistance in decorating the ranch-house. He bought rugs that were no less pictorial than the pictures he selected at the Wendelville Artcraft Shoppe. The pride of his artistic purchasing was a hand-colored reproduction of a painting called "The Dying Warrior." It depicted a naked Indian, on the point of collapse, clinging to a pony that cringed before a blizzard.

"Which I sure do approve of those sentiments a heap," said Uncle Jud, whose career dated to the days of Indian raids.

The purchase of the piano became a ceremony. If Dave wanted a grand piano, like he wrote, Uncle Jud would get the grandest to be had at any price. He made up his mind to one such as he had seen on the memorable journey to Kansas City. A piano with a stained-glass front that lighted up when you dropped a nickel in it and disclosed, to magic, mechanical strains, an idyll of swans in a placid pool and trees and a castle in the background.

"It'll cost a heap," reckoned Uncle Jud, "to keep feeding it nickels; but Dave's rich now."

At the store in Portland, he was mightily disappointed to learn that Dave had preceded him with a letter to the store owner. So it was really the owner who selected the piano. A rangy sort of instrument that looked swaybacked and too heavy in the hocks, to Uncle Jud's way of thinking. He revenged himself on the store owner by deploring the store's utter lack of really grand pianos of the Eastern, or Kansas City type.

"Which it's funny what a difference a woman makes between two men," mused Uncle Jud, bound homeward again. "Dave trusts me to run the ranch regardless. But he won't let me buy a piano, because it's for her. I'll bet from now on we have to keep shaved up at the ranch."

JUD put off the house painting until just before the spring day when Dave and the new Mrs. Harleigh were to reach the ranch. The day the painting was done, and while it was still sticky, the wind began to blow. Maliciously, it whipped up its cargoes of powdery, brown-gray dust. Three days of this. At the end of that time the Harleigh ranch-house, which for almost a day had been creamy white with long, green blinds, was again the drab color of the earth.

Dave was disappointed—but not Marjory. She hushed him when he tried to explain.

"I'm glad, David," she told him. "I'd rather have it just the way it was when you lived in it alone."

Uncle Jud beamed at her praise for his efforts within the house. Her first glance at the pictorial rugs and the vivid pictures on the wall he translated as surprise. Marjory was surprised. She was more than that—she was downright startled. But so tactfully did she gloss the nature of her astonishment that, before the inspection was over, Uncle Jud was apologizing handsomely for the somber appearance of the piano and was describing the instrument with which he would have gladdened her eyes.

WHEN she had gone to the newly-curtained bedroom to change her traveling clothes, and the two men, a little embarrassed, walked outside the house, Uncle Jud gave Dave his enthusiastic verdict.

"She's great—and she sure's got elegant taste," declared Uncle Jud. "But, what's more, she's a thoroughbred. Like your maw was an' your gran'maw before her."

Dave smiled graciously. But a little more grimly, with a shade of the manner that Uncle Jud knew better.

Uncle Jud

"But she's not going to live here," Dave's voice was grave, "and die here, the way they did."

"What's the matter with this ranch?" demanded Uncle Jud. "We can get the house painted again."

"But we can't paint out the loneliness," answered Dave.

"You and me never was lonely," argued Jud. "An' it'll be livelier'n ever now, with her here."

"It's different for a woman, Jud."

"But your maw was a woman—an' your gran'maw."

"They were different, too. They were pioneer stock. Traveling in a prairie schooner or starting a home in the wilderness was their life. They were used to loneliness—or they took loneliness as they took the rest of their hardships."

"Dave Harleigh," pronounced Uncle Jud. "It sounds to me like you're fixin' to be mule-headed about somethin' again."

"I've thought it all out," said Dave.

"That settles it!" mourned Uncle Jud.

"You see, women like Marjory belong to a different day." It was a lot of explanation for him to be making. "They're used to neighbors closer than ten miles away. They're used to having cultured folks around, and music and nice clothes and theatres, and things like that."

"Feeling that way," Uncle Jud asked, "why did you bring her here to the ranch at all?"

"She wouldn't have it any other way," declared Dave. "She said she wanted to live the way I'd always lived—"

Uncle Jud fairly crowed.

"What'd I tell you?" he exulted. "She's thoroughbred, that's what she is. It ain't so easy making up your mind, is it, when there's someone to make it up for you?"

Dave smiled at this too.

"Oh, I'm married—but I'm not that married. I can still decide things for myself. I don't object to Marjory having a mild taste of life on a ranch. But by the end of one of our summers she won't think there's much romance to it. She'll be glad enough then to go back to city life."

DAVE HARLEIGH had been right. That summer in the wheat country was better for crops than it was for romance. And it was not especially good for crops.

There was not so much as a sigh of complaint from Marjory. Before summer closed down, like a suffocating blanket, on the country, there was spring. Days of clean-washed, blue skies, when Dry Creek sang a song of snows that it had learned on Blue Mountain. Crisp nights, when the stars hung so close that they seemed just over the top of the ranch-house.

Marjory had always wanted to own a little pig. Dave bought her a dozen of them. Tiny black fellows, with wide stomachers of pinky-white. Chickens, too. Barred Plymouths and clean Wyandottes. She was immensely proud of the first eggs served from her poultry yard. Dave made a great show of pride, too, in this accomplishment of her chickens, and attached a cheerful importance to the "hen ranch."

Just a shade clumsily, perhaps. It was as if she were a child, playing house. She was glad when the maid left to take a position in the Wendelville Beauty Shoppe. Marjory said nothing of the departure to David.

He was away from the ranch-house, and at work in the fields, for long hours during the day. When he came home, the evening of the maid's departure, Marjory had dinner ready for him and Uncle Jud. Both of them (Continued on page 106)

Diogenes Had The Right Idea!

An interview with a great business leader

By Irving Bacheller

Matthew Scott Sloan, president of the Brooklyn Edison Company, and one of the best-known business men in the country. Mr. Sloan tells in this interview what he considers the biggest thing in business—and the hardest to locate

THIS is the best true story that has come to my ear since, many years ago, I became a humble listener in the great human caravan. A distinguished Captain of Industry was sitting with me at meat.

I said: "In 1901 you were graduated from the Alabama Polytechnic Institute. You were a kid of twenty. You are now only forty-five. If we cancel your acknowledged talents, what is the chief remaining factor in your career?"

"Honest and loyal helpers," he promptly answered. "A big business enterprise is like an army in the field. If you are to win victories there can be no treason in your staff.

"I was thirty-seven years old when I was chosen for the job I hold. I was young for so much responsibility. My first shock came with the discovery that one of my men was making much more than his salary, by that system of favoritism known as graft. It dawned upon me that men in the main positions were subject to great temptation. I saw that I must have men to fill them who would satisfy these specifications:

"First, they must be honest.

"Second, as efficient as the Lord and good training can make them.

"I began to search my memory for honest men. The first one I thought of was Bill. He had been a fellow student in the Polytechnic Institute—distinguished chiefly for his out-and-out honesty. I remembered how, when we boys went to him regarding some ingenious deviltry that we had planned, Bill would say:

"'No. You boys can go to the devil. I won't have anything to do with your plan. It isn't on the level!'

"I never forgot that. Of course I thought of Bill, now that I had my lantern lighted and was searching, like Diogenes, for an honest man.

"What had become of this old-time friend? I had heard nothing of him for years. I wired to one and another for information, and finally learned that Bill was working for a small company in a Mid-Western city. Immediately I invited him to New York to confer with me on important business.

"He came. I took him to the Engineers' Club, where we sat down to luncheon. He had prospered only in a small way. Mystified by the summons I had sent to him, he asked:

"'Old man, what do you propose to do to me?'

"'I'm going to pay you ten thousand dollars a year until you have learned how to do your job, and then as much more as you can earn.'

"'What!' he exclaimed. 'I am not worth such a salary. You overrate me. What does it mean?'

"'Bill, I need a man of absolute honesty, proved and beyond question, for a place, which, next to mine, is the most responsible one my company has to offer. I know you, and I need you."

"'But there are plenty of honest men,' said Bill.

"'That may be,' I answered. 'But finding them is a rather slow, difficult and expensive process. They do not wear labels on their sleeves. Those of mature judgment are not likely to be looking for jobs. They are loyal to the men they work for, and if they are getting fair treatment they stick. Generally you have to catch 'em young and educate 'em for your kind of work.'

"It was a rather unusual and inspiring hour for Bill and me. Therein was the start of a great experiment which was to test out the value of an impression. For many years I had carried the conviction that here was a man of incorruptible character. I was willing to gamble on it.

"I count that experiment to be one of the largest factors in my career. I made a contract with Bill, and now he has become a big, happy and well-stationed figure in the world of business, with an income beyond his wildest hopes."

In this day of new things, when schools and homes would seem to have grown careless with the heart of youth, how refreshing it is to hear such a vindication of that old-fashioned asset called character!

THE teller of the remarkable story of Bill is Matthew S. Sloan, president of the Brooklyn Edison Company.

I met him first on the golf course of the Lake Placid Club, a big, handsome, merry-hearted athlete, laughing and chatting through the sloping fairways in one of the loveliest mountain valleys on the continent. He plays in the eighties, and was captain of the baseball and football teams in "Tech." He is a looming figure in American life, because his ability is directed and controlled by correct ideals. Like Owen D. Young and Henry Ford, he is a new type of Industrial Captain. These men have a vision unlike that of the old-time leaders. The ideal of public service is the main factor in their plans. As to their enterprises, the question of, Will it pay? has two parties to be considered:

First: Will it pay the public?

Second: Will it pay my company?

Just recently Mr. Sloan has voluntarily surrendered one million five hundred thousand dollars in annual profits to the people he serves, by reducing the price of electric current. As his plant increases its efficiency he shares with his public the saving it produces.

Mr. Sloan came to the Brooklyn Edison Company in 1919. Since then its annual income has increased from less than ten million to more than thirty million dollars; its customers numbered 120,000 when he assumed control. Now it serves more than 600,000 people.

He is a great builder.

"What is your peculiar method of building a business?" I asked Mr. Sloan.

He answered: "I build on Lincoln's aphorism:

"'With public sentiment in its favor nothing can fail; without it, nothing can succeed.'

"Good will is the best asset of any business. It is the root of the tree. To me, every telephone call from a customer is an opportunity to increase good will. It comes, as naturally as water flows downhill, to every organization that shows a sense of its duty to the public. The truth is that nobody is doing a really good job until everybody concerned believes it.

"I have always said to my helpers: 'Our company must have a heart and a soul—an invisible spirit. Every employee from the lowest to the highest must share it.'

"This is our spirit: our customers are our paymasters. We must serve them sincerely, frankly, courteously, cheerfully. That kind of service everybody likes. Therefore, we prosper, and as we prosper our public gets a dividend in the form of lower prices. Our motto is:

"'Put yourself in his place.'

"To us, 'please' and 'thank you' are the best words in the dictionary. We are always harping on these strings in circulars and booklets which are put in the hands of our employees. We plant that thought in their minds, and keep it watered and nourished. Thus we have established a reputation for integrity of purpose, for keeping which even the humblest of us is made to feel a sense of responsibility.

"In this manner we have done a simple kind of advertising that really brings big results. It is the unpaid advertising of one customer speaking to another and saying good things of us. When half a million people are using their tongues in your favor you are getting a kind of advertising that pays.

"Nothing can be sold for a long time and in great quantity which does not receive that kind of advertising—the free and honest opinion of one man spoken to another, thus making an endless chain of communicated good will."

I SAID: "You have told me what you try to do for your customers. What do you do for your help?"

"Our aim is to keep them moving upward toward higher pay and greater usefulness. Every beginner is expected to win promotion in six months. If he fails to do that, we shift him to another department better suited to his tastes and talents. We have a man who does nothing but study the special aptitudes of our new help, with the sole idea of developing and using the best they have in them. We maintain a school for our help, in which technical and commercial courses are given by well-paid instructors from the leading engineering colleges. We do what we can to help every one in our little army to improve his rank.

"Moreover, we try to keep the whole bunch happy. Only happy men are apt to be worth having. Our employees have an orchestra, a choral club, dances, athletic teams and associations, and a chapter of Boy Scouts.

"A discontented, pessimistic man is like a monkey wrench in the machine. He kills his own usefulness and impairs that of his fellows."

"I can now understand your taste for honest men," I said.

"The whole structure would tumble down without them," he went on. "They are its foundation walls.

"THE success of Bill sent me searching in all the corridors of my memory for honest men," he went on. "I was not seeking brilliant fellows. I could think of many such. I was in quest of those who had impressed me in one way or another as men whose quality I could bank on.

"You know as well as I how those impressions come. I suppose our intuitions have a lot to do with it. You cannot fool anyone long as to your character.

"I found four men who had crossed my path and put the right mark in my memory. I was fortunate in being able to hire and train them for the king row in my business. Every one of them has made good. They now have large incomes and they earn them."

"I suppose that you have known honest men who failed to get any reward," was my remark.

"No," he answered. "The emoluments of big business are not, after all, the best reward. A man may lack health or education for the battles of commercial or professional life, but the love and respect of his neighbors is a priceless possession. He's sure to be happy, and that's the main thing. One of the great men in my memory was shot down by ill luck early in his life. But he won out."

I put this question: "Have you ever developed a great man, one in whose presence you would feel like taking your hat off?"

"Just one," he said. "But the fact is, I had a partner in that enterprise."

"Whom?" I asked.

"God," Mr. Sloan answered, with a smile. His face grew thoughtful. "That's right," he went on. "I don't intend to be flippant. I mean it. I am glad that you ask the question, because it recalls a story which I love to tell. I was sitting in my office down in Alabama one day. It was late in the afternoon when my secretary entered, saying that a man named Bowdoin was outside, and wished to see me.

"'What does he want?' I asked.

"'A job,' he answered.

"'Tell him to come in to-morrow,' I said, and resumed my work.

"In a moment the secretary returned with this word: 'He says that he will wait until you come out.'

"Then I'll get rid of him at once,' I said. 'Tell him to come in.'

"He entered, a shabby, dejected-looking man.

"'What can I do for you?' was my query.

"'I want a job, sir,' he answered. 'Almost a year ago I was discharged from the Texas State Penitentiary. I was sent there for life. I (Continued on page 103)

A Yankee's Definition of Personality

"ONCE," says Mr. Bacheller, "I heard an old Yankee farmer express his sense of the thing we call personality, in this manner:

"'He's a little cuss, but there's a feller inside of him whose brow touches the sky. When I met him I was lookin' down, an' when I left him I was lookin' up.'"

"Dr." Mary Coburn's Patients Pay Her With A Song

The "doctor" is a country school-teacher, and her patients are sick or otherwise disabled birds—It all began one day when she and her pupils rescued a baby robin that had tumbled from the family nest

By Mary B. Mullett

ONE fine spring morning, fourteen years ago, Miss Mary Coburn was sitting at her desk in a little red brick schoolhouse near Springfield, Massachusetts. Facing Miss Coburn were her pupils: the older boys and girls of the rambling little village of Sixteen Acres.

Up-stairs, another teacher, Miss Inez Ingraham, was in charge of the younger children of the neighborhood. Altogether, the school had about fifty pupils.

Up to that time, it had been much like the average progressive country school of that section. To the outside world, it wasn't even a name. In Springfield itself, only a few miles away, hardly anyone knew of its existence.

But something happened, that spring morning in 1913, which has put the Sixteen Acres schoolhouse "on the map" of public interest, has entirely changed the habits of two human beings, and has influenced scores of others.

It was such a little thing to cause results so far-reaching, nothing more, in fact, than the falling of a young robin out of the family nest!

Probably many of you have seen some half-fledged birdling make one of these premature débuts. Or you have come across the little fellow, sitting disconsolately on the ground; too young to fly, and perhaps quite helpless because of a broken wing or some other injury.

But did you do anything about it, except to feel a passing impulse of pity? Probably not; for it cannot be denied that, with many of us, perhaps most of us, pity is only a passing impulse.

Because one woman has tried to make pity more than a passing impulse, and so to put something very beautiful into life, I am going to tell you about her.

Mary E. Coburn is just a country school teacher. She was born on a farm near Princeton, Massachusetts. But she wanted and obtained a good education; and in 1902 she began teaching in the little red brick schoolhouse which she still directs.

Tall, quiet, gentle Mary Coburn, with her kindly eyes and her low, soft voice! "Just a country school-teacher," I called her. But I think of her with a respect and an admiration which many a name among the famous ones of the world utterly fails to rouse in me.

Well—as she sat at her desk that morning, fourteen years ago, she chanced to look out of the window. Perhaps a hundred yards away was a big maple tree. And at the very instant that Miss Coburn looked up, a young robin fell from a nest in one of the topmost branches of this tree.

was a long one, forty or fifty feet. Miss Coburn watched to see whether the bird flew up and away, but nothing happened. So she explained the situation to the children and went in search of the little creature.

She found it, stunned by the fall but not really hurt. It was too young, however, to fend for itself, so she took it back to the classroom, to the immense delight and interest of the pupils.

The bird was promptly adopted by the entire school. The children soon christened the little fellow "Ittie," because he seemed to consider himself so important. He was most decidedly it! Hence his nickname. Ittie had to be fed—and he took a lot of feeding! Out of school hours, and even during the recess periods, the children foraged enthusiastically for worms, grasshoppers, and assorted bugs of all kinds.

The young robin had no fear of his new friends. He seemed to regard the schoolroom as his own particular bailiwick. He hopped gayly about, under the desks, on the desks, running over the children's feet—a friend among friends.

He would work at a pencil until he made it fall off a desk. Then he would roll it along the floor, like a child playing with a toy. If some little girl wore a dress with a pattern of dots, Ittie would light on her shoulder and try to pick off these dots, apparently under the impression that they were berries, or some other edible fancied by baby robins.

One of the youngsters had freckles, rich in color and of extraordinary dimensions. Even after repeated disappointing efforts to pick off these freckles, Ittie could not give up his idea that they were something he might add to his bill of fare.

All this, and much more, Miss Coburn told me one Sunday afternoon in the very room where Ittie grew strong enough to fly out and face life as he and his kind must live it.

SHE and Miss Ingraham and I had gone to the schoolhouse, in order to have our talk without interruption. For the little cottage, where the two teachers live and care for a constantly changing procession of wounded or otherwise helpless birds, has hundreds of visitors; and Sunday is their favorite day for dropping in to see them.

Occasionally a visitor comes, not out of mere curiosity, or interest, but to bring another feathered patient to this unique bird hospital. It may be an injured bird, or a helpless baby like Ittie. Thousands of people have heard, now, of Miss Coburn. They have caught what I can describe only as the contagion of kindliness. And when they see a helpless, suffering little creature, their impulse of pity does become more than an impulse. They take it in and care for it until they can turn it over to Miss Coburn herself.

"Sometimes," she told me, "their pity becomes love. They grow so fond of the little wild bird they have protected and cared for that they can hardly bear to part from it. I have known them to take more than an hour to say good-by to a baby robin which they'd had only a few days.

"Pity, and the love that comes from pity, seems to be an outlet for something that is a deep need in people's hearts. That," she said, with her quiet smile, "is the real reason why I am giving so much of my life to these helpless little creatures.

"It isn't simply that I pity them and grow to love them myself. It isn't what I do for them, although I like to think that I have relieved their pain; or that I have saved hundreds of birds who, perhaps, will rear thousands of others.

"Unless we protect them, it won't be many years before certain birds will cease to exist—except as stuffed specimens in a museum. We need birds. They are invaluable helps in our warfare against the insect world.

Miss Mary Coburn (left) and Miss Inez Ingraham, school-teachers, with some of their birds, outside the cottage at Sixteen Acres, Massachusetts, where Miss Coburn maintains her bird hospital. The young screech owl in front of Miss Coburn's arm is "Spooky the Third." The larger bird is the black-crowned night heron, "Bunty," also "the Third." Bunty, says Miss Coburn, is very intelligent and affectionate. He will play ball, bow to his caretakers, and will greet the approach of the Coburn car, even on the darkest night, with joyous screams; but will not notice any other car. The bird perched on Miss Coburn's shoulder is a flicker

"Of course I hope that by making even a few people think about birds, I shall be exerting a little influence in the right direction. But even that isn't my real motive.

"At the beginning, I thought only of the children in my school. As I watched them with that first baby robin, I realized what the experience might mean to them. People are often puzzled by what seems to be callousness, and even cruelty, in children. But did you ever stop to think that a child is usually under the domination of someone bigger and stronger than he is? When he comes across a creature that is smaller and weaker, perhaps he is domineering, in his turn, just out of a natural desire to assert himself.

"ONE of the things I had wanted to teach my children was, as I always put it, to help the other fellow! Especially if 'the other fellow' was in trouble. When I saw the eagerness with which they adopted poor little Ittie, their gentleness toward him, and their pride in caring for him, I could think of no better way of letting them discover the happiness that comes with helping the other fellow," she said, smiling.

"At that time, Miss Ingraham and I were living up-stairs in an old farmhouse near here. At one side was a hedge of lilac bushes in which a catbird had built her nest. One day I heard Mrs. Kittybird making a great disturbance, so I went down to investigate.

"I found a cat prowling under the lilac bushes, trying to reach the nest, which held four baby birds.

"I knew he would get them sooner or later. So, while I talked reassuringly to the mother bird, I carefully lifted the nest out and carried it up-stairs to a sort of store-room. I opened the window, so that the mother could go in and out, which she did quite fearlessly, feeding her babies regularly until they were able to fly away and take care of themselves.

"That was the beginning of what promises to be my job for life. Whenever the children found a helpless bird, they brought it to school. Sometimes the bird's friend was a so-called 'bad boy.' But when I have seen how pity has brought out the suppressed gentleness and tenderness in such a boy, I have wondered if anyone is really and incurably 'bad.'

"Of course the grown folks of the neighborhood soon heard that the school-teacher," she laughed, "had turned bird nurse; and one day a Swede, who lived near us, brought me a crippled robin. Probably one of his own cats—he had thirteen of them—had upset the nest. The Swede had rescued this baby, although in a damaged condition.

"The children soon named her Hawky, because she had a queerly shaped bill. She couldn't fly up; and as she grew older she had some mysterious malady which caused her feathers to drop out periodically, so she was generally rather ragged looking.

"But Hawky was an example of unselfish devotion, if ever there was one! She was with us twelve years; and during that time she 'mothered' three hundred and eighty of our baby robins. She couldn't go out and forage for them, or even for herself. But we always had cans of worms, insects, and other food standing where she could reach them; and she would run back and forth, carrying these delicacies to her stepchildren as devotedly as if they were her very own. These foster children were raised to maturity and given their freedom.

"We don't know how long she might have gone on being our self-constituted chief assistant, for we lost her in the fire which destroyed the house where we—and our birds—were living. That happened February 13th, 1924; and the fire had gained such headway before it was discovered that we lost everything. But we wouldn't have cared about that if we could have saved our birds.

"You see, by this time we had so many that we had to keep them at home, where they would be warm at night and on Saturdays and Sundays.

"About fifty birds were spending the winter with us that year: our dear old mother robin, Hawky; two orioles, Bill and Liddy Lou; a bluebird which was a professional beggar, playing dead for the sake of a meal worm; a song sparrow which had been partially paralyzed—as many birds are—by contact with an electric transmission wire; but the only one we saved was a European goldfinch which the children had christened 'Blind Baby.'

"As Miss Ingraham and I had to find a temporary boarding place after the fire, Blind Baby, and the other birds which were brought to us later that winter, lived here in the schoolhouse.

(Right) "Jimmy Crow," an inmate of the hospital, permanently lame, but also permanently happy

"We had a large wooden cage for them. And, by the way, that cage was made and brought to us by one of those so-called 'bad boys' I spoke of a while ago. He had been with us, but was then in another school. He had loved our birds, had spent hours of his spare time in getting food for them, making a study of the kinds of food they liked. He still wanted to do something for them.

"Of course," said Miss Coburn, "I can't be sure of this; but I have always felt that his pity and affection for something weak and helpless brought out the best in him. At any rate, that was the beginning of a change for the better, and he has developed into a fine young man.

"PERHAPS you remember that the winter of 1924 was a severe one. After the fire, we boarded near the schoolhouse; and every night, at eleven o'clock or later, we would bundle up and come over here to make sure that the furnace fire would last until morning. The janitor used to bank the fire early in the evening and leave it for the night. But the coal was so poor that season that I didn't dare trust it. Then, too, I wanted to be sure that coal gas wasn't escaping, for it is fatal to birds.

"You might think that the birds would have distracted the children's attention from their studies. But they soon became accustomed to having the little creatures in the room. I think it made the children happier and more interested in school; and you know we always work better when we are happy and interested.

"One of our birds that winter was an albino vireo, which is very rare. It was brought in by a man, a great big fellow he was, who had found it in the woods. It had been hurt in some way and would have died if left there. I remember he came in a motor car, steering it with one hand and holding the bird carefully in the other.

"I can't help feeling," she added, "that a man would remember, perhaps all the rest of his life, holding a poor little wild bird in his hand, knowing that he was helping and protecting it. I believe it would make him more ready to help and to protect other weak and helpless creatures—including human beings.

"For two years, the vireo did not miss a day at school. It couldn't fly, but it ran all over the room. At first I was afraid the children might accidentally step on it. Most of the time they seemed to pay no attention to it; but they must have had, all the time, a subconscious thought of it, for it never received the slightest hurt. After the vireo died, the children persuaded local land owners to designate hundreds of acres as bird sanctuaries, as a memorial to the little vireo.

"As for Blind Baby, who was a special pet with all the children, his story is an interesting one: A Springfield man was changing cars at New Haven; and as he stepped down to the platform, he saw a little bird, almost under his feet. As it made no effort to escape, he put it in his pocket and brought it home with him.

"This was during the war, and he was to leave for camp within a few days, so he asked me to take the bird. As soon as I saw it, I knew it was blind. And I knew why it was blind.

"In one European country there is a very common and cruel practice. They take a song-bird, like this European finch, and put out its eyes, so that it will not fly.

"They have nets, almost as fine as the hair nets worn by women; and these nets, which are about four feet wide and sixty feet long, they (Continued on page 82)

My Wife Won't Let Me Be A Gypsy

By Marcus Eli Ravage

I AM what folks are in the habit of calling a self-made man. In my case, the phrase implies neither millions nor a seat in the President's Cabinet. It means only that I have managed to batter my way through from the immigrant slums to a foothold in the literary world. However, when applied to me, the words "self-made" are misleading.

If you were to ask me to put my finger on the one influence that has been the making of me, you would most likely be surprised to find me mentioning neither education nor indomitable will, neither faith in myself nor any particular gifts. I have gone through college; in fact, I have done time in three of them, and I have been a teacher in a fourth. But I am pretty sure that my schooling has hindered me in my job as much as it has helped me. Such small talents as I have brought to the business of writing are more than overbalanced by an invincible timidity and an incurable taste for idling.

So that is that.

No, what saved me from downright failure was my luck in marrying my wife, and my wisdom in allowing myself to be guided by her sound sense at certain crucial junctures. And my reason for writing this article is not merely to give credit where it is due but mainly because the truth about Janet and me is also the truth about your wife and you, and, in one way or another, about men and their wives generally.

The idea, starting with a happy experience of my own, has been persistently growing with me that mine is no exceptional case. In short, I believe that we men, taken by our lone selves, are somewhat lopsided and incomplete beings. It takes a woman to round us off and straighten us out.

If you will look into the personal histories of the men who have made something of their lives, you will find that pretty generally there was a woman in the case. A sister, of course, will do, except that she cannot be relied on permanently. Sooner or later, she is bound to switch her interest to some strange party. Mother fills the bill admirably up to a point; but her judgment as a critic is likely to be colored by partisanship. Besides, she has Father to worry about. In the long run, a wife answers the purpose best.

In the venerable little corporation which is called the family, the masculine partner puts in the imagination, possibly, and the broad, generous outlook; the feminine member supplies the judgment and the saving sense of responsibility. At least this is so in my household.

I recall a typical incident of recent date.

Late last autumn, on one of those mornings when there is a nipping sparkle in the air, I woke up with a bright inspiration. It brewed and bubbled while I shaved, and it pursued me to the breakfast table till there was no holding it in. As Janet poured me my second half-cup I unburdened myself to her. I said:

"It looks a good deal as if we were in for the usual New York winter. Brrr. Snow a foot deep, lashing gales from the river and the sea, foul dampness with pneumonia in its breath. I dread to think of our little tots plowing through it all every day to school. And here is balmy Florida hardly a day's ride away, or Bermuda at the end of a delightful sail."

"It does sound tempting," Janet admitted.

Heartened by this unexpected crumb of encouragement, I rose to the occasion with enthusiasm. I painted a word-picture for her of the joys of swimming in the open sea at New Year's, of blooming gardens and fruit off the trees in February, of the children romping in the sunny fields clad in summer washables. No fussing with storm sweaters and arctics and heavy overcoats. No rushing to the park for a blood-freezing half-hour. I gained momentum as I sped on.

"I think," I concluded, "I'll call up the what-you-call-it tourist office and investigate further."

I GLANCED up at Janet, and caught her looking at me between amusement and incredulity. "But surely," she smiled, "you don't propose to do it this year?" From her tone you would have thought I had suggested a flight to the moon.

"Well, why not?" I countered, a trifle subdued. "Our balance at the bank is quite respectable just now. There will be a plump little royalty check in a month or so. And I am working. It is not as if the change will interfere with my job. That is one advantage, anyhow, that we writing fellows have over the business man: we can set up our office where we hang our hat."

And then Janet proceeded to remind me of a few things: Our surplus, including the royalty check, would just about take care of the two insurance premiums, due in December and March, and hardly meet the payment on our little summer place. To be sure, I was going to earn new money; but what with the children's tuition and other increasing obligations, it was hardly necessary to stay awake nights devising ways of disposing of it. Besides, my proposal was fantastic on grounds other than financial. Here we were in a new apartment. She had worn herself out trying to make it habitable; fitting the old bookshelves to the new walls; remaking and replacing curtains—oh, why wasn't there a universal standard for windows?—struggling in disorder and a pandemonium of hammering and sawing for weeks. And now, when the place was beginning to have some remote resemblance to a home, the vagabond in me was already pawing for a change of scene

"And think of the poor little ones!" she exclaimed, as she wound up to her climax. "They have barely had time to get acquainted with their teachers. Can you see them starting all over again in some strange school?"

I did not give up without a struggle, of course. I tried weakly to defend my position, to save my face. But the heart had oozed out of my inspiration. My voice sounded hollow as I spoke. It was one of my many lost battles with Janet. It is astonishing and cruel the annihilating common sense a woman can muster to douse a man's fine enthusiasm.

WE ALL know what a gypsy is, don't we? According to the late Noah Webster, he is "One of a vagabond race, living by theft, fortune-telling, horse-trading, tinkering, etc."

With some small changes, that comes pretty close to a rough sketch of me. I do belong to a pioneering, conquering, restless, exploring race—which is none other than the masculine half of the human species. Horse-swapping in midstream as well as all along the way is one of my peculiar delights. Not fortune-telling exactly, but fortune-hunting—the deep-rooted faith that fortune is just around the corner, and the readiness to drop everything and go for it. So, also, tinkering. I am everlastingly overhauling, rebuilding, making over this life of mine. "Etc." fits me like a glove. My history is in the main a string of et ceteras. Only about the theft part of the description am I a little doubtful. I think I can plead "not guilty" there.

When Janet, in a careless moment, let me persuade her to share a berth in the unsteady bark which is my career, I had not yet begun to write. That was still a golden and remote and rather vague hope. I was playing with the thought, but doing nothing much to reduce it to reality. I had only recently left the university, and had gone into teaching, both because it was the line of least resistance and because it promised me the leisure for my literary work.

Well, it could not have been much more than a month after our marriage when the old vagabond came to life again. I will say this in self-justification: my school work, instead of serving as a stepping stone, was leading me into a blind alley. It was taking every bit of my strength and leaving me exhausted at the end of the day.

Then, one fine morning, the postman came with temptation in his bag. It was a letter from a well-known subscription book concern out in the Middle West, offering me a job. I had worked with them once for about a week and they had remembered me. I took the letter in to Janet with a beaming countenance.

"Fasten your eye on this," I said buoyantly.

She glanced through it and handed it back to me.

"Very flattering," she remarked. "I wonder what (Continued on page 203)

"He Whom A Dream Hath Possest"

A Story

By Bess Streeter Aldrich

ILLUSTRATED BY JOSEPH SIMONT

WITH that same paradoxical combination of courage and trepidation which Columbus must have entertained when the world was younger and slower, Grandma Burnham was getting ready to make a journey to Lake City.

Grandma Burnham lived alone in an old-time wing-and-ell house in an old-fashioned lilac-and-syringa-grown yard on the last street in the insignificant town of Edgeville. Which settles Grandma once and for all to any claim on a paragraph in "Who's Who." But if Grandma herself had no place in the pages of that dictionary of the well-known, the direct results of her handiwork might readily be found there, for John David Burnham was listed quite bravely among the B's.

John David was Grandma's sole claim to her honorary title. Early orphaned, he had been housed, fed, loved, and paddled by Grandma. The housing had been comfortable, if inartistically so; the loving as generous as the feeding; and as for the paddling, one of the main reasons for that occasional activity on the part of Grandma was John David's predilection for drawing charcoal pictures on anything and everything indoors and out.

He had filled the walls of the woodshed, the inside doors of the cupboards, the entry to the cellarway, and the white bottoms of Grandma's pine bureau drawers with caricatures of gaunt old whiskered men and fat old women, and a cow that was always making waggish remarks in an elliptical breath from a grinning mouth. And, after many years, so Puck-like is Fate, John David's gaunt old men and fat old ladies, and even the wag of a cow had landed him in "Who's Who," via the funny pages of half the newspapers in a nation which gives both money and prestige to one who succeeds in making it laugh.

It was to John David Burnham's wedding in Lake City that Grandma had just been giving a half-hour of thought. Miss Marjorie Jeffers—that was the name of the girl whom David out of the world of girls was to honor. Grandma was hoping she was good enough for him; but was having her doubts. She picked up a letter from her ample, gingham-covered lap and read part of it over again.

" . . . While I shall send you a regulation invitation in September, I am writing this note to you now, urging you to plan to come. David says you must come, and so do I. My own grandmother will be here. She is coming from the East to attend the big doings. I am her only grandchild, just as David is your only one, and we want you two grandmothers to know each other. . . ." There was more, and, then, "Cordially yours, Marjorie Jeffers."

In the days that followed Grandma insulted her bank book, which, by ason of the chickens, the garden, the w, and several plump checks which avid had given her for presents, pre-nted material prosperity. In a wild orgy buying she got goods for two new esses, a gray crêpe for second best, and r the wedding itself a shimmering silk of angeable lavender and silver. Miss ocky, the town seamstress, made them th, with much reading of directions m the paper patterns and much spicy nversation from between the pins in her outh.

In every spare moment Grandma worked n the wedding present—a quilt with a eamy background for a crimson rambler se design of blocks. Into it she wove n thousand stitches and ten thousand oughts of love. With all these elaborate eparations, the summer fairly flew. The esses were finished and folded in tissue paper. The final tiny stitching had been put on the smallest petal of the last red rose of the quilt. The first Wednesday in September arrived in a halo of serenity and sunshine. No doubt, somewhere other people in the world were welcoming that particular day, but to Grandma Burnham it seemed her exclusive property.

IT WAS thrilling to be the center of interest for the whole neighborhood. No spotlight on a stage favorite or focus on a movie star had ever made them more the center of things than was Grandma to the west end of Edgeville. All that morning there was a great deal of running back and forth to assist her in getting off, Edgeville belonging to that inferior type of town whose people render homely service to one another when it is needed.

Jennie Wing hurried up-town at the last minute to get Grandma some face powder. "Just a little," Grandma explained; "ten cents' worth if they sell it in bulk. All my life I've said plain clean was good enough for me; but I want to look good for David's sake."

Several others were there to speed the parting wayfarer. Fat Sue Maybrick and her daughter Mamie, from the house on the north; wiry little Mrs. Jensen from the cottage on the south; old lady Wing from across the street. Grandma was out on the porch with her suit case.

"You look as stylish as a picture, Grandma," Sue Maybrick told her. She had on the dress which had been her best one before the extensive purchase of the two new ones, a black silk with freshly laundered white collar and cuffs. Miss Rocky had helped her pick out her hat. It had a feathery pompon on the side, which the milliner had assured her was "chic." Grandma had it on now, and above her plump, placid face it looked about as chic as it would have looked atop one of Raphael's cherubs.

"Now I'm going to tell you all something, folks," Grandma addressed them en masse. "I've kept this from you, sort of in the back of my head all summer. I'm going to bring Grandmother Jeffers home with me, if she'll come, and ain't too feeble to travel. She's come clear from New York State to Davie's and Margie's wedding, and may be all tired out and not able to go farther; but if she can, I want to bring her home to visit me for two or three weeks. It would be awful nice to have another old lady around for a while to wait on. I've thought of just a lot of nice things to do for her. I'm afraid I'm counting more on it than I should, without knowing for sure if she can come."

"My goodness, Grandma!" It was little Mrs. Jensen. "I don't believe you're ever happier than when you're doing something for someone."

Grandma studied a moment, thoughtfully. "Come to think about it," she said soberly, "I don't know as I am!"

MR. JENSEN drove up for her in his feather-weight auto. Jennie Wing returned with the powder. Grandma went out to the car. She delivered the house key to Mrs. Jensen, with some of the gusto which the Lord Mayor of London might use when turning over the city's key to his successor. "Now, let's see"—this leaving was a complicated procedure—"I'll sort of call the roll: The cow's at Magee's. Jimmie is to deliver the milk and have the money. Sue, you're to tend the chickens and have the eggs, and, Sue, you kill an old hen for a stew for next Sunday. I'd like to think of you eating it. I'll save those few fries that are left, to feed Grandma Jeffers if I can bring her home. Mis' Jensen, you're coming in to water the plants. I've got some slips of my best Martha Washington geraniums done up in a wet rag and strapped to my lunch box for Grandma Jeffers. The rain-spout's turned into the barrel. If there comes up a big rain, Mr. Jensen, and it goes to slopping over, I wish you'd come and turn the spout out to the ditch. Mamie's to have the sweet peas and pansies. Cut 'em every day, except the day before we come, a week from next Thursday. I'm going to visit a week with Margie's family—and then we'll come home. Listen to me say 'we,' will you! I declare, I'm that set on bringing that old lady here. I better not get my hopes up too much. Well, good-by, everybody!"

"Good-by! Have a good time, Grandma!"

Grandma leaned out of the car, her plump, kind old face beaming, the more-or-less-stylish pompon nobly erect.

There was a half-hour wait at the station because of Grandma's cautious early arrival. And then finally the train was coming in, and Grandma was settling herself. She put her feet on the suit case which contained the crimson rambler quilt, as though it might, from sheer naturalness of the roses, ramble out of the car window. "Now, I'll not say a single word to a person on the train," she told herself. "I guess I know what's what."

SHE kept her word so religiously that no one but the conductor, the brakeman, two school-teachers, and an automobile salesman knew that she was John David Burnham's grandmother traveling to his wedding.

And then after many hours she was in Lake City, sucked down in a whirlpool of noise and confusion, and trying to swim bravely out behind a red-coated porter with the suit cases. At last there was David, big, and fine, and clean-looking, saying, "Gee, Grandma, you look good to me! If you couldn't have come, I'd have kidnapped Marge and carted her out to Edgeville and married her in your old parlor!"

And this was Margie! The dear, dear girl! So slender and pretty and fragrant! And Margie was saying, "I'm glad to have David's grandmother here. And Grandmother Burnham, this is my own Grandmother Jeffers."

Her plump old face wreathed in smiles, Grandma Burnham turned. The smiles left as though snatched from her face. Grandma's head swam giddily. Before her stood a little lady as dainty as Marjorie, and as slim and fragrant. A very short and very fetching ensemble suit clothed her girlish little body. From the top of the close-fitting, bright green satin hat over brown bobbed hair, to the toe of the buckled pump over a silken-clad foot, she was the personification of arrested youth. She looked at Grandma out of young-old, restless eyes, and gave her a limp, daintily gloved hand. At once Grandma took an intuitive and unreasoning dislike to her.

And then they were all in a pearl-gray upholstered limousine, with a liveried chauffeur, riding to the Jeffers home. With Grandma's body tense from constant fear of the congested traffic, they sped over the paved streets, turning at last through iron gates and up a curving drive. They all got out, and with David's arm through Grandma's they went up a stairway.

Grandmother Jeffers, her silken skirts swishing about trim silken legs, mounted the stairs like a girl and was waiting at the top for heavy old Grandma. From there they went into a room more gorgeous than Grandma had ever seen. Marjorie's father and mother were presented and a cousin or two, with some house guests, all pleasant people and as sophisticated as gracious. "High-toned," was what Grandma called it to herself.

SUDDENLY she knew that the best black silk she had on was not right, neither was the new gray in the suit case, nor even the shining lavender and silver one. And her hair in its neat bun at the back of her head was not right, nor the stiff black hat

Because she could not be long with anyone without expressing herself freely, Grandma began talking, half to herself, half to the unwilling listener with the pompon. And, for that matter, neither were red, needle-pricked hands, nor a face and neck whose skin had been burned caring for the garden. Davie should have told her. In his letters he had written only about Marjorie—nothing at all about her family or surroundings. Grandma felt frightened, out of place, ill at ease.

And then she was alone in a bedroom. When the door closed she sat down heavily on the edge of an ivory chair upholstered in flower-covered English chintz, and looked about her. There was an ivory-enameled fireplace and there was more ivory furniture. Soft, gaudily-colored draperies were at the windows, and there were three silken-shaded lamps, one right on top of the bed. Old-fashioned Grandma in this room looked as out of place as one of her fat old hens would have looked.

All her plans and anticipations seemed to have tumbled about her head, and she was left sitting in the midst of their ruins. To think she had expected to stay a week and visit with the family after Davie and Marjorie had gone! She would go back—why, she would go back on the very first train after the ceremony. She only wished now that she had not come at all.

She must keep a stiff upper lip, and get through the wedding creditably for Davie's sake. But nothing was as she had expected. She felt as hurt as a child. Why, she had even brought a starched kitchen dress to help a little with the dishes! Her mind ran back over all those preparations she had made for the week's stay. Even the quilt, with its thousands of stitches and its thousand thoughts of love, would seem cheap and queer and out of place here with the other gifts.

But no destroyed dream, no blighted anticipation was so keenly regretted as the dissipation of that pleasant picture of taking the other grandmother home to visit. Imagine it! That old woman running around in kiddish clothes! All daubed up like a girl! But her hair was dyed and her neck was wrinkled, Grandma told herself jealously, and there were telltale creases at the sides of her hard old eyes. You could tell she was old, even if she had tried to cover it up. Old, and wearing a bright green, little-girl dress! And those silly slippers. . . .

THERE was a tap at the door. Grandma answered it shyly to find a trim uniformed maid, who said, "Mrs. Jeffers sent me to help you dress for dinner."

Grandma's head was high. "Why, thank you, dearie. But I don't need you a mite. I had my dresses made easy for that reason. But would you mind doing something for me, please? . . . Just throw these geranium slips out somewhere in the back yard or on the junk pile?"

Grandma got through the dinner. The silver worried her a little, and she felt timid. She knew she was not herself, cheery and talkative; but there seemed nothing for her to say. The conversation was trivial enough, but as though from another language. And the other grandmother sat next to her in a low-necked, silky dress. Against the linen, her slim, sparkling fingers appeared in sharp contrast to Grandma's plump old needle-pricked ones with the thin wedding ring.

The members of the family were all courteous to Grandma, hospitable in their way—but it was not Grandma's kind of hospitality. To her sensitive mind it seemed only a surface sort of effusiveness.

And then the time had come to get ready for the wedding. Grandma arranged her soft white hair in its usual neat bun, but crowned it with a high, fan-shaped comb with lavender stones, which Davie had given her once for her birthday. And then she put on the new silver and lavender silk dress. She gingerly touched her nose and chin with the newly acquired powder, as though Jennie Wing in her excitement might have purchased an explosive.

The ceremony was in the party room on the third floor. A long aisle was roped off with wide satin ribbons festooned from palms. Just inside the ribbons, near the improvised flower-bedecked altar, was a carved high-backed chair. It had been placed there for Grandma. Because they told her to do so, and led her to it, she sat in it. But it hurt her to think she could not stand up as (Continued on page 185)

How Do You Get That Way?

(A study of human conduct and achievement)

By George A. Dorsey

THE lion jumps through a hoop of fire, the seal juggles a ball on its nose, and the dog stands on its hind legs. They were not born that way. Somebody taught them. They learned. You sit in a chair, hold a magazine, read English. You were not born that way. Somebody taught you. You learned. There is nothing mysterious about it. How else could you get that way?

You learn to sit in a chair, hold a magazine, and read English so well that you do it for hours without effort. Transport a Japanese on a magic carpet from the heart of Japan, and seat him in a chair; he is awkward, and soon very tired. Hundreds of millions of people never learn to sit in chairs, turn the pages of a magazine, or read English. Could they learn? Why not? Could you learn to wear a kimono, sit on the floor, and read Japanese? Of course you could. Any normal person can learn to do practically anything within reason.

There is, of course, a vast difference between what you could have learned, and what you did learn; between what you are to-day and what you could or can be. If this were not so, you and I might just as well spend no more time on How Do You Get That Way? And if I can show you how you got the way you are, what is to keep you from learning how to get any other way you want to get—within certain limitations? Nothing—save a lack of enough motive power within yourself!

With a frail body you cannot learn to become a heavy-weight champion. Sex sets its limitations, especially if you are a female. Society says that certain things are unwomanly, and puts obstacles in the way of your learning them. But, even so, obstacles can be removed. You don't have to accept limitations set by others. If women had accepted the limitations set by men in the past centuries, what a world this would be! Fortunately, limitations can be widened out.

However, let's look into this matter of "limitations" a little further. It is important that you understand just what I mean.

You may be marvelously fitted by training for a certain job—but, does that job want you? For example, you are admirably qualified to teach gymnastics in a girls' school. Let us suppose that I have a girls' school and require a gym teacher. You show me your credentials and exhibit your skill. I like your looks. I think you would make a fine addition to my school. Then I say, "By the way, what is your religion?"

"Methodist."

"U-mm! That's too bad. You see, this is a Baptist school, and I have only Baptist teachers."

"But what has religion got to do with teaching gymnastics?"

"You have me stumped! But business is business, and some of my patrons are fussy, and with you on my faculty I can no longer say: 'Entire faculty Baptist.'"

Seems absurd, doesn't it? But this society in which you and I live does sometimes take absurd attitudes. What and how many doors have been closed because of the color of one's skin, or the way one's feet were shod, or the way one handled a knife and fork, or, or, or, or . . . ?

You may know the job, like the job—and fail to get it or hold it, because you rub something or somebody the wrong way in some trifling, piffling thing. It is a human being who hires and fires, promotes and demotes. Or a committee, or a board of trustees, or an electorate. No matter how small or big the job, there is always the human equation back of the hiring and firing line. And you know what human beings can do to you!

YOU may be able to climb a rope one hundred feet long—but not if that rope runs through a cement ceiling only ten feet above your head. We all have our limiting factors. It is well that we should know which are due to inborn physical traits, which to lack of training or desire, which to mere incidence of environment. Some of these limiting factors cannot be altered—but most of what usually seem to be limiting factors can be altered, if you want badly enough to alter them.

As a matter of fact, much that is glorious in human history has been done by those who transcended their physical or social limitations. Take Napoleon, Florence Nightingale, Lincoln, Steinmetz, Charles W. Eliot. What didn't they do! What limitations didn't they crash through and smash to smithereens. Even old age can renew its youth, and learn like a child, if it wants to.

Beware of all those who may say to you: "This way is closed to you;" or, "You cannot get that way." You can put them in the class with those who said that the world is flat, that steel ships are impossible, that flying is an absurdity, and what not.

In answering the question, "How do you get that way?" I mean just now by "you," your physical body; by "way" I mean the things you do—how you act when you are alone, or with friends, or with strangers, or with a mob; how you work or play; how you face danger, or a fight, or the loss of your job; how you behave when you are in love or in disgrace; your ways of talking, thinking, reading, walking, eating, dressing, sleeping; your ways at home, at church, at a ball game, in an office or the dentist's chair.

You have one physical body—you inherited it; call it your capital. You have thousands of ways—you learned them; call them your investment.

ARE you getting as much out of your ways as you would like? If not, quarrel with your ways, and not with your body. You cannot change your body to any considerable extent, but you can change your ways. You can reinvest your inheritance in more profitable ways. As a matter of fact, that is what you do every time you rise in the world.

There is no rung in the ladder of achievement you cannot aspire to. Nothing that anyone has ever done is beyond your capacity—within limitations.

All right, you say, then, how about becoming a genius?

Well, why not? Do you know what genius is?

Disabuse your mind of one thing: geniuses are not made of sweat. Can you imagine Henry Ford in a sweat? Or Thomas Edison? Or William Shakespeare? Or Paderewski? The sugar that geniuses burn goes into work—directed work—and not into sweats. They work their energy off, they do not sweat it out. There is a big physiological principle involved here which I cannot go into, but the principle is real—and it is at the bottom of the business of being "great," of being a genius.

We call Shakespeare a genius, and yet he excited little comment among his contemporaries. He now looms up because everybody around him has been washed out. We have not time to read everybody, or energy enough to love everybody. We unite on somebody—because we simply must read somebody and love somebody—that's mob psychology; that's why and how we elect a President.

To achieve mightily, to go far in the or that direction, to be a genius, means the organization of the particular mechanism with which is to be achieved the kind of success you want, and then the direction of the entire resources of the body toward that achievement. There is such a thing as "putting more than you have" into your job. And when all one has is put into anything long enough, something happens: a Henry Ford, a Thomas Edison, a Paderewski, or a Lincoln. This sounds very simple, but it isn't. The interests of the average human being are very diversified, and he prefers to keep them so. Tell him that, in order to be a "genius" along a certain line, he must bend all his energies and time to that effort, and he says, "Aw, let me be an ordinary chap."

Of course, bodily deficiencies or peculiarities may open or close certain roads to you; they may become the factors which will determine the way you will invest your inheritance. Your fingers, for example, may be so short and chubby that you cannot become a skillful pianist—as piano keyboards are made. But with a keyboard made for your fingers, there is nothing in your inheritance to prevent your rivaling the greatest of pianists, provided, always provided, you want to devote yourself single-mindedly to that end.

BUT let us return for a moment to your inheritance. Now, I want you to note closely what you did inherit. The color of your skin, hair and eyes; your stature, size and shape of head, relative lengths of arms, legs, and trunk, size and shape of nose, and facial features in general—you got from your ancestors. What else did you inherit? A unique body. How could it be otherwise, when your body has more parts than have all the man-made machines rolled into one, more units than this earth has had human beings?

What else did you have at birth? You had the immeasurable capacity to learn. That was your real birthright, your invaluable inheritance. And how that birthright was invested by your parents and you determines what you are to-day.

Think of your body at birth as a mechanism that knew nothing, that was densely ignorant, but could learn. How much "personality" did you have? So little that if you had been mixed up with a hundred other newborns in the maternity hospital, your own mother could not have picked you out. Now you have so much personality that she can pick you out from a thousand million—by the tone of your voice, your smile, your walk, by a hundred mannerisms which belong to you and to you alone. What, then, was the nature of this mechanism so devoid of personality, so capable of acquiring marked personality? What did that mechanism originally know?

It knew how to live—but only under livable conditions. It required food and air, protection from extremes of heat and cold and from stimuli in excess of what that mechanism could stand.

Your mechanism engine at birth was set to go, but it did not know where to go or what to do when it got there. Human hands fed it, protected it, carried it about. They had to, or you would have died. Your motor mechanism, by which you now carry your engine about, and your voice mechanism, by which you now talk to others and to yourself, did not know how to feed you, or protect you, or carry you about, or tell others to do it for you.

With your motor mechanism you could squirm, with your voice mechanism you could cry and make rambling sounds. Nothing more. But you could and did learn to use your motor and your voice mechanisms.

Why did those little motor and voice mechanisms want to learn anything? What drove them? The engine! Or, in other words, the impulse to live. The drive, the vitality, the vigor of life originate in the engine.

Dr. George A. Dorsey, for many years curator of the Field Museum of Natural History, in Chicago, is one of the outstanding anthropologists of the day. He has gone to many parts of the world to study the history of mankind. For two years his book, "Why We Behave Like Human Beings," has ranked among the non-fiction best-sellers

Let us call the engine the visceral drive, and understand that viscera include alimentary canal and organs of digestion, respiratory and circulatory systems, and organs of elimination and of sex. And note that when the viscera do their work well, energy is released for action in motor and voice mechanisms.

Now see how these two mechanisms learn their lessons: Your "motor mechanism" works through the action of muscles on bones. It learns to act in innumerable ways. For convenience call them your manual ways.

What was your hand good for the day you were born?

Look at the tiny hands and frail arms of a newborn: they cannot hold a bottle, they cannot even reach for a bottle. Soon the babe begins to make random movements. By and by it learns to hold a bottle, to find its toes, to reach out for things. It reaches out to a lighted candle; it is burned. It has learned a trick in one lesson that it is not likely to forget. You learn by experience those things which hurt or teach. Experiences, emotionally reinforced—as in pain, anger, fear, or love—get their lesson across in short time; they are burned in, as we say. You needed but one lesson to learn that fire is hot, that tails are not handles for lifting cats, or that father's pipe is no all-day-sucker.

WHAT did you not learn to do with your hands? Within three years you had learned thousands of ways of using them. And as you grew older, they became extraordinarily versatile—whittling wood, wielding a knife and fork, playing ball, chopping wood, writing, drawing, and the hundred and one things with which a normal child fills up his time.

Many of these movements are enormously difficult; you did not learn them in one lesson, or become proficient at them in twenty. Some required years of practice; some were easily learned because you had already learned most of the movements. Having learned to bang your rattle on the crib, for instance, you had made a good start in learning to drive a nail. Or, maybe you became unusually "handy" because the people with whom you lived were "handy." In other words, you came by your "handiness" naturally.

You learned to walk on your feet. Can you wash your face, comb your hair, and blow your nose with your feet? Or thread a needle, eat with knife and fork, play a violin with them? Children born without arms can learn to do these and other equally difficult feats. Children of Japanese artisans learn to use their feet as helpers for their (Continued on page 161)

Do You Know What Makes A Popular Song Popular?

Gus Kahn, who has written dozens of "hits," comes as close to answering this question as anyone can come—But even Kahn usually has to guess whether a song will go big, or never be heard from

By J. P. McEvoy

WHERE do popular songs come from? Where do they go? Who writes them? How? Why? Is there a lot of money in it? How much? Who gets it? How many really popular songs are there a year? What makes them popular? Why do people start singing them? Why do people stop singing them? Can you write a popular song? Can I? Is the music written first, or the words?

Why is everyone wanting to go back to Alabam' one year, and to Hawaii the next? What sets a whole nation to shouting in rhythmic chorus that under no conceivable circumstances have they any bananas?

Are all these things a spontaneous madness, or are we the victims of a carefully planned and executed attack upon our emotions? If the latter, who is the chief attacker?

The answer to the last question is—Gus Kahn.

Who is he? Where did he come from? What does he do? Why does he do it?

Well, if you walk over to your piano and pick up a handful of the songs lying around on top, you are likely to find that he has written the words (the "lyrics") of a goodly share of them.

During the past few months most of our amateur songsters in this country were dancing, singing, and ukuleleing the following rhapsodies: There Ain't No Maybe in My Baby's Eyes; For My Sweetheart; Just a Bird's-Eye View of My Old Kentucky Home; Blame It on the Waltz—to mention only a few songs of the recent output of Gus Kahn. He has been doing this sort of thing for nineteen years, during which period he has written eighteen songs that have averaged over a million copies sale. In addition, he has written some twenty or thirty songs that have sold from three to eight hundred thousand copies, and he has written hundreds of others that have not come up to those figures. Here are some of his hits: Yes, Sir, That's My Baby; I Wish I Had a Girl; Memories; Pretty Baby; I'll Say She Does; So Long, Mother; Your Eyes Have Told Me So; Venetian Moon; My Isle of Golden Dreams; Ain't We Got Fun; Toot, Toot, Tootsie; Goodbye; Swinging Down the Lane; Beside a Babbling Brook; Sittin' In a Corner; Mindin' My Business; No, No, Nora; It Had to be You; When You and I Were Seventeen; Charley, My Boy; I'll See You in My Dreams; The Midnight Waltz; My Buddy; Carolina in the Morning; The One I Love Belongs to Somebody Else; Spain; When Lights Are Low; My Sweetie Turned Me Down; Driftwood; That Certain Party; When I Dream of the Last Waltz With You; Kentucky Way of Saying Good Morning.

You will recall the questions with which I opened this article. I'll wager that nearly every one of you, at some time or another, has asked most of them, but usually we ask someone who does not know the answers. It struck me that it might be a good idea to back Gus Kahn into a corner and ask him. So I set out looking for Kahn, and naturally went to Music Publishers' Row, in New York, or what is commonly known as Tin Pan Alley.

"Gus Kahn? He isn't here. Hardly ever see him."

"Where is he?"

"Lives out around Chicago somewhere."

So, in Chicago, I went from one publisher's office to another, seeking the elusive Gus Kahn.

"He lives up on the North Side some place and raises children and dogs," I was finally told.

AND it was out on the North Side that I found the short, round, stocky and mild-mannered father of so many of the jazz lyrics of America, entertaining his two children—a boy of eight and a girl of three—with a pleasant little story about Harry Hippopotamus and Sally Snake. I expressed astonishment at finding him in such conservative and domesticated surroundings. He countered with, "Where'd you expect to find me, on Forty-second and Broadway, yelling 'Mammy, I want to go back to Dixie'?"

"Why not?"

"Can't stand the place," replied Kahn; "there's no feel of life about it. You can't write songs for people to sing unless you are mixing with the people who sing them, and that doesn't mean professionals."

"Well, whom do you mean, then?"

My Favorite Song

Prize Contest Announcement

GUS KAHN, writer of innumerable popular songs, tells you in the accompanying article how he goes about his task, and what type of songs he has found to be most pleasing to the public. He speaks of the modern "popular" song exclusively, for that is his field. But in this contest, you are invited to select any song—modern or old, popular or unpopular, classic or jazzy, sacred or shallow. There is one song that probably means more to you than any other; one that you like better than any other. What is it? And why does it mean so much to you?

For the best letter of not more than four hundred words we offer the following prizes: $30, first prize; $20, second prize; $10, third prize. Competition closes June 20th. Winning letters will appear in the September issue.

Address Contest Editor, THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE, 250 Park Avenue, New York City.

Contributions to this contest and any enclosures cannot be returned, so you must make a copy of your contest letter and of any enclosures, if you want to preserve them.

Manuscripts and inquiries not connected with the contest must be sent under separate cover to the Editor of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE.

"The young folks—the kids who buy the piano copies, the player rolls, the phonograph records; the kind who sing the words to each other as they dance. Incidentally that's one of the first things to keep in mind when you are writing a song—write words that the kids can sing to each other when they are dancing, and if they can make love with the lyric, so much the better."

"I never thought of that."

"I think of it a lot. My wife and I pal around all the time with nice, young, bouncy couples. I listen to what they have to say to each other, and get the feel of their reaction to the life around them. I try to catch the rhythm of their pet expressions.

"You'd be surprised to know how many songs are based on the catch phrases of the day. Take 'Charley, My Boy,' for instance. I heard a girl say that to a fellow out at the Rainbow Gardens on the North Side, one night, and it struck me that it had a rhythm that a lot of other girls would like to sing to their partners, with a catchy tune. 'Oh, Mabel,' was an obvious companion piece, written to order. Both had huge sales."

"You were saying something about songs having a better chance of success if the young folks can use them for their love-making?"

"Sure. Any time a young fellow can look a girl in the eyes and sing 'Why Couldn't It Be Poor Little Me,' it takes a great load off his mind, and a great strain off his vocabulary.

"AND speaking of vocabularies, the phrasing of a popular song must be as simple as you can make it. The first thing a song writer must remember is to forget all his fancy two-dollar words—those are all right for the bright newspaper poets, but a popular song must sound so simple that anyone can say to himself, 'Gosh, I could have written this!' And after he has sung it once or twice he will believe that he did write it, and take all the credit for it. I suppose hardly a young fellow lives who, after he has finished singing Irving Berlin's 'All Alone,' doesn't believe, way down in his heart, he could have written it himself, and maybe improved on it. Look how simple those last four lines seem:

Wond'ring where you are,
And how you are,
And if you are
All alone, too.

"Simple? Easy? Sure it is. Write four other lines as effective, to substitute for them, and I'll buy you a dinner."

Gus Kahn, author of numerous of the most popular songs of the day, and his two children, Donald and Irene. One of his latest songs, "Just Wondering," was written in collaboration with his wife

And then, before we knew it, we both got to reminiscing about popular song lyrics, beginning far back in the weepy period when people would sing "The Baggage Coach Ahead" just to have a real good cry. And then there was "Just Before the Battle, Mother," and "Just as the Sun Went Down," and many others of the same sobby brand. It was somewhere along about that time that an unknown genius—or at least one unknown to me—wrote a song which seemed to boil down and crystallize all the salty tears and heartaches of the period. It was entitled "My Love Works in a Greenhouse," and it went something like this:

In a small New England village on a drear October night,
A liv'ry stable keeper met a maid, his troth to plight.
The man was tall and handsome in a Denman Thompson way,
The maid might well have been a queen, she was so proud yet gay.
The liv'ry stable keeper, after he had asked her hand,
Endeavored to embrace her, but for that she would not stand.
"Oh, tell me why upon this breast you will not rest your head,"
She looked into his rugged face and unto him she said:

CHORUS

"My love works in a greenhouse;
There always is a smell
Of violets and geraniums
Upon his coat lapel.
Of course I do not blame you,
I am making no complaint,
But a greenhouse has a fragrance
Which a liv'ry stable hain't."

After I had reminded Kahn of this song, and we had both smiled over it, I said to him, "Now, go ahead and tell me why some of your songs sell a million copies and others that sound just as good don't pay your milk bill."

"I wish I knew," he replied.

"Does anybody know?"

"Well, we all guess, and we all guess differently. If we knew, we could make a fortune without any trouble."

"But," I broke in, "didn't you realize when you finished writing it that 'Yes, Sir, That's My Baby,' for instance, was a big hit?"

"Well, I thought it was pretty good, and it amused me; but it took three months for it to get started, and then suddenly it went over Bing!"

"How long does it take to make a song popular?"

"I wrote one eighteen years ago called 'Gee, It's a Dandy Night for Spooning.' It isn't popular yet. The same year I wrote another, and it went all over the country like the Spanish flu. The story of that song might amuse you."

"Let's hear it."

"WELL, I had been writing lyrics which nobody could set to music. One evening I went to a party, and met my wife for the first time. I found that she wrote tunes which nobody could put lyrics to, so on that basis we struck up a partnership. We wrote our first song together, and agreed that if we could get it published we would be married. She had all the business head—still has, for that matter—so she found a publisher and offered to sell him the song for five dollars outright. He didn't feel certain that it was worth even that much, so he offered us a contract with a royalty, instead. Under the contract, if the song didn't go over we didn't get anything The (Continued on page 137)

A Dot and Will Story

Louise Takes Things Into Her Own Hands

By Fannie Kilbourne

ILLUSTRATED BY T. K. HANNA

I HAD been making tapioca custard for the babies, and wondering whom they could marry, when Dulcie came in. Of course, the twins being only three, it would be some time before they could marry anybody, and I suppose lots of people would think it was just silly of me even to give the matter a thought.

But there's no harm in thinking and I wasn't worrying at all, because I realized that a lot of things might happen before they were grown up. If this were the kind of country, though, where parents betroth their children in infancy I would certainly be one worried mother.

I might manage all right for Jill; but I can't think of a baby in Montrose that I'd want Jack to marry.

Little Dulcie, right next door, is very pretty and blond, which would be nice, Jack being dark; but the way Dulcie is bringing her up lets her out as a wife for Jack. Little Dulcie is simply spoiled at sixteen months, and what she'll be at sixteen years I shudder to contemplate.

Dulcie has actually made cross-stitch monograms in the corners of that child's diapers, and anyone can tell what kind of woman that's going to make her. Why, she'd keep Jack's nose to the grindstone for life!

Goodness knows, Rosie Merton's babies aren't spoiled—as Rosie says, you don't cross-stitch any monograms on the fourth set—but I don't think any one of her three little girls would quite do. Betty is too old for Jack, and the two little ones look like Howard.

Corinne's little Marcia is a very attractive, well-behaved child, but she's croupy, and of all things I want Jack to have a healthy wife. Ruth's baby is healthy enough, and rather nice-looking and amazingly well-behaved, but, as Rosie and I have often said, we sometimes suspect that the only reason she is so good is because she's too dumb to get into mischief.

Of course, some of the Harvester bunch have girl babies; but I'd hate to see Jack marrying into that swift crowd. And there's Tiny Scoggins, who will have money of her own. Money is very nice, of course; but I can't fancy Jack's marrying a child with adenoids. In fact, the more I thought about it, the more I realized that there wasn't a girl in all Montrose who was really suitable in every way.

Naturally, I didn't mention what I had been thinking about to Dulcie, who had run in to see if I had a good recipe for sour cream cake. It wouldn't have been very tactful, on account of little Dulcie, and I wouldn't have, anyway, because ever since we made such an awful bone of trying to marry off Madge Edwards, we've all been a little offish on the whole subject of matchmaking.

This morning, however, Dulcie brought it up herself. I was cleaning the silver, and she perched up on my kitchen stool and began to rub a knife with chamois while we talked.

"Well," she observed, chattily, "I see Louise Curley's got another beau."

"Who?" I exclaimed, all interest at once, of course.

"Mr. Pawling."

"Mr. Pawling!" I echoed, amazed. "Why, he's old enough to be her father!"

"Oh, no," said Dulcie. "He's only forty-two. And she's twenty-six. Lots of married couples have that much difference in their ages."

"But he's bald," I protested. "And he gargles, night and morning. His sister told me so."

Dulcie shrugged her shoulders.

"I can't see myself marrying a man who gargles," she admitted. "Still, there's no accounting for tastes. Probably Louise figures she'd rather be an old man's darling than a young man's slave."

We polished for a few moments in silence. Then:

"And there aren't so very many young men left who aren't married, already," I said.

Which, of course, hit the nail right on the head. We certainly haven't got much of a bachelor class in Montrose. And all of Louise's girl friends were married, with a baby or two apiece. I suppose, to put it crudely, Louise had reached the point where she'd rather have Mr. Pawling than nobody.

"Well, maybe Mrs. Curley'll think Mr. Pawling is good enough for Louise," said Dulcie. "He's settled right here in Montrose, and his store is doing well."

DULCIE was thinking of Denis O'Shea. Louise is awfully sweet and pretty and had had plenty of beaus; but Denis was the one that everybody had thought she would marry. Plenty of other girls in Montrose would have been glad enough to marry Denis, but Louise was the only girl he ever rushed hard.

He was the handsomest Irishman you ever laid eyes on, with crisp, black, curly hair and blue eyes and flashing white teeth. He had the most simply fascinating ways, and the only thing in the world I ever heard against him was that he wouldn't settle down in Montrose. He was studying to be a geologist, and he said that he wanted to see the world.

That was enough for Mrs. Curley. She was a widow and Louise was her only child, and the very idea of Louise's getting married and leaving her to go off to some far end of the earth set her wild. She was against Denis from the start, and she finally managed the breaking up of the affair.

Louise never told anybody much about it. All she ever said was to Bee Duncan, her best friend. She told Bee that she couldn't break her mother's heart. So, after having gone with Louise for four years, Denis went away alone. He married a Chicago girl the next year on the rebound, and we heard that he'd got a wonderful job in Brazil.

That was five years ago. Louise had had a few other beaus since, but nothing had come of any of them. Nobody ever knew what was the trouble; there was never a quarrel or anything you could put your finger on; they all continued to say Louise was a fine girl, long after they had made a fade-out and married somebody else. It had been a year or more now since anybody had been going with her at all.

"DO YOU know," said Dulcie, briskly polishing my one silver platter, "I think the whole trouble with Louise's beaus is her mother."

"Oh, I don't know," I protested. "I never heard of Mrs. Curley's objecting to any of them except Denis."

"That's all very well," said Dulcie. "But Denis is the only one of them who wouldn't have had to marry Louise's mother right along with Louise."

Which, once I had thought of it, I did admit, seemed reasonable. Mrs. Curley expected, as a matter of course, to go right on living with Louise in case Louise should get married. And when it came right down to it, any man who was courting Louise had to come pretty close to courting her mother, too. This was on account of Mrs. Curley's being a chum to her daughter.

She was always telling us girls how she was just Louise's chum, that they were really more like sisters.

"I was only eighteen when she was born," Mrs. Curley was always saying. "Doctor Horne often used to say to me, 'Why, Mary, you're only a little girl yourself, and here you are, with a little girl of your own. You and this baby girl will be just a pair of sisters!'"

Mr. Curley died when Louise was a baby, leaving Mrs. Curley with money enough, so she didn't have to worry, and she had devoted her life ever since to being a sister to Louise.

I remember how it was when we were all little kids. Mrs. Curley always walked to school with Louise and came after her; even after the rest of us, who were years younger, were let go alone. Then, each fall, when Louise passed into a new grade, Mrs. Curley would go to school and call on the new teacher, and invite her to supper at least once a month. This usually made Louise the teacher's pet.

Sitting there while Mr. Pawling was puffing out his chest and rocking in the cradle a home and babies of her own bad enough to take Mr. Pawling along with them.

WHEN we went to play at Louise's house, her mother was always so interested in our games. Louise wouldn't trade a paper doll without consulting her mother about it first. Mrs. Curley would consider each trade as seriously as though it were a real estate deal, would point out to Louise why some other exchange would be better than the one she was suggesting.

We could make candy any time at Louise's. Mrs. Curley would always be right out in the kitchen to tell us when to take it off. Louise never did learn to make fudge that would get hard, by herself. Mrs. Curley seemed so much younger and gayer than any of our other mothers. We all liked her and envied Louise. She had prettier clothes than the rest of us and more doll dresses and fancier parties.

When she got old enough to have the boys come to see her, her mother entered right into that, too. Would invite the different ones to supper and have everything they liked to eat. She'd join right in; put on her own prettiest dress; play all the new popular songs for them on the piano, and be as jolly as though she were Louise's age.

"I'll bet Johnny Harris really comes to see me," she'd tease Louise. And then, to anyone else who happened to be around, "Really, you know, I have as much fun out of Louise's beaus as she does. We're just a couple of girls together, just sisters!"

I must admit, though, that I never knew any sisters who worked that way. Goodness knows, my sister Kathie and I are as congenial as any two sisters I ever knew; but when Elmer began getting serious I didn't notice Kathie urging me to put on my best dress and stick around to help her entertain him.

When I began having beaus, and Father, who is very sociable, would say, "Why don't your mother and I have a game of five hundred with you two?" Mother would say privately, "Now, look here, Horace, don't fool yourself. Will Horton isn't coming here for the pleasure of playing cards with you!"

ALL through high school, Louise was awfully popular. All the boys liked to go to her house. Mrs. Curley never cared how late they stayed; would let the bunch tear up the living-room to dance any time they wanted; would play for them, and even get up and dance an old-fashioned waltz, herself, with one of the boys. Everybody said that Louise Curley was lucky.

Then Denis O'Shea came along.

Denis was just crazy about Louise. He was awfully nice to her mother; would jolly her along, pretend he couldn't tell her and Louise apart. When he'd ask Louise to go to the movies, and Louise would say, "Would you mind asking Mother to go along too? She's crazy about Mary Pickford, and it would be dull for her to stay at home alone," Denis would say, "Sure, the more the merrier," and would get seats right down in the front, because Mrs. Curley is a little near-sighted.

For quite a while, Mrs. Curley thought he was grand; told everybody what a handsome young fellow he was and what a beautiful voice he had, and how ambitious he was, and everything like that.

But after a while Denis began to get serious about Louise, and wanted to be alone with her some of the time. This hurt Mrs. Curley's feelings awfully. She'd tell Louise to go on somewhere with Denis, but when Louise got back she'd find that her mother had been crying all the evening.

the deep, I took a deep and solemn oath with myself. If Louise wanted for one, was going to do all I could to see that she got the chance!

Mrs. Curley was always planning little treats" for her and Louise that would ome at the same time Denis would be kely to ask Louise to do something with im. And it nearly killed her if Louise emed to prefer to go with Denis.

"You see," she would explain, "Louise nd I are so much closer than most moth-'s and daughters. We've always been ist like sisters. Just chums!"

As Denis got more and more in earnest, Irs. Curley liked him less and less. Where ie used to say he was so handsome, now ie'd add "in a rather coarse sort of way." he'd sit down and play and sing in a owd, she'd laugh a little superiorly, and y he was showing off. She didn't talk ny more about his being ambitious. Now ie called it "reckless."

And when she discovered that his am-tion was to be a geologist and go all over ie world, she got just frantic. She said iat a man with that idea ought never to arry, that no girl could be happy away f from everybody who was dear to her. She said that the O'Sheas were a shiftless Irish family, and reminded Louise that Mr. O'Shea used to be a bricklayer before he got into politics. And so on and on.

Denis began going around with a hard, set look around the mouth, and Louise got thinner and thinner and whiter and whiter, like warm taffy that's being pulled two ways. Then suddenly Mrs. Curley got sick. She told everybody that she was afraid she wasn't going to get well. Louise was a perfect angel; took all the care of her, herself. Nobody knows just what happened, but all of a sudden Denis O'Shea left town.

EXCEPT for that one thing she said to Bee, Louise never mentioned his name to a soul. Mrs. Curley got better right away, and began putting on weight again and fairly blooming, till inside of three months anyone would swear it was Louise who had had the serious illness.

Everybody said what a wonderful daughter Louise was, and how devoted she was to her mother. They went everywhere together and they were so thoughtful of each other. The rest of us were always having Louise Curley held up to us as an example by our own mothers.

If Louise hadn't been an awful peach, this would have made us hate her. But everybody liked her. Once in a while, someone would say it was a little too bad things hadn't been so she could have married Denis; they had seemed to be so terribly in love.

And for a "shiftless family" the O'Sheas seemed to have done pretty well for themselves. Denis's elder brother worked his way through medical college, and was getting along splendidly in a big Chicago hospital. The next boy was already county prosecuting attorney, and it was said he was heading straight for Congress. Agnes, the only girl, married one of the most successful young men in Verblen.

STILL, everybody said, Louise would find somebody else she'd like as well as she did Denis, and probably it was all for the best. The only trouble was that Louise hadn't seemed to find anybody else. And suddenly, once Dulcie had spoken of it, I realized that this might be partly on account of Louise and her mother being such chums.

For one thing, Louise didn't get to go to so many places where there were young men, any more. She and her mother went everywhere together, and we girls sort of got into the way of inviting them both when we were having an afternoon bridge party, but not to our evening parties when there were to be men. Evening things are usually in couples, and Mrs. Curley would have made an odd woman. We all liked her too well to hurt her feelings by not asking her, so we just got into the way of counting Louise out, too.

Besides, after Denis went off, Louise didn't seem so attractive anyway. She and her mother went to Chicago twice a year to buy their clothes and, being just of a size, they got to buying things they could change back and forth with each other. These looked very young and dashing on Mrs. Curley, but they were likely to be just a little bit old for Louise.

Most of the other girls bobbed their hair; but Mrs. Curley didn't like short hair, so Louise kept hers long, which made her look a little older too. In fact, the old compliment began to be almost true—that Mrs. Curley didn't look a day older than her daughter. This was half because Mrs. Curley looked so young for her age, but the other half because Louise was beginning to look old for hers.

Louise was beginning, too, to have a lot of the same (Continued on page 155)

"Every Time I Blunder, Jab Me In The Ribs"

This was what Victor Sincere asked when he became head of a big Cleveland department store—A brilliant lawyer, but a novice in retail business, he paid two men to criticize his methods so that he might keep his right foot forward

By Sherman Gwinn

THE benediction had been pronounced, and the minister had taken his place at the church door to bid God-speed to his departing worshipers. Yet several score of the congregation lingered, gathered in expectant groups in the aisles. They were waiting the appearance of the young soloist, Victor Sincere.

"He was wonderful!" a woman exclaimed.

"I've never heard more beautiful singing in a church!" declared another. "He should be in opera!"

On every side arose comments laudatory of the singer, and all agreed that the church had been fortunate when it secured his services.

At that moment Sincere appeared from the choir-room. No one could mistake his flush of evident pleasure when they crowded about him, shaking his hands in warm congratulation.

Alone in his room, with this praise still ringing in his ears, Sincere thought over his future. And as he thought the pleasure faded from his face.

"They know me only as a singer," he said. "Probably not ten people in that whole church know that I'm singing there because I must, because I need the twenty-five dollars they pay me for each service, and that my real profession is the law!"

Hours he pondered. Men don't engage as a lawyer one whom they know best as a singer. That was the conclusion he reached. If he was to succeed in the law, he must be known as a lawyer first! And in the law, as yet, he was unknown!

Sincere took up pen and paper and began to write. He wrote deliberately, knowing full well that his action meant hardship, denial, and possibly even hunger. Understand, thus far his law practice had brought him nothing, whereas his singing had taken him to the threshold of almost certain affluence. Yet here he was writing his resignation from the church as its soloist. He was drawing away from that threshold and staking his all on the law.

"A strange way," you will say, "to begin the story of a merchant!" For today Sincere is a merchant, and a great merchant, known the country over as such. Only a few of his intimate friends remember that he was once a lawyer, and still fewer that he once sang for his bread and butter.

It is a strange beginning; but Victor W. Sincere, of Cleveland, is a strange and remarkable man.

"Not once, but five times in his career Sincere purposely turned his back on the obvious opportunity, to follow a gleam in the darker turn in the road. With careful, deliberate forethought he has done this.

His father wanted him to be a doctor. The parent and an older brother both were doctors. Here was an opportunity to share in an established practice. A ready-made career was being handed him on a platter. But he ignored this certainty for the uncertainty of the law.

MONEY wasn't available to put him through law school. He had to work as a clerk in a lawyer's office, and read his law at night. His wages were three dollars a week. Then a theatrical manager heard him sing and offered him fifty dollars a week to go on the stage.

Sincere was but a boy and the offer represented a fortune, along with the glamour of the footlights. He said "No!" to it, that he might continue the study of law.

Later, upon admission to the Chicago ar, he was offered a partnership by his ld employer, a lawyer with an estabshed reputation and practice. "I'm etting along in years," said the old law-er, "and need a young man here to step ıto my place." His father insisted it was he boy's great chance. But Sincere had ther plans. He wanted to have his own ffice, to go it alone—and he did.

It was during his first clientless years hat he sang to keep up appearances and o earn enough to pay his stenographer. The church at which he was soloist was ıis chief source of income. He was almost totally deıendent upon the earnings ıf his voice. I've already old you why he resigned ıis position.

AT TWENTY-NINE he was a member of one of Chicago's leading law firms. A brilliant legal career was ust ahead. To the utter ımazement of his friends and the consternation of his coleagues, he resigned his partıership, quit the law for ıood, to become the superntendent of a department ıtore in Cleveland—a posiıion that paid him only a hird of what he had been earning as a lawyer!

"You're crazy!" exclaimed his friends.

"Wait and see!" challenged Sincere. "I know what I'm doing. I've analyzed myself and the future!"

And therein is the key of his story. He is a selfanalyst. Each step of his is measured before he takes it. He never plans a move without first considering its consequences.

"People," he told me, "spend months in planning what to do, and only minutes in considering the consequence of what they do. They forget, or ignore, that for every action there is a reaction. Instead of molding their lives, they allow their lives to mold them."

And he added:

"What you plan to happen may be made to happen, provided you first consider what may happen apart from your plans. When I took that store job, I didn't even see it. I saw only to what it could be made to lead. And I planned to make it lead there."

That was twenty-one years ago. Today, at fifty, Victor W. Sincere is where he planned to be at fifty on the day that he decided to quit the law for business. He is the president and general manager of the Cleveland store known as Bailey's, and under his management it has grown to six times its former size. Also, he is the president of National Department Stores, Inc., of New York, a corporation which owns fifteen big department stores in eleven leading cities, employs 15,000 people, and does a business amounting yearly to $80,000,000.

Mr. Sincere was born in Louisville, Kentucky, and his middle name, Washington, is significant of the day of his birth. It was February 22d. Seven children were in the family, and Victor was next to the youngest.

The elder Sincere was a man of courage. Until he was thirty-three years old, the age when most folks are getting settled down for life, he was in business. But at night, after work, he was studying medicine. His few spare dollars were expended for medical books. The fact that he was the parent of seven youngsters did not deter him from enrolling as a student in the Louisville Medical College. There he won his medical degree. And, not to be outdone by his youthful, unencumbered classmates, he gathered together his brood and struck out for the big city, Chicago, to begin his practice.

"I've never known a more determined and a more earnest man than my father," Victor Sincere said to me. "To him, there was something holy about his profession. He dedicated himself to it like a priest to his church. No matter how late the call, how bitter the night, how long the trip or how humble the patient, he set out with a grim, eager joy.

"'We're here to serve!' was his stern injunction. 'Fail in service, and you fail in everything!'

"He suffered untold torments in order to live up to this creed, suffered them with that same grim joy with which he went out on a winter's night to save a life.

"He was, for instance, keenly interested in the study of the colon. The colon, as you know, is the largest of the intestines. Father held certain ideas, radical at that time, of the colon as a seat of disease. Unable to push his researches to the extent that he wished in the laboratory, he conducted experiments upon himself. Nobody knows what he suffered in them, for he never uttered a word. Some of his findings, when published, brought forth storms of criticism and ridicule, though they are commonly accepted to-day. His only comment was that criticism was the lot of every discoverer."

IN THIS stern atmosphere young Victor Sincere was reared. Wide-eyed, he listened by the hour to discussions of medical subjects between his father and his associates of the staff of the Cook County Hospital, or sat in awed silence while his father bent patiently over queer appliances or hunched himself over his microscope. He was to be a doctor, you see, and was beginning young.

"Would that I," said the father, "had had such a chance!"

One day Victor's elder brother, a medical student, took him into a dissecting-room. Half sick, but afraid to show it, he sneaked away, a stunned and a thoughtful boy if ever there was one.

"Do doctors," he asked his father that night, "have to cut up people?"

"Sometimes," replied the parent.

"Then," announced Victor, "I'm not going to be a doctor!"

He held his breath, expecting a storm. A moment his father stared at him in an astonishment which slowly passed into pity.

"Why?" he asked.

The boy blurted out his experiences of the afternoon. He could sit at bedsides, yes; but operate, never.

"Very well," said his father, with deadly earnestness. "It is for you to decide. Nobody should go into medicine unless he loves it. There should not be the least doubt of that love!"

Next to medicine stood the law. It was but natural that he turned to that. The atmosphere in which he was reared was that of the professions. Business was held somewhat in contempt. Had not his father thrown business over to become a doctor!

"Father," he said one day, "I'm going to be a lawyer."

A criminal lawyer, that was his vision. In order to speed his entry into the law he did an unusual (Continued on page 192)

Post-Mortems are Just as Important When the Patient Recovers

"AN OLD lawyer-teacher of mine taught me this about self-analysis," says Victor Sincere. "'Almost anybody,' he said, 'will sit down and analyze why he failed to do a thing; but not one in a hundred will analyze why he succeeded.'

"You ask, 'but if a thing is done successfully, why hold post-mortems? They're not necessary.'

"Not necessary, but helpful. Helpful as an index to yourself! Failures are the consequences of mistakes, poor judgment, lack of resources, and so on. Successes are the result of some faculty, or faculties within you that are strong, that are worth further development, that you should build upon in the future.

"Some years ago a man was hired to fill an important executive post. For a year or two he did well. The business prospered and grew from his ideas. But at the end of five years he was let out, a failure in the job.

"'I can't understand why I failed,' he confessed. 'I never worked harder for anybody in my life.'

"He failed because at the very outset he did not stop to analyze why he was hired. The firm employing him wanted an executive with an outside viewpoint. It was down in a rut, too deeply immersed in itself. So it brought in this outsider, with his new ideas. His outside viewpoint was his strength.

"But he, too, let himself become immersed in the business. He got right down with the rest; and, just as soon as he did, his special value was destroyed. If he had analyzed the reason for his being employed he would not have failed."

"Scotch Valley"

A story you will never forget

By Mildred Cram

ILLUSTRATED BY W. H. D. KOERNER

Synopsis of First Instalment

JAMES GLADDEN went to war a handsome, care-free, unattached young bachelor. He came back burdened with a wife and five children. They were not his; but he was pledged to find them and look after them. This because in the very last firing on Armistice Eve Fred Smith had died in his place. Smith had seen that his captain was ill, had gone ahead of him into the line of fire, and had fallen. From his hospital bed—terribly wounded—he had begged Gladden to find his family and care for them. Gladden promised, knowing only that they lived in California in a place called Scotch Valley. For months Gladden was ill; then he came home to fulfill his promise. He had been left penniless by a wealthy father, whose estate had gone to Gladden's stepmother; but he had been brought up in every luxury, and had been given an excellent engineering training. His uncle was ready to establish him in an office of his own. He refused this offer, turned his back upon the music and beauty which he loved, and set out with the few hundred dollars he owned to find the Smith family.

Scotch Valley at last—and two Fred Smiths who had died in France! But when Gladden said "My Fred Smith had five kids, and no money at all," the question was settled. The other family was the richest in the Valley. Scotch Valley, parched under the dry heat of summer, was the most desolate place Gladden had ever seen—and all its desolation was concentrated in the Smith ranch. Mrs. Smith had died months before, and Gladden found a deserted, waterless place, with a wretched house which sheltered the five children and old Manuel, the Mexican in whose charge the mother had left her children. But old Manuel was dying. The well had been poisoned. There was no water and no food. Peter and Henry and Lily and Nancy were afraid of Gladden, and defiant—but he stayed. Bertha, the eldest, had gone to town, ten miles away, for a doctor.

There were no neighbors, Peter said, but the Pelgrams—"And you can't go there, because Pelgram'll shoot you. He shot at me last week. I was after chickens. I got one, too!" It was unbelievable. Gladden went to the Pelgram ranch—a prosperous, irrigated farm—and Pelgram refused him food, and ordered him off the place.

On the way back he met Bertha—ragged wisp of a girl of sixteen, weary and footsore, but defiant, like Pete. She would not admit her weariness until she could not take another step. Then Gladden simply picked her up and carried her the rest of the way. He knew then, that, no matter what it entailed, he would see this thing through.

At the house he found the children crying, and knew that Manuel was dead. He found a revolver in Manuel's bed and came back to the children. "I'm going to get you something to eat!" he said.

Then he loosened the revolver in his pocket and ran once more into the unfamiliar darkness, toward Pelgram's ranch.

GLADDEN did not intend to steal. It was his plan to go to Pelgram's door and to demand food, with Manuel's revolver to back him up.

The ranch-house was dark. As Gladden mounted the steps the dog began to bark, somewhere in the rear. He was a young dog, and not too daring, for he did not appear; instead, with hysterical threats, he called as loud as he could for help.

When a light appeared behind the door, Gladden moved back a step. It crossed his mind that war had made this sort of thing deplorably easy. The weapon in his hand was familiar. It gave him the sort of assurance offered by a well-placed barrage, reliable artillery.

A woman opened the door.

"What do you want?"

She was young and pretty, if you cared for her sort of prettiness. An aureole of short, curly red hair flamed against the light. A small, precise mouth parted to show uneven teeth. She wore a flowered kimono which she clutched together at the neck. Gladden knew at once that she was more to be feared than Pelgram. He explained again that he must have food.

She licked her lips. Her rather sleepy eyes narrowed. "My husband isn't home. He told me about you. He told me, if you came again, to call him on the 'phone, and he'd bring the sheriff back with him. He'd do it too, like a shot. He'd lock you up."

"But, see here. I'll pay you. I want some eggs, some bread and milk, if you can spare any. Those children are starving!"

SHE shrugged her shoulders. "What's the matter with the old Mexican?"

"He's dead. He died a few minutes ago."

"Dead? Why, then—"

She caught herself; what she had been about to say remained unspoken. It was evident that Manuel's death had surprised her, and that for some reason she was relieved. She leaned against the doorway, suddenly relaxed and pleasant.

"Well, I might let you have some stuff. I guess Russell won't care, if he don't know. You come into the kitchen. I'll fix you up something. Only keep your mouth shut about where you got it."

He followed her. The house was stuffy and overfurnished. A taper of cheap incense burned in the dining-room. But the kitchen was clean, and with a pang of real hunger Gladden glanced over the woman's shoulder into a cupboard stacked with canned food.

"I'll give you some of this," she said. "My husband never knows what I keep on these shelves. He'd miss eggs or butter like a shot."

She let the kimono fall away from her throat, revealing smooth white flesh and a nightgown trimmed with gay rosettes of ribbon.

"I was just going to bed when you rang. I get awful scared here alone. The dog's no good. He's a coward."

SHE studied Gladden while she packed the things in a cardboard box.

"What are you doing here, anyway?"

He told her, wishing she would hurry. He didn't want to flirt with her, and that was what she wanted him to do. She was silly, and a vain little fool.

"This is an awful p'ace," she confided. "Nothing to do, except work and yawn! Honest. Not a movie in ten miles. No neighbors. Gosh! If we didn't have a car, I'd go crazy. I'm from the city, myself."

"Is that so?"

"From Sacramento. Gosh, I'd like to go back. This is being buried, living in a place like this." She smiled at him. "You from New York?"

"Yes," Gladden said. "Can I have some bread?"

"No, you can't."

"I'll bring you another loaf to-morrow. Won't that do?"

He had offended her. He was too hungry to take as much interest as she demanded. He saw his mistake.

"You've got pretty hair," he said.

"You think so?" She ran her fingers through the vibrant red curls, shook her head. "There isn't anyone to see it, out here! In Sacramento they used to call me the prettiest girl in town. Because of my hair!"

She slipped a loaf of bread into the box.

"There. Take it. But keep away from here for a few days. My husband's awful jealous. He'd shoot you if he found you here."

"That's funny," Gladden thought. "She's going to get at him through me! I have the bread, anyhow." He backed out of the kitchen, through the scented dining-room to the front door. "I'm awfully obliged to you," he said.

She refused what he offered her. "I don't want any money. Keep it. But say—" She smiled at him again. "It's not going to be lonely, knowing you're so near. Don't be surprised if you see me over there."

"I'll send Mother down to help you," she said. "She raised five of us." But Gladden shook his head: "It's my job. I'll feel better if I go the whole way. I don't want any help"

"There's always a Delilah," Gladden thought. He stood there, wondering what to say. And suddenly she laughed.

"You boob you! Are you scared of me?"

"No, I'm not." Gladden pulled her toward him and kissed her.

Afterward, running down the road in the dark, with the precious bundle of food beneath his arm, he wondered why he had kissed a strange woman who was obviously as endearing and guileless as a rattlesnake.

He had started out to threaten a man, to shoot him if necessary, secure in the righteousness of an unselfish cause. Instead, he had kissed that man's wife, because she wanted him to. Again, it occurred to him to drop the food on the Smith doorstep, and run, scuttle off in the dark to something he could understand. Here, the very sky was unfamiliar. The stars seemed to swing down close to the earth, like bright balloons attached to invisible threads. The air was full of a dusty pungency, a dry sweetness.

"I'll give them something to eat, and then I'll beat it," he said.

But he had not reached the ford when a car rushed out of the darkness, its headlights finding him and his bundle with the accuracy of a "spot." Gladden stepped quickly to one side as the car came to a halt, and, covering the man who alighted, said, "I'm armed. Keep back. I'm not going to kill you unless I have to."

The man paused. It was Pelgram, as Gladden had hoped it might be. There were other men in the car. One of them switched off the lights, and there they were, in a sort of funnel of darkness beneath some very tall, dry trees that rattled against the stars.

PELGRAM did not answer. He apparently thought the time had come for action. With a mute roar he bore down on Gladden, charging through the darkness, both hands outstretched and groping.

Gladden dropped to his knees. The river was before him, and, across the river, property given him in trust when Fred Smith died. His own land. He crawled toward sanctuary. The men—there must have been five of them—floundered in the tangled thicket of last winter's gigantic mustard and mulberry, gone to seed. Gladden, wriggling, face down, wondered who they were, and why they were so intent on getting the best of him. There didn't seem to be any point to their game. It was true that he had kissed Mrs. Pelgram; but no one knew that!

Gladden began to feel like the First Man, the Hunter, the Protector, the Father. He

"I must be a fool!" he thought. "They're not after me at all. They want something that belongs to those kids. They got old Manuel out of the way, and just when they thought they were safe, along I came. No wonder they're mad!"

It would be pleasant to get himself shot to-night—with those kids as empty as little empty gourds. A row of little empty gourds with a hollow rattle! And himself dead on Mrs. Pelgram's box of canned goods, on that loaf of bread won with a kiss. So confounded silly, after Saint-Mihiel!

He lay in a covert of very tall thistles, wild artichokes with great spiked blossoms like porcupines on stilts, leaves like swords. The men thrashed and breathed all around him. One of them said, "Come on. Let's go back. He's got a gun." Gladden took this to mean that none of them had.

They made so much noise that it was an easy matter to crawl to the river's edge and then to worm his way across, from stone to stone. He had learned this feline trick in France, when life depended on making an invisible progress from one shell hole to another.

THE men on the bank lost him. To scatter them, he fired a shot from the security of the Smith orchard. It fanned someone's ears: there were shouts, and the car roared away without any lights.

Gladden went on his way. He was a good deal dirtier; his shirt was in ribbons; but the pasteboard box was intact. He had not even rolled on the loaf of bread.

He discovered, that night, the peculiar helplessness of the brood. Like hungry birdlings in a nest, they waited to be fed. Bertha, who should have been the little mother, was about as domesticated as a Russian princess, a mental defective, or a stage child. She did not know how to cut bread. She had never heard of a can opener.

Gladden pried the baked beans into the world with a rusty nail and a hammer. Bertha was gray-eyed, white and small. She watched him very much as a terrier pup watches a new master; her eyes held the wistful capacity for suffering peculiar to dogs. But she had, surprisingly, a dimple. When she smiled, you saw that she had a little imp of her own. Like the terrier pup, she might nip the foot that kicked her.

"You've all got to behave," Gladden said. "If I'm going to take care of you, you've got to learn manners. Take your hands out of the beans! Good God might not like poverty and babies and heat and hunger; but he'd have to deal with them aren't there any spoons in this house?"

"Who's God?" Nancy wanted to know.

"She always asks that," Bertha said. "Shut up, Nancy. The gentleman don't know, and he don't care."

"I know all right," Gladden said darkly. "And I'll tell you as soon as I'm ready. Now get me some plates."

Peter said there weren't any.

"What do you eat on?"

"On the table."

It was true; there were no plates. The indescribable confusion of a cupboard disclosed a heap of broken crockery, a fine luster teapot minus a top, and four empty vinegar cruets. There were no spoons; but Gladden found three battered forks and a tin cake turner. He hacked at the bread with his penknife.

"I'll give them the beans to-night, and the spaghetti to-morrow morning," he thought. He had not reckoned on their capacity. The beans disappeared like a patch of snow in April. Before the candle stub flickered them all into darkness, the spaghetti had melted away, the bread was gone, and a jar of raspberry jam was scraped clean. The dog ate Gladden's share. He lighted matches and put the groggy children to bed.

PETER took the old sofa in the sitting-room and Bertha curled up on a pile of ragged quilts. "I always do. Manuel sold the beds. All except two." She sat up again. "Is Manuel really dead?"

"Yes," Gladden said; "he is."

There were no more matches. Out of the darkness, Bertha said, "What'll happen to us, now?"

"I'm here," Gladden said stiffly. "I guess I can take care of you."

"You won't stay," she said.

"That's up to you. And to Pete. And to the three kids."

"Why?"

"You've got to help me."

"I'll try. But I don't know anything." She was silent a moment, in which Gladden had time to wonder whether she was crying. Then she said, "It's easier not to know anything. Then you can do as you please!"

IN THE morning, after a breakfast of sour speckled pears and boiled water, Gladden tried to mend the car. In the days of his thoughtless and pleasant dependency, he had had a car of his own. He had liked to tinker with it, fastidiously, in the garage, where Gladden Senior had installed a concrete pit, an elaborate tool table, and all the paraphernalia sacred to chauffeurs and mechanics.

Pete was secretly proud of the Smith car. "This is our car," he explained. "It used to run good. My father took us to the city in it; it run all the way. Coming back, something bust. A fellow towed us in. It's never gone so very much since."

"I should think not," Gladden said.

The children sat in the empty manger while Gladden examined the remains. Bertha twisted her thin legs around the stall post and pretended to be a merry-go-round.

"Keep still!" Gladden shouted. "I want to think!"

Nancy giggled.

Pete and Henry were male, and therefore interested. Henry climbed into the tonneau, to discover for himself that the horn still worked: to prove it, he sounded the thing forty or fifty times. The doves in the misty cross-beams fluttered up and away, escaping into the sunlight on frightened wings. The dog had hysterics.

"No wonder," Gladden thought. "He's hungry. So am I. I could have hysterics without trying."

He could feel the outline of his digestive tract: thirty feet of gnawing emptiness. His stomach felt like a wafer. His eyes burned (Continued on page 216)

Your Aunt Emma

She hopes nobody is going to be sick

By Don Marquis

ILLUSTRATED BY NORMAN PRICE

"YOU'D better take your rubbers," says Aunt Emma.

"But it isn't wet, Aunt Emma," you protest.

"Clouding up," she says, "over there in the northwest. It will rain before you get back. And there's a lot of pneumonia around this year, more of it than usual. Doctor Barnes tells me that the influenza this year is turning into pneumonia a good deal quicker and easier than it ever did before in all his forty years of professional experience."

You go out, gritting your teeth, and you don't wear the rubbers—you wouldn't wear them if the street were ankle deep in slush and pneumonia were a certainty.

And yet, you like Aunt Emma too. Nobody dislikes her. She is kindness and thoughtfulness and unselfishness personified—especially to the sick.

That's the trouble.

Aunt Emma will drop her own affairs any time at a moment's notice and go any distance to take charge of the sick-room of a friend or relation. And when I say take charge, I mean Take Charge—doctor, trained nurses, family, friends, and the patient himself, know at once whose velvet glove and iron hand are functioning.

I can put the psychology of Aunt Emma before you in a paragraph: When everybody is well, she is vaguely worried and unhappy and apprehensive; and this mood is communicated to her entire circle. When somebody is flat on his back, and needs her, she cheers up, "takes charge," and at once begins to radiate hope and energy and courage.

Illness can't faze her. She looks it steadily in its gaunt face, and tells it to its hollow eyes to go chase itself, and it usually does.

But when everybody is in perfect health, she worries and worries and fusses and fusses, and advises and frets and apprehends and doubts.

"Have the children got on their winter underwear yet?" she will ask forebodingly, as she sits down to the dinner table of some family connection. "It's the ninth of November."

"It's been a very warm fall, Aunt Emma," you say defensively.

"It's the ninth of November," says Aunt Emma, disregarding the remark about the prevailing temperature. And she looks suspiciously at young Tommy, across the table, who is as husky as a hard-boiled battleship, and never really ill, because he hasn't imagination enough to know what illness is like.

"I thought Tommy had the sniffles," she says.

And Tommy, out of sheer nervousness, obliges with a cough.

"I was sure of it," says Aunt Emma, and cheers up a little. "I'll rub his chest to-night with Doctor Jigger's Chest-Ease, and put some of it up his nose too. We'll put a hot-water bottle to his feet and some red flannel around his neck, and give him some warm fluberry-blossom tea to drink, and get him to perspiring, and you must watch to see that he doesn't throw his covers off during the night. We'll break this thing up before it gets really well started; and then next week, when he's well enough to stand the operation, we'll have his tonsils out. And his adenoids too, if he's got any."

Aunt Emma's path in life for the past ten years had been almost literally paved with tonsils and adenoids which she has had removed from helpless relatives and friends, who have learned that it is easier in the long run to come across with them quickly than it is to struggle against fate.

A tonsil or an adenoid hasn't any more chance to endure in our family than a snowball in the place Dante visited and wrote such sensational reports about. One cousin claims that she even has had two sets of tonsils removed from him. She goes after them like the aboriginal Red Man used to go after scalps. They are trophies of her efficiency. The first thing a new baby in our set learns is not to open its mouth too widely to cry if Aunt Emma is about. She hounded my own tonsils for five years before I finally laid them at her feet, so to speak—it was her birthday, and I knew nothing could make her happier. Her final argument was this:

"If you get them out now, it's just one more precaution against rheumatism twenty years from now, when you are an old man."

WHENEVER I see Aunt Emma dejected and melancholy and somewhat listless, I know that the state of the general health in our town is well-nigh perfect. She feels restless and she fears the worst. She is like the distrustful old inhabitant who refers to every fine day as a "weather-breeder." It doesn't seem

She told me I had the Spanish flu—I said it was the pepper right; something terrible is going to happen to someone. This calm is treacherous, and it must forebode whirlwinds and cyclones of infection and contagion. The slightest sign of indisposition puts her on the alert—the subtle enemy is, perhaps, about to attack, and she braces herself for the shock, proposes to dig in and fight it out on this line if it takes forever.

It was only two weeks ago that I got too much pepper on my potato, at dinner, and sneezed.

"Spanish influenza," said Aunt Emma, cheering up a bit, "you must get into bed at once. The germs this year are worse than they have ever been."

And she looked critically at a point about two feet in front of my face. I fancied that she was actually looking at the germs. Perhaps, in imagination, she really was. For germs have the utmost reality to Aunt Emma. I believe she thinks of them as being about the size of crickets, or small honey bees.

THERE is something keenly personal in her animosity to each individual germ. She seems to know them all by their individual peculiarities, as an old-fashioned school-mistress knew all the bad boys in her classes. She looks into the air after a person has coughed or sneezed, as if she were saying to certain iniquitous characters, visible only to herself:

"Yes, I know you, young microbe! You aren't fooling me at all! I expected you to break out in this place, about this time, in just this particular way! You haven't been deceiving Aunt Emma by your apparent calm! I'll take you by the collar of your jacket and shake the willful wickedness out of your system in just about one more minute, if I hear another murmur out of you!"

If I were a germ, I'd commit suicide the moment I saw Aunt Emma come inside the door; it would be the easiest way out.

When she told me I had the Spanish flu, I said it was the pepper; but just then another sneeze started, and in suppressing it the water came to my eyes. I felt it, and I knew that would be used against me. It was.

"Eyes watery, face flushed," said Aunt Emma. "You haven't been wearing those woolen socks I sent you!"

"It was only the pepper," I said, getting redder than ever in the face.

"You're running a temperature right now," she continued, disregarding my words and the pepper. "When the eyes water that way, it's a sure indication of sinus trouble, if it isn't taken in time. That usually means a terrible operation. Almost as bad as mastoiditis. There's nothing more dangerous than mastoiditis, the surgeons have to cut so near the brain, you know. Do you feel sore spots in those bony triangles behind your ears? No? Well, one terrible thing about it is that it is usually pretty well established before you feel any pain at all. Generally starts with sneezing, watery eyes, and a slight feverish feeling. You ought to go to bed at once."

I knew it was the pepper; but after that it was two hours before I could persuade myself that it wasn't mastoiditis.

I don't remember ever having seen Aunt Emma come into a room that wasn't too hot for health, or too cold. When we know she is coming we make the rooms cooler than we really like them, before she gets there, so that after she has had them changed they will be comfortable for us.

It's almost as much as your life is worth to kiss a child in her presence without first brushing your lips with a germicide. Last year, on St. Valentine's Day, she sent fourteen Valentines to her more juvenile relations, and they were all of her own manufacture. They were pretty, too; but each one of them had, besides the conventional loving message, this additional warning, Aunt Emma herself being the poetess:

> Brush your teeth five times a day;
> An unclean tooth will soon decay—
> Infection steals your life away.

OURS is a very large family connection, what with Cousins, Aunts, Uncles, Second Cousins, In-laws, etc., etc., and there is not a household that doesn't have what might be called its Aunt Emma Collection—things necessary to our health and welfare, ranging from articles of clothing to bottles and boxes of medicine, germicides, disinfectants, treatises on hygiene, and mechanical contrivances of every description. She has been married twice, but she never had any children, and I suppose a sort of vicarious motherhood rages within her, and impels her to wreak herself upon all the world. Her first husband was killed in a railroad accident, without any interval of sick-bed; and her second husband, for all any of us know, may still be living. After wearing everything she ordered him to, eating everything beneficial, and drinking everything medicinal, for seven years, he suddenly disappeared.

All we ever knew of his sentiments was contained in a note which was pinned to a liver-pad, which was found hanging in the bathroom. The note said: "I never had liver complaint, (Continued on page 93)

To Every Man His Dream—But To Hugh Newsom Two Dreams

His mechanical ability and his boyhood hope of becoming a locomotive engineer find their expression in toy trains and a complete railway system in miniature; his musical genius and his manhood visions are expressed in compositions that critics applaud

By Mildred Harrington

"ORDERS!"

Eighteen men were scattered in groups about a long room on the ground floor of an apartment house far up on Riverside Drive, New York City. Instantly they snapped to attention. The tall, slim young man in the center of the room—he was obviously the acknowledged leader of the group—spoke rapidly but clearly:

"Hold that freight at Great Gorge, Charlie," he commanded. "Clear track two for the fast mail, Doc. You new man at Mountain Curve keep an eye out for the double-header due from the West. Tony, check up on that string of refrigerator cars at Junction City, and set 'em out on the siding. Remember the wreck last Thursday night when somebody watched another fellow's block signals instead of his own. On the job now! Ready?"

"Ready!" shouted an eager chorus of bass and tenor voices.

The tall young man pushed down a lever. Simultaneously, eleven Tom Thumb trains, perfect reproductions in every detail of the trains that puff in and out of every railway station in America, glided into action. Red or green lights flashed from diminutive signal towers, and eighteen pairs of hands, some soft and white and some with work-calloused palms, responded by throwing switches and manipulating levers.

At the same instant, eighteen grown men forgot their grown-up responsibilities. The clock turned back ten, twenty, thirty years. For a whole evening, they would be care-free youngsters again. And they were playing railroading, that game so dear to the heart of the small boy!

They started at eight-thirty. They were supposed to go home at ten-thirty. But just before quitting time somebody suggested a new cantilever bridge for Great Gorge, and it was a quarter past twelve before the last of the gang straggled out. It was like that almost every night they met.

The "new man at Mountain Curve" (he happened to be one of the most famous lawyers in the country) went off toward the subway station arm in arm with Charlie, a young policeman, who, next to Hugh Newsom, the originator and builder of this extraordinarily complete diminutive railway system, is the mechanical genius of the group. Doctor Duncan (that is not his real name, of course) is head of a department at Columbia University. He is also the author of a number of important scientific books. It was Doctor Duncan, Mr. Newsom, and Tony, the Italian janitor of a nearby apartment house, who finally pulled down the shades and locked up. They separated at the corner.

Hugh Newsom built his toy railroad for the sheer fun of doing it. He spent a year and more than seven thousand dollars on the job. Long before he had laid the first unit of track, a dozen boys had a finger in the pie. Some of them were members of Mr. Newsom's Sunday-

No, this is not the wreck of two transcontinental limiteds, and no lives were lost when the trains "piled up," but that was because there were no living things on board. school class; some were younger brothers or sons of his friends; others just drifted in and forgot to leave.

By the time the system was ready for operation, there were fifty-odd boys demanding "railroad jobs." Everybody couldn't work at once, so groups for certain afternoons were organized. But soon all the afternoons were filled, and still there were more boys than jobs. Hugh Newsom promptly began laying more track, building new stations and ordering additional cars and locomotives from the factory which he had finally induced to make equipment from the models designed and built by him and his boys.

At first, there were no fees and no regular membership. But before the system had been in operation a month it was necessary to do something to keep boys on the street from crowding into the shop in such numbers that work was impossible.

Calling together the original dozen boys who had helped build the road, Mr. Newsom organized the Junior Railway Club. This was two years ago. The boys fixed a membership fee of five dollars, which would entitle a member to a shop card. This card solved the problem of admission at the door. It might be added, however, that the membership fee has never kept a worthy boy out of the club. Mr. Newsom sees to that.

AND now, of course, you are wondering where Charlie, the young cop, and Tony, the janitor, and the Columbia professor, and all the rest of the grown-ups come in. I'll tell you.

One afternoon, Billy Brown's father dropped in to find out why Billy was always late to supper on Saturdays. He spent the entire afternoon, and wound up by bidding for and holding down Billy's job as switchman at Junction City. That night both Billy and his father were late to supper!

The next Saturday afternoon, Billy's father turned up again. This time, Mr. Newsom refused to let Mr. Brown monopolize Billy's post at Junction City; but he did invite Mr. Brown to come back one night the following week and help him put in some new signal towers. Mr. Brown has been coming back once a week ever since.

CHARLIE, the young policeman on the beat, had his curiosity repeatedly aroused by seeing dozens of youngsters with their noses pressed against the ten ground-floor windows of the big red building on the corner. Then, one drizzly afternoon, just as he was starting home, he had to cross the street to stop a fight between a couple of ten-year-olds, each of whom claimed that the other had pushed him away from his "place" at the window. After separating the two boys, Charlie himself took a squint, to find out what in creation kept so many restless kids chained to the wet sidewalk when there was a movie house just around the corner.

What Charlie saw made his blood and his fingers tingle, for Charlie is a born mechanic. Stretched out on long waist-high tables that ran across and down the huge L-shaped room was a great trunk-line railway system in miniature. There were eleven stations, complete even to the flocks of tiny motor trucks and taxis lined up beside the track. There were rows and rows of telegraph lines, and modern signal towers. There was every known type of locomotive, from the old coal burner to the newest electric engine.

The young policeman estimated that there were more than two thousand feet of double- and triple-track main lines. In plain sight was one station which alone must have at least two hundred and fifty feet of switch yards. He counted twenty-two locomotives and hundreds of cars of every kind. There were Pullmans, observation, mail, club, and parlor cars, baggage cars, and day coaches. There were perfect reproductions in scale of oil tankers, coal cars, flat cars, stock cars, refrigerator cars, and cabooses. There were tunnels and bridges of the arch, trestle, suspension, and cantilever types.

Charlie couldn't stand it.

He went in to find out whether or not his eyes were playing tricks on him. He stayed to prove to Mr. Newsom that cement makes a very satisfactory mountain. And, like Billy Brown's father, he kept on coming back. Last fall, Mr. Newsom and Charlie built an exact scale model of the Oriental Limited, one of the finest trains in the world. For weeks, this model attracted the attention of thousands in a show window on Fifth Avenue.

Hugh Newsom, who founded the Junior Railway Club described in this article as a recreation from his serious work as a musician. Mr. Newsom was born in India, but was brought to this country when he was six. He studied music in the New England Conservatory, in Boston. Fifteen of his compositions have been published, and many more are to be issued later. professor called up Mr. Newsom and asked if he might visit the club. In various ways, other grown-ups heard of the club, and dropped in. They got to be such frequent visitors that Mr. Newsom had to ask them to come at night, so that the boys would have a chance to play. Soon there was a more or less regular crowd dropping in on Thursday nights. One of the latest recruits is the chief engineer of a big electrical house.

News of the Junior Railway Club kept spreading. The papers carried pieces about it. School and college men began to discuss it from an educational point of view. The movies became interested. Pathé and Fox sent camera men to shoot pictures of the trains in operation.

One motion picture company required a scene showing two monster locomotives crashing into a head-on collision on a high bridge. Actually to build trestle, tracks, and dummy engines and cars for this one scene would have cost the company thousands of dollars. Mr. Newsom and his boys staged a wreck which the motion picture people "shot." The scene was a tremendous success.

DURING the two years since the Junior Railway was organized, hundreds of boys have profited by the marvelous training Mr. Newsom gives. In order to hold down a railroad job, a boy must learn discipline, accuracy, and quick thinking. And, best of all, he learns never to offer an alibi for a mistake. If a collision occurs in his block because the wrong lever was thrown, he is responsible, and he must shoulder his responsibility.

And the geography and economics that the boys pick up! They find out that railroads can make one community rich and another poor, simply by putting on or taking off trains. They understand how the industrial condition of a whole state may be affected by the difference of a few cents in a freight rate.

And the man who is back of all this is neither an economist nor an engineer. He is a professional musician!

Hugh Newsom began life in India, where his parents were missionaries. From the day of his birth, both his father and his mother dreamed of the day when he would carry on their work. But apparently fate had other plans for the boy.

When he was five years old, he developed Indian malaria. This rapidly went into pernicious anemia, which frequently attacks white children born in India. In a few months, his bones had become soft and pliable, like putty.

"Our family doctor in Cawnpore, where we were stationed," he told me, "had Mother take me up into the hill country. But instead of improving there I got steadily worse. A very famous English physician who was billeted in the hills at that time warned Mother that she would have to get me out of the country immediately, if she wanted to save my life. 'Don't wait to go back to Cawnpore to pack your things,' said the English doctor. 'Catch a boat at the nearest port, and leave at once.'

"This was a terrible blow to my parents, because they loved their work better than they loved life itself. They had made incredible sacrifices to come to India. But now they were ready to make the supreme sacrifice, and leave India, if by doing so they could save me.

"In a few days, we were on a freighter, the only available boat, bound for America by way of the Red Sea and the Mediterranean. We were the only passengers. The physician whom my parents had engaged to make the trip with us later told my father that he expected me to be buried at sea. But I wasn't. I began to get better almost at once.

"Life aboard a freighter would have been very monotonous except for two things: the big engines throbbing in the hold, and the songs that the sailors sang in the evening. Every day, when I grew restless, Father would take me in his arms and we would make a tour of the ship. The spot that fascinated me most was the hold. No matter how miserable and fretful I had been, I would always become quiet and happy if only I were allowed to watch the men at work in the engine-room. There was a reason for this.

"We had made the trip from Cawnpore to the hill country by train. This was my first sight of a locomotive. Sick as I was, the enormous power and the mechanical detail of the great engine enthralled me. There were a thousand thrills in the way the big wheels went 'round and 'round and the giant pistons shot back and forth. The man who sat in the cab with his hand on the throttle was to me a much more to be envied person than the governor general of all India. Ever thereafter, in all my childish dreams, I saw myself sitting in his high seat, my hand directing the flight of a mighty engine.

"But it was aboard the freighter that a still greater dream began to take shape in my heart. In the evenings, the sailors would sing, sometimes great lusty roars, sometimes plaintive, melancholy ballads that filled me with a sort of fearful delight. I cannot tell you how the sound of their voices ringing out across the blue Mediterranean took hold of my childish imagination. From that time, there was born in me a great longing to create music.

"I GOT so much better toward the last leg of our journey that my parents began to plan to return to India, after perhaps a few years in America. But at this point, fate again took a hand in my affairs. No sooner had we landed than I developed pneumonia. In my weakened condition, the doctors held out little hope; but they fought valiantly.

"However, I think what made me hold on to the slender thread that separated me from death was not so much what the doctors and nurses did as what happened the night the physician in charge bluntly told Father that I could not live till morning.

"Father and Mother were taking turns watching with the nurse at my bedside. In the middle of the night, I was awakened by Father's voice in conversation with somebody. He was talking very quietly so as not to disturb me. I couldn't see his face, but I could tell by his voice that he was talking about something that meant a great deal to him. Every now and then, Father would pause, and, lying there in the dark, I could feel him listening. And although I couldn't hear any words, I knew that somebody was answering him.

"All at once, it dawned upon me that Father was talking to God. He was asking God to let me live. Not only that but he was promising God that if I lived I would some day go back to India and carry on his unfinished work there. Father was not talking as he prayed in church, when somehow God always seemed very far off and unapproachable. He was speaking intimately and almost affectionately, as he might have spoken to any tried and trusted friend.

"For the first time in my life," said Hugh Newsom, "I felt comfortable about God. I knew that He had been in that hospital room with Father and me, as surely as if He had put His hand on my head. And I liked His being that close. It gave me a warm, happy sense of security that has stayed with me through the years.

"But, young and ill as I was, I knew that I could never be a missionary like Father. Something in me rebelled at the thought. And the curious part of it is, I was sure that God understood!

"The doctors were greatly surprised when I lived through the night and took a turn for the better. But Father was not surprised; he had expected the miracle to happen.

"Now, a missionary may have riches stored up in heaven, but he usually has few negotiable assets on earth. During the next two or three years, Father went thousands of dollars in debt to pay for the expensive treatments and nursing I had to undergo in order to recover from the pernicious anemia which had brought me to America. But of course I knew nothing of all this at the time."

WHEN Hugh was seven, he left the hospital and went to live with his family in the various pastorates which his father served. In many of the smaller towns, there was nobody to take charge of the music. Under his mother's direction, the boy began to study to fit himself to act as his father's organist.

"I learned to read my notes almost before I learned to read my primer," he said, "and I could play hymns long before my toes could reach the pedals of the wheezy old parsonage organ. By the time I was nine, I was serving regularly as organist wherever Father served as pastor."

During the following years the boy was experimenting with every instrument he could lay his hands on: a playmate's mouth organ, a neighbor's piano, or a violin which belonged to a lucky boy on the other side of town. Every penny that he could earn at odd jobs went to buy books on harmony, the history of symphony, and other musical subjects. These books were carefully hidden from his family.

Already Hugh dared to dream of composing. But this dream he kept to himself. Indeed, he thought of it as a black sin, of which he ought to be heartily ashamed, for he never forgot that his father had promised him to God as a missionary. He fought his dream with all the strength of his boyish soul; but, bit by bit, it grew stronger than he was. As he practiced on the church organ, music which came from somewhere within himself instead of from the score before him trembled beneath his fingers. Theme after theme was composed, and carefully hidden away.

From now on, his childhood dream of ome day running a locomotive began to ecede more and more into the background of his consciousness. But the ream never lost its glamour. He still nanaged to slip down to the stations to atch the great engines that paused riefly in the small tank-water towns in hich the Newsoms were sually stationed.

And then, when Hugh was hirteen, a big thing happened: His family moved gain, this time to an Iowa own called Wapello. In his ather's church there was a ipe organ. At once Hugh as all eagerness to try it. But at the Saturday night hoir rehearsal, everybody ssured him there wasn't any se. The church had been tung in buying the organ; it asn't any good at all. No natter how fine the performer, the most frightful iscords resulted when the eys were touched.

Hugh didn't insist further nd on Sunday he played the iano at the morning service. But at the midday dinner he as missed when the family at down at the table. The ouse was searched. No lugh. The barn was ranacked. Still no Hugh. One f the children made a round f the new neighbors' homes ith no better results. Fially, in desperation, someody suggested looking in the hurch. And there they ound him, a monkey wrench n his hand, and all the pipes f the organ spread out round him on the floor, in he pews, and even piled up n the pulpit!

The family were petrified ith horror. They were trangers in the community. Vhat would the members of he congregation think if they iscovered that the new inister's son had taken such liberty with their property? Besides, there was to be a ervice that night. Even if Hugh could remember where all those pipes came from, would he ever be able to put them back in time?

"My child," said his father, "what have you done?"

"The man who installed the organ put it together wrong," explained Hugh, fitting a brace of pipes into position. "I'm fixing it so I can play it to-night."

The pastor looked at the wreck about him. Then he turned to his wife. "You'd better not finish unpacking, Mother," he said. "I have a suspicion we'll be moving again in a few days."

The fast mail, approaching "Suspension Bridge." (Below) Trains waiting to enter "Great City" station. The tracks are laid on tables. There are eleven stations, faithful even to the tiny waiting trucks and taxis; there are complete telegraph and signal systems, extensive switch yards, engines of the coal-burning type, as well as the latest electric locomotives; coaches, Pullmans, and even observation cars with awnings and brass railings at the rear

But long before time for the service, Hugh had completed his chore, and put the church in order. And that night, to the astonishment of the entire community, as well as to the immense relief of his parents, the boy successfully played the instrument which had stood silent for a year or more. Musical Wapello promptly took the new Methodist preacher's boy to its heart. The choir of his father's church in particular showed itself willing to follow anywhere he led.

Bit by bit, nobody knew just how, Hugh Newsom's choir came to be composed solely of men. And it was soon the pride, not only of the Methodist church, but also of the whole countryside. It was a strictly non-partisan organization. Membership in it was open to any man who had a voice, and who was willing to attend frequent and arduous practices.

The choir grew to have almost a hundred voices, and it was in demand on all important occasions throughout the state. To-day, four of the charter members are singing in opera.

THE biggest event of Hugh Newsom's boyhood occurred toward the close of his second year in Wapello. It was nearing Easter, and the music had not been chosen for the special service. On Saturday, just three weeks before Easter, Hugh was lunching with a friend, a young doctor seven or eight years his senior, who belonged to his choir. (Continued on page 209)

The Master Potter of Jugtown

PHOTOGRAPH BY W. BURDEN STAGE

Jacques Busbee of Jugtown, North Carolina, and (above) Juliana Busbee, his wife, who between them have built up a remarkable pottery industry in their native state. Eleven years ago, Jugtown, a stronghold of potters since Colonial days, was practically abandoned. Now thousands of dollars' worth of Jugtown ware is shipped annually from the community

HOW would you like to be the only "mister" in your community? That is a distinction enjoyed by Jacques Busbee, of Jugtown, North Carolina, who, ten years ago, swapped his artist's smock for a pair of overalls and his easel for a potter's wheel.

Ten years ago, probably no one, except a few North Carolinians, ever had heard of Jugtown. To-day, the name is stamped on more than half a million pieces of hand-turned pottery which is being sold all over the world. Not only that, but early Jugtown pieces are now to be found in many of the great art museums of the country.

Strangely enough, Jugtown never has been a town. It is simply a convenient name for a scattered rural community radiating from a handful of houses set down in a pine clearing in the extreme northwestern corner of Moore County. For nearly two centuries, many of the people in this out-of-the-way spot have earned a livelihood by turning on a primitive kick-wheel jugs, dishes, pitchers, candlesticks, churns, mugs, and other homely household pottery.

And in Jugtown, as in other places where the same families have lived side by side for generation after generation, old and young alike are addressed by their baptismal names as a matter of course.

The story of how Jacques Busbee came to be the first "mister" in Jugtown is also the story of the almost miraculous transformation of a whole community—that had become discouraged and down-at-the-heels—into a group of self-respecting, wide-awake craftsmen, with a justifiable pride in their skill and a heartening faith in their future.

More than that, it is a revelation of the intense love of two people, Jacques Busbee and his wife, Juliana, for their native state. It is a record of their grim determination to keep alive a fast-perishing craft which had been handed down from father to son in this section of North Carolina since early Colonial days. It is a story of a self-forgetfulness so great that it made these two glad to sell the roof over their heads in order to carry on an undertaking which even their own families and lifelong friends assured them was foredoomed to failure. But let's go back a bit.

Ten years ago, Mr. and Mrs. Busbee were living in Raleigh, North Carolina, the town in which they were born, and in which their ancestors had lived for many generations. Mr. Busbee was a portrait painter. He had spent fifteen years studying in New York and elsewhere and he had come back to North Carolina to earn his living by his brush. But he found few people who felt they could afford so expensive a luxury as a portrait.

In order to add to his income, Jacques Busbee wrote magazine articles and lectured on art at schools and colleges throughout the state. In the meantime, his wife, who was state chairman of art in the Federation of Women's Clubs, had become greatly interested in teaching the women of the isolated country districts how to weave baskets and trays out of the native grasses and pine needles. In everything that they did and said, the Busbees tried to show that you can have beauty in your life even if you haven't much money.

In their expeditions into the by-ways of North Carolina, the Busbees found many specimens of old pottery, remarkable for its charming simplicity of design and sureness of execution. They began to make a collection of this ware. Soon their home in Raleigh was overflowing with examples of the best work of the early Carolina potters.

By this time, the Busbees were interested heart and soul in native pottery. They began to look around to see if pottery making had survived anywhere in the state. They found that the craft had just about disappeared.

because the demand for utilitarian pottery had died out.

In one pottery district, known locally as Jugtown, the Busbees learned that the descendants of the famous Staffordshire potters of England—boys with strong, shapely hands, made for turning clay on a wheel—were going off to work in cotton mills, or tobacco factories. And in every lean-to in Jugtown a kick-wheel, once an integral part of the life of the community, was rotting in idleness.

"At this point," Mr. Busbee explained to me during a recent visit to Jugtown, "I was appointed to judge the art exhibits at the State Fair. Immediately, I saw a way to revive interest in pottery making. I wrote to every potter whose name I could get, or to some influential man in each community where pottery had once been made. I begged these people to send exhibits to the fair.

"The result was that we got a lot of very poor stuff, mostly imitations of cheap factory-made novelties; but we also got a few very good pieces worthy of the tradition of the old Staffordshire potters. I was convinced that the spark survived.

"Mrs. Busbee and I began to preach pottery to everybody we met. We urged that it was an art native to the state. We lugged around pieces from our own collection to show, and we made talks before every sort of organization that would open its doors to us.

"Before long, the survival of pottery as a native craft seemed to me so much more important than my own career as a painter that I definitely shelved my ambitions along that line for as many years as it would take me to accomplish this thing I had now made up my mind to do.

"Mrs. Busbee and I both knew that if we could nurse the tiny surviving spark into a flame again, the making of exquisite pottery would go on for many years after we were dead. But we found it hard to make others see our point of view. You see, the people of the state were accustomed to think of earthenware as of not much account. Even among the potters themselves, the craft had fallen into disrepute. Only the old men and the ne'er-do-wells tried to make a living at the kick-wheel any more.

"But there was no sense in encouraging young and ambitious men to make pottery unless we could promise them a market for their wares. So we decided to put our faith in native pottery to the test by going to New York and offering it for sale. If necessary, we ourselves would open a shop."

PHOTOGRAPH BY JOHN G. HEMMER, PINEHURST, N. C.

This is Ben Owens, one of the young potters trained by Mr. Busbee. Ben is "turning" a pitcher on a primitive kick wheel, exactly like that used by his Jugtown ancestors two hundred years ago

Now, to start any sort of business enterprise in a big city requires money, and the Busbees hadn't any. But they did have a house—a very beautiful one. They sold it and their cherished library and set out for New York with their hearts full of hope and their trunks full of pie plates and cider jugs!

The specialty shops where they tried to place their wares were unanimous in agreeing that the pottery was beautiful; but they were equally unanimous in refusing to give orders for reproductions which might not be successful.

"All right," said Juliana Busbee, "I'll start a tea room and sell pottery on the side."

She sent back to Raleigh for her old colored cook, and between them they produced home cooking that melted in the mouths of the city dwellers. People came in droves, and some of them bought the beautiful pottery on the shelves. Word-of-mouth advertising is the most effective kind. Soon Juliana Busbee was selling pottery faster than her husband could ship it up from the South.

For of course Jacques had gone back to North Carolina. From the very outset of their venture, the Busbees realized that he would have to live among the potters. In no other way could he give them the encouragement and careful supervision which they would require for years to come. His hardest job was to make them stick to the beautiful traditional patterns of their forefathers.

There were three or four sections in the state where excellent pottery had been made in the past. Mr. Busbee chose the Jugtown section of Moore County as the most promising place to make his experiment because the potters here were descendants of the Staffordshire potters, and he considered their traditions the best.

However, instead of being complimented by Mr. Busbee's choice, and receiving him with open arms, the Jugtowners regarded him with open distrust.

On the left, you see the finished pottery as it is taken from the kiln. Over half a million pieces of Jugtown ware have been sold during the past eleven years. (Below) Mule power is still used to grind the clay

They had been shut off so long from the outside world that they were suspicious of all strangers. And Jacques Busbee's speech, his city clothes, and the New York label on his trunk all marked him as a stranger. In order to put him in his place, and to make it perfectly clear how they felt about his intrusion, they were always careful to address him as Mr. Busbee.

Nevertheless, Jacques Busbee refused to be discouraged. The day after his arrival, he put on a pair of denim overalls and took his stand by the wheel of old Jimmy Fox, the star potter of the section. For a week he watched, and said nothing. Then, one day, he asked a question:

"What's that handle for, Jimmy?"

"No special use," said Jimmy, a little loftily. "Hit's jes' purty."

"But a handle is meant to be useful, Jimmy," Jacques Busbee pointed out. "If it isn't useful, it's in the wrong place; and anything in the wrong place can't be pretty."

Jimmy said nothing; but after that he indulged in fewer fancy "trimmings." Gradually, the other men fell in line. Soon, without urging on the part of Mr. Busbee, they were trying to outdo each other in reproducing the beautiful simplicity of the early pieces.

Twice a year now, or oftener, Jacques Busbee goes to New York for a month or six weeks. Much of this time he spends in the Metropolitan Museum, studying the classic examples of pottery of all ages and nations. Some of the most successful pieces offered by the Jugtown potters in recent years are exquisite "translations" from the Chinese and Persian.

During the first year of his stay in Jugtown, Mr. Busbee lived in the homes of his potters—boarded around, like the teacher in the district school. Bit by bit, he won the liking and the confidence of the people. He went into the kitchens, and taught the women what he knew of cooking. If there was illness in the neighborhood, he helped with the nursing.

And into every home that he visited, he brought something of beauty. With the help of the children, he would plant flowers about the doorstep. And he taught the youngsters how to model out of clay salt and pepper shakers that looked exactly like the old rooster in the back yard. Some of the old women learned to make these, too. Mr. Busbee marketed them all in New York along with the other Jugtown products. Soon seven- and eight-year-old children were earning enough to buy their school-books and their winter shoes.

In the meantime, the potters were flourishing. They were making more money than they ever had made before in their lives. They began to take the old-time pride in their work. During the past eleven years, more than a hundred thousand dollars' worth of Jugtown pottery has been sold.

Jacques Busbee is still Mr. Busbee to his Jugtown neighbors and friends. But to-day the title expresses only deep respect and affection. One old fellow, the grandfather of a spirited young potter, put into words the community sentiment when he said:

"He belongs to be called Mister, fer he took eddication without lettin' hit spile him!"

MILDRED HARRINGTON

This Texas Deputy is a Deaf-Mute

CITIES everywhere have their silent policemen; but they are made of stone or marble or granite. Coleman, Texas, has a silent deputy sheriff, in human flesh—Rush Johnigan, fifty-years-old deaf-mute, who weighs about one hundred and eighty pounds, stands erect, dresses well, and usually wears a Texas ten-gallon hat.

Johnigan was eighteen months old when his speech and hearing were destroyed. When he was old enough, he started to school with the other children in his neighborhood. And he never asked any odds because of his handicap. He was graduated from the local high school and applied the finishing coat of his education at the Texas School for the Deaf and Dumb.

When he finished school he took a position as cowboy on a Texas ranch, and followed that occupation for seventeen years. Tiring of this vocation, he landed the job of night patrolman in the little town nestled in the curves of Hord Creek, and for seven years has served Coleman efficiently.

Johnigan's equipment consists of a .45 automatic; but in his long career he has never had occasion to use it. Generally, a tap on the back is enough to cause the lawbreaker to yield to this officer who never argues the case out of court. During the time he served the city as night patrolman, there were very few petty burglaries and thefts.

He has served as deputy under four Coleman County sheriffs, and is regarded as a fixture at the office. Frequently he is assigned to the duty of picking up those guilty of driving motor vehicles without license plates. He has had dealings with tourists from every state. Sometimes the transgressor will attempt to argue the question; but when he discovers he is in the custody of one who can neither hear nor speak, he stops talking, and goes to the judge to tell it.

Johnigan is known throughout Texas, and he has been pressed into service in many towns on special occasions. During the big West Texas Chamber of Commerce convention at Mineral Wells, Texas, in May, 1925, he was appointed a special policeman by the chief of police of that city, and served efficiently.

Rush Johnigan of Coleman, Texas, lost both speech and hearing when he was a baby. But he finished high school, herded cattle on a Texas ranch for seventeen years, and now, at fifty, is a very efficient and popular peace officer Johnigan can trace criminals quietly and efficiently. Many times during his daily or nightly rounds he is standing over a crap game before the participants are aware of his presence. When they discover "Dummy"—as he is affectionately called by his friends—it is too late to hide the evidence.

Nothing furnishes the "silent deputy" more pleasure than to sit in the court-room during the progress of a criminal case. He knows every man in the county, and is familiar with their politics and religion. Almost without exception, he can tell in advance whether or not the venire man will be acceptable as a juryman by the State or the defense, and frequently, without hearing a word of the evidence, can predict the verdict. Johnigan makes a good peace officer, because waves of public sentiment pass over his head, and none of his time is wasted in listening to politicians.

As a member of the Coleman Volunteer Fire Department, Johnigan's principal duties for the past fifteen years have been to clear a passage for the fire-fighting apparatus, and to prevent accidents.

Johnigan has been in Coleman so long, and is so accustomed to talking by gestures with his friends, that they can understand him nearly as well as if he were speaking. Often he stops reporters for the local paper, writes down the name or names of men he has arrested, and explains smaller details with his hands and facial movements. Some of his friends have learned the sign language, and with them Johnigan freely discusses timely topics, and sometimes gets information that leads to arrests.

He Hunts Big Game With the Bow and Arrow

AT AVALON, on a sultry afternoon several years ago, young Van Campen Heilner, angler and explorer, harpooned a record ocean sunfish. The prize was inded after a terrific struggle lasting nore than three hours. A boatman aided ne boyish sportsman. For the catch, a eavy-weight of the seas, weighed two nousand pounds. A derrick which atempted to bring it up on the shores of the anta Catalina Islands collapsed under ne strain. The largest scale available as too small to weigh it.

Hardly a month of Heilner's short life as passed without some exciting experince. In little more than a quarter of a entury, he has earned an international eputation as traveler, editor, naturalist, unter, and adventurer.

Almost since the day he discarded ompers, Van Campen Heilner has hunted, shed, and tracked big game in nearly very corner of the world except the rient. For ten years he has been asociate editor of a magazine devoted outdoor life. He has written everal books and numerous magaine articles on strange creatures f the ocean and forest. For is general achievements, he as made a fellow of the oyal Geographical Society nd also of the Royal nthropological Society, oth in London. He is n the staff of the Ameri-an Museum of Natural istory, in New York ity, and was given narge of the game fish xhibit in the recently pened Hall of Ocean ife at that institution.

It was as a small boy nat Van Campen Heilner's areer on the seas and in ne woods began. His parnts had a home beside the cean. Their front yard was he beach of the Atlantic, and the ack of the place stretched into the olling farm land of New Jersey. It as in his own front yard that Heilner cquired his taste for fishing.

"One day, when I was seven years ld, Father said he would give me fifty ents for the first fish I caught for dinner," Van Campen Heilner told me. "This eemed like fabulous wealth to me at he time. So I went out and fished diligently in the surf until I landed a large lounder."

It was in his own back yard too, that oung Heilner became an expert with the harpoon and the bow and arrow, both of which weapons he has used in many of his dventures. As a youngster, he practiced harpooning by standing on a box and aiming the harpoon at the center of a hoop laid on the sod.

Long before he was out of his teens, however, he began to look for excitement in distant parts of the world. At nineteen, he spent a year at Culver City in motion-picture work. He made his appearance in several Western thrillers. A little later, in 1923, as master of the forty-seven-foot motor yacht, "Nepenthe II," he embarked on a cruise of four thousand miles from Atlantic City to Venezuela. It was one of the smallest boats that ever made this trip. At the time, there was no radio equipment for the voyage, which made the hazards much greater.

He had one of his most unusual experiences last year in northern Peru. He had gone to Ecuador with Robert Cushman Murphy, the ornithologist. They had been there only a short time when it started to rain. In that particular portion of Peru, a narrow strip seventy-five miles wide on the west coast, stretching from northern Peru to southern Chili, the land was an arid waste of rocks and sand. The natives were not accustomed to rain.

And when the downpour started, it did not cease for six weeks. Adobe houses, melting into mud, were washed into the sea. There was confusion, such as you can easily imagine as following upon a prolonged rainfall in a section where theretofore it had been practically unknown.

(Circle) Van Campen Heilner, young naturalist and explorer, has fished and hunted in nearly every corner of the globe, and has written several books and articles about his travels. (Upper right) Heilner with the bow and arrow he often uses as a big-game weapon

Naturally, the young explorer has had many narrow escapes from death. In Florida, not long ago, he was attacked by an alligator he had shot and wounded. The 'gator made a swift attempt at retaliation, but Heilner stabbed it in the eye with a knife. In Trinidad, on another occasion, Mr. Heilner was almost killed by a fish. During the middle of the day the fish were leaping all over the water. One of them, shooting out of the waves with the force of a forty-pound projectile, whizzed past just six inches above his head. Half a foot nearer, and the daring angler would have been smashed, and thrown into the sea.

Again, in Southern waters, a sawfish pulled him overboard. A sawfish is eighteen or twenty feet long. By accident, his line became looped about his ankles, and he was hauled over the side of the boat. Luckily, he was able to disentangle himself and climb back to safety.

"I have never known hardships," he told me. "They are only relative, anyway. Anyone not accustomed to expecting the unexpected might consider many of the explorer's adventures hardships. But to the experienced these are merely inconveniences.

"The greatest sport in the world? Catching bonefish. Because of its gameness, it's more sport for me to catch a six-pound bonefish than it is to land a two-hundred-pound swordfish."

Mr. Heilner has succeeded in making motion pictures of the roseate spoonbill in its natural haunts. During visits to his winter camp in the West Indies he has discovered several new species of fishes.

Mr. Heilner is in business with his father in Philadelphia. He is married and has two children. SUSIE SEXTON

One Pair of Baby Shoes Started a $20,000 Business

SIX years ago, a white-haired grandmother in a little central Indiana town knitted a tiny pair of silk bootees to present to her baby granddaughter, Joan. From this humble beginning, a very prosperous business has developed, a business which, this year, judging by receipts to date, will net a profit of twenty thousand dollars.

The little shoes were knitted by Mrs. Grace Dolen, of Bargersville, Indiana. They were so exquisitely done, and of such unusual design that friends of Joan's mother, pausing to admire the baby, also paused to admire her bootees. Among these friends was the proprietress of a small shop near by. Christmas was coming, and she thought the dainty shoes would look well in her show window, as a hint to Christmas shoppers. So she sought an introduction to Mrs. Dolen, who agreed to hurry through half a dozen pairs in time for the Christmas rush.

They went like hot cakes; but not before they had attracted favorable notice. The representative of a large Indianapolis department store happened to be in the neighborhood at the time, and she stopped in at the store to find out where the bootees could be obtained. She left an order for a dozen pairs to dispose of in her store. They proved to be just as popular in Indianapolis as they were in Bargersville. More orders followed. The buyers in other stores became interested.

Mrs. Dolen was living on a farm, caring for her aged father. Her spare time was completely occupied in knitting shoes to supply the ever-increasing sales of the stores. But in less than a year, the demand became so heavy that she could no longer supply it herself; even if she had spent every waking moment over her knitting needles.

But she had many friends on nearby farms who had nothing to occupy them on the long winter evenings, and who, she was sure, would welcome a little extra money for luxuries they had long done without. So she asked a few of them over one afternoon, and they discussed the matter over their tea.

They were delighted with the idea. The work was easy and pleasant; they could pick it up at odd moments during the day, and they could make pocket money. Mrs. Dolen taught them the pattern, supplied the materials, and started them off. They went their various ways that evening with the needles and spools of silk in their bags.

That was just the beginning. Now Mrs. Dolen employs two hundred and twenty-five women, most of whom live within a radius of twenty-five miles. They do the work at home, bringing the finished shoes to Mrs. Dolen, who inspects them and packs them for sending. She employs ten salesmen to market the product of this successful home industry.

Mrs. Grace Dolen, of Bargersville, Indiana, runs a $20,000-a-year business in baby bootees. Two hundred and twenty-five women, who live near by, do the knitting, and Mrs. Dolen inspects and packs the bootees herself. She lives on a farm, and most of the women who work for her are farmers' wives and daughters

The packing is all done in Mrs. Dolen's office, a small square room lined from ceiling to floor with shelves filled with tiny white boxes, and furnished very simply with a desk and chair. Mrs. Dolen and her assistant have packed more than twelve hundred pairs of shoes in a single week.

Since she knitted the first pair of bootees, Mrs. Dolen has designed nine more patterns. The bootees now come in ten different designs, with the common trade name of Joan, in honor of the granddaughter who was the inspiration for that first pair.

After she packs the boxes, Mrs. Dolen loads them into a truck, takes them to the nearest station, and ships them to the different firms. She sends the smaller packages by parcel post.

"At first," Mrs. Dolen told me, "I did everything myself. I was the business. But now I very seldom even have a chance to knit. It's no spare-time job any longer. Last year, for three months before Christmas, I worked sixteen hours a day, just inspecting and packing the shoes.

"And the business is growing and expanding all the time. I started with one kind of silk bootees. Now we have ten different designs in the silk shoes. And we are putting out some woolen ones for outdoor wear, as well as woolen mittens.

"I don't sell at retail any more, either," she continued. "I sell to wholesale and jobbing houses. When I was selling directly to the stores, I was lucky to get orders for several dozen pairs. Now we get orders for several hundred dozen, and we have such orders every few days. Just yesterday I had an order from a Chicago firm for a thousand dozen. That's the biggest order we've had yet."

Mrs. Dolen has had offers to bring her factory to the city; but she is used to country life and prefers it. She has raised her family on the Bargersville farm. For a while, when her sons had grown up and left the farm, she tried living in Indianapolis, to be near them; but she wasn't happy in the city, and she soon came back to her farm.

She calls her place of business her "factory," but anything more different from the usual smoke-begrimed factory could hardly be imagined. It is a big, rangy, white farmhouse, set back from the road among a grove of trees. Mrs. Dolen makes her home in one wing of the house; but she has set aside rooms for storing the shoes until they are shipped, and a room for an office.

Mrs. Dolen is a brisk, white-haired little woman. Before her business venture, she used to write a great deal—mostly poetry for children's magazines.

"I don't have much time for that now," she told me, with a smile. "Designing shoes is my chief occupation. And then I keep my own books, and that takes all my mornings.

"But it's nice to have something to do when you grow old and your children leave the farm. And I'm glad I chose a hobby that pays its own bills—and mine too."

Tempting vegetables! Hearty beef! No wonder this soup is a favorite!

Are you serving it regularly?

12 cents a can

SOUP

and the man behind the desk

YOU know that man (we'll call him Brown) who never seems to get tired out. "There's at least one in every office," as Briggs would say. How you envy him! He seems to come up fresh and smiling at any time of the day or night. That zero hour from four to five in the afternoon, has no terrors for him. "Give me Brown's vitality and my brains, and I'd lick the world," you have often thought, no doubt.

Well, why not get Brown's vitality? Why not take yourself in hand—it's not so hard, you know—and follow a few simple rules every day that will sharpen up your fighting edge?

TAKE your appetite, for example. Is it always on the job? Do you give it the right chance to keep active and normal? Do you eat the right food? Tomorrow at noontime, instead of eating a heavy meal that makes you drowsy and listless throughout the afternoon, eat a plateful of hot, substantial, invigorating soup as the main part of your lunch. Soup stimulates and spurs the appetite. Its delicious flavor tempts you, even on those days when you don't feel like eating other food. In the middle of the office worker's day, soup revives the energies and supplies nourishment in just the right quantity and form. It sends him back to his work refreshed and feeling fit.

ASK your wife to serve soup every day. It will have a splendid effect on your appetite and digestion. You will eat more and feel better. You know how much that helps. Just think of Brown!

And to the woman behind the man behind the desk, we have this special message: Remember that your husband leads a sedentary life. He must be tempted and coaxed with the right selection of healthful foods, or he is in risk of being under-nourished. Good nourishing soup, so easy for you to get at the store! Serve it to him regularly. That's real teamwork from a wife.

What is Going to Happen to America

to seventy degrees) than when it is colder or warmer. He also states that man does his best brain work when the outdoor temperature is about forty degrees. Study the temperature charts of Seattle and Portland, and you will be struck by the fact that in winter the temperature there is right for the maximum of mental activity; in summer it is right for the maximum of physical activity!

"Another of Doctor Huntington's conclusions is that man needs a moist climate to perform at his best—and the climate here is moist. Also, it is changeable. And changes in temperature wake men up, energize them, and make them want to do things!

"NOW here's an illustration that points up this observation," continued Doctor Smith. "You will recall the period during the Great War when the whole nation was striving to build ships with all possible speed.

"At Philadelphia, the sun, shining upon the men and also upon the metal ships on which they worked, produced so much heat that, at times, the men had to rest. There were many accounts of heat stroke and sunstroke in the Eastern yards. But heat didn't interrupt work in the shipyards of the Pacific Northwest. The Puget Sound yards won more pennants than those of any other section—in general shipbuilding, in riveting, in welding, in framing wooden ships, in bolting. This we must regard as of vast importance; for to build a community, a city, a civilization, requires brains and brawn, imagination and pushing power, and depends not only upon numbers of people but upon people with brains and energy, and a disposition to exercise them.

"Basing my assertion on past history and economic and industrial conditions of to-day, it is in the Northwest where I expect American civilization, in many ways, to reach its maximum. Yes! I expect that it will outstrip New York, overcoming the advantage which the metropolis has had of an early start! In this Northwest of which I speak, I anticipate that, man for man, Americans will eventually realize their greatest achievement, almost certainly their greatest physical achievement, perhaps also their highest mental achievement—in science, literature, and the arts!

"To be sure, there are numerous reasons apart from the climate that lead one to predict an unrivaled future for this part of the country. It is a splendid land for agriculture. It is accessible for trade. The Panama Canal offers transportation facilities. As to mechanical energy, the Cascades and the Coast Range, along with the Rockies, give the cities between Portland and Vancouver access to many millions of horse-power of hydro-electric energy. Nowhere in Europe nor in the eastern United States is there any location for water-power resource that rivals it."

"And what about the South, the Cotton Belt? What does the future hold for it?" I asked.

"I think I can best answer that question," said Doctor Smith, with a smile, "by relating an amusing but extremely important incident that came to my knowledge.

"A few years ago, when I was studying certain agricultural conditions in the South, I heard that the town of Enterprise, Alabama, had erected a monument to perpetuate the blessed memory of the Mexican boll weevil, which has long been regarded as the curse of the cotton growers. In response to a letter of mine to the mayor of Enterprise inquiring whether this report was true, I received the following communication:

"Yes, sir, always pleased to speak the truth, and nothing but the truth. There was erected here on the crossing of Carmichael and Market streets, December 11th, 1919, a bronze fountain which has the following inscription inscribed on the base:

In Profound Appreciation of the Boll Weevil
And What It Has Done as the Herald of Prosperity
This Monument is Erected
By the Citizens of Enterprise, Coffee County

"Further, the mayor's letter said:

"This section is a rolling mass of prosperity. The approach of the boll weevil in 1915 wiped the whole country off its feet, and jarred us from center to circumference, as cotton was the principal crop. Now we are raising peanuts principally, and we take great pride in saying that Coffee County holds the world's record in its production of peanuts. In 1918 the county raised and marketed four and a half million dollars' worth of peanuts. We have shipped hogs and cattle in train-load lots.

"If I am not mistaken, the historian of the future will have reason to think of this inscription, testifying to the virtues of the boll weevil, as the epitaph of the old South and the herald of the new. It points the way to the saving of the South through diversified agriculture.

"THE young man of the South should realize, I think, that his part of the country is also a land of opportunity. More than any other section of the United States, the South has the greatest opportunity for an easy expansion of agricultural products. In the past, the Southern farmer has raised a little cotton and a little corn. But the cotton belt can easily raise two crops a year—clover or oats in winter, corn in the early summer, together with some legume such as peanuts, cowpeas, soy beans, or velvet beans.

"As I see it, the next step forward, and a not very difficult one, is for the South to become a dairy and meat-producing region. I anticipate that we shall find this country raising as much cotton as is needed, and cattle on the side. These cattle can live on the legume crops, and the South may thus escape ruin from the boll weevil on the one hand and overproduction of cotton on the other."

"And New England?" I prompted, "the old New England that you have up to the present touched on only casually."

"All right," Doctor Smith agreed, "let's talk about New England. To me, the future of upper New England—that part having an elevation of more than a thousand feet—seems very plain. Geographically, it belongs in the same territory as the Adirondacks in New York State. It is already settling down into its permanent future as a land of summer homes, summer camps—a forested land—a kind of playground, providing wood game, sports, and beauty.

"With regard to lower New England, that section where the whirling spindle and the clanking loom overshadow all other industries, I sometimes tell my students that it is the one section of the country about which I venture no prediction. This section includes Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, the southeast corner of New Hampshire, and the coastal section of Maine. Can it hang on industrially, or will it dwindle into an area of sparse farms, not unlike Colorado?

"Already there is consternation in New England to-day because of the southern movement of the textile mills. There also is great interest in super-power plans which involve harnessing the St. Lawrence. The belief has been expressed that cheaper power might yet save the mills to New England.

"In lower New England we have a section producing about one fifth of the cotton and half of the wool manufactures of the United States, handicapped by high costs of production and by the necessity of importing food, fuel, and raw materials from other parts of the nation. What will it lead to?

"If I were the son of a New England manufacturer, concerned about the future of my part of the country, there is one thing I would do: I would go South for six months or a year to work in a rival plant. This should give a background for studying production costs and tendencies in the industry. What is the difference between the character and quality of the labor employed in New England and in the South? In the South labor is cheaper; but it remains to be determined whether human energy and ingenuity cannot overcome this, as it can many other theoretic disadvantages.

"There may be a class of industries that New England can keep. It may go on with the production of jewelry, scales, brassware, clocks, and develop other industries requiring highly skilled labor.

"IN THE past, whole sections of our country have developed by chance, as it were, with no systematic plan. As resources become scarcer, as labor costs and freight rates increase, we see the necessity of planning the activities of a whole section, as an individual would plan a business enterprise. The economist calls this regional planning.

"Planning of this kind is now being done by Cincinnati, with a fund furnished by the Commercial Club of that city, under the auspices of the University of Cincinnati. Expert geographers, geologists, chemists, metallurgists, and engineers are studying the resources of Cincinnati,

We Studied Years

To correct the mistakes of old-type shaving preparations for you—now please accept a 10-day tube of Palmolive Shaving Cream to try

GENTLEMEN:

Palmolive Shaving Cream is a truly unique creation.

We made it up to meet the supreme desires of 1000 men whose ideals of a shaving cream we asked.

One hundred thirty formulas were developed and discarded before we found the right one. All our 60 years of soap study, we put into this preparation.

Then we told men, "Don't Buy, Yet—accept a 10-day tube to try and find out first if you like it."

The result was a business sensation. Palmolive Shaving Cream rose, almost instantly, to a leading position in its highly competitive field.

Millions of men have flocked to it. We think you will find it superlative in a shaving cream. Hence, seek the opportunity of sending you a 10-day tube to try.

These 5 advantages

1. Multiplies itself in lather 250 times.
2. Softens the beard in one minute.
3. Maintains its creamy fullness for 10 minutes on the face.
4. Strong bubbles hold the hairs erect for cutting.
5. Fine after-effects due to palm and olive oil content.

and the territory tributary to it, in an effort to bring about a proper commercial adjustment of the city to its natural environment. If the economic forces now at work were correctly understood, similar surveys would be undertaken in many other parts of the country, including New England.

"Some of the questions that New England needs to ask herself are identical with those that many other sections need to have answered. What can New England produce at home which she is now buying elsewhere? What agricultural products can she produce to lessen her outside outlay for food, and so reduce the cost of living? If the answers to these two questions could be satisfactorily met New England's most serious handicaps would be greatly reduced. What can she expect to produce, with high-class brains planning for New England as a whole, in competition with the rest of the country?"

"A moment ago you spoke of the fact that many small cities may be expected to double in size. What about the growth of our big cities of the present day?" I interjected.

"OUR big inland cities, such as St. Louis, Atlanta, Denver, Indianapolis, Kansas City, and Minneapolis, have been built up largely as the result of special railroad advantages," said Doctor Smith. "In some instances, their growth has been the product of basing-point freight rates. There is no compelling natural reason why large cities should have developed at these particular points. Once established, however, they tend to run on their own momentum. In the course of time—the not-far-distant future—we can expect that their population will become static, or at least increase more slowly than heretofore.

"Now, we have another class of cities located at points where natural conditions call for big cities. These have grown up because a large area is dependent upon them in one way or another: New York, Chicago, New Orleans, Seattle, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, Duluth, and Norfolk. The population of these cities, too, will probably become static; but they will keep on growing longer than those others of which I have just spoken.

"The population of the Greater New York area, including the various suburban districts, is now about eight millions. The prediction has been made that it will increase to seventeen millions by 1950. There is no economic necessity calling for this growth. In fact, there are a number of economic reasons why New York ought not to be allowed to grow bigger. Under existing conditions, however, in view of the momentum the city has already accumulated, it would not be surprising if the prediction referred to were realized."

"So far, you have been telling us about changes to be expected in the rather near future. Can anything be foreseen as to the more distant future? What about the exhaustion of our natural resources?" I asked. "What will life in the United States be like a hundred years from now?"

"Of the countries of the earth, the United States alone has all the important minerals save tin and potash," replied Doctor Smith. "Half the known coal of the world, the lion's share of the copper, great quantities of iron are in our possession. We have burned more forests, destroyed more land, dug more coal, made more inventions, and built more machines than any other people ever did in a similar period of time. Happily, in these complex days when civilization is based upon mechanical energy derived from coal, and water harnessed with iron, steel, copper, and cement, we are still well supplied with all these things. We have coal enough to last for several centuries; but our oil will soon be gone, and we have already begun to import it. With all our wealth of forests, we are even now experiencing a shortage of lumber, and in twenty-five years it will be acute. Our last great forest reserve, the wooded mountains of the Pacific Coast, with their fir, spruce, and pine, is sixty-five per cent exhausted.

"On the other hand, reports of the Geological Survey indicate that we are on the verge of discovering great potash deposits in the Southwest. Careful prospecting in that region, which has never been explored thoroughly, will assuredly disclose further mineral wealth. Moreover, inventions and discoveries will undoubtedly meet many of the nation's needs as they develop. The next fifty years will probably be a great epoch of inventions—greater than the past fifty years, because of the large number of trained men, and the many laboratories, both private and corporate, in which these men can experiment and to which specific problems can be brought.

"But there's another possible side to the picture: This invention business may peter out. We may become too practical, too short-sighted to continue to be inventive. Mechanical invention works out the secondary results of a fundamental discovery in pure science. Thus far, our American civilization has shown itself to be quick, keen, and plentifully supplied with money when it comes to making investigations that promise swift and sure returns, but neither Government, nor corporation, nor individual, nor university has expressed any considerable willingness to spend much money on research for the fundamental laws of science.

"HAZARDING a guess at what the great future inventions may be is in the pipe-dream class, but I think the possibilities are that they will be connected with power generation and transmission, industrial chemistry and plant breeding. Plant breeding is in its earliest infancy. Industrial chemistry and power development are probably in their youth.

"Adequate scientific research, followed up by the proper technical applications by inventors, may enable our country to feed three hundred or four hundred millions in comfort, if we keep up our supply of brains. The shortage in the supply of brains is probably the place where the whole thing will break down. Our whole future civilization will require more and better brains to run its complexities.

"You asked me what life in America will be like a hundred years from now? Suppose we go back and find out what the man of a hundred years ago thought life would be like in our age? I think we shall find that the man of a hundred years ago had his mind set on the building of canals and turnpikes. The Erie Canal was just finished. The whole country was filled with the idea of a continental highway that would run from Baltimore into the West.

"Such things as the telephone, telegraph, wireless, radio—all things electric—were utterly unheard of and almost unthought of. Canned food had been invented in 1786 in France, but it was not used until the Civil War created the necessity. Ready-made clothes, factory shoes, furnaces for heating houses, steam heat, elevators, street railways, belonged to the realm of the unthinkable.

"In those days, when people thought of a changed world they dreamed of plentiful waterways, stone roads, and steam mills. A few venturesome and visionary souls were talking of the coming of the 'steam wagon.' And this dream, which then seemed to exceed the bounds of reasonable expectations, has turned out to be only mildly prophetic, for we not only have the highways and steam engines, but also gas engines and electricity.

"To-day, somewhat as the visionary of a hundred years ago thought of the 'steam wagon,' we think of aviation—as though everything might be accomplished by it. Just what aviation will do, and what surprising developments will come along with it, who can say? If the aviation dream is as overwhelmingly realized as has been the steam-wagon dream of a century ago, surely the man of 1927 would be as lost in the surroundings of 2027 as the man of a hundred years ago would be in the surroundings of our own time.

"I BELIEVE I have answered all your questions, and I am now going to answer one which I hoped you would ask, but didn't. What opportunities exist for the man who has made a great fortune, and has a million or so to invest for the welfare of humanity? What is the biggest opportunity confronting him?

"Not long ago I stood on the Great Wall of China up near the borders of Mongolia. The wall itself was a ruin. Far below me, in the valley, standing up square and high, was a wall that once had surrounded a city teeming with people and industry. But only a few mud houses huddled in one corner remained to remind one of its past glory.

"The slope was cut with gullies fifty feet deep. As far as the eye could see were gullies, gullies, gullies—a gashed and gutted countryside. The course of the little stream that ran past the ruined town was now a waste of coarse sand and gravel which the hillside gullies were bringing down faster than it could carry away. Hence, the whole valley had become a desert of sand, alternately wet and dry, always fruitless.

"Beside me was a tree, one lone tree. That tree was famous, because it was the only tree anywhere in that locality, yet its presence proved that there had once been a forest over most of that woodless and harvestless waste.

"'Would we Americans wreck our country as the Chinese have wrecked this corner of Asia?' I asked myself. And I thought of our Eastern hill country that has been gutted and ruined in much the same way. For several generations we have been cutting and burning our forests, gullying the precious soil of our hills faster than the Chinese or any other people ever did.

One aim . . C . . . One claim to CLEAN

To clean teeth and clean them perfectly — that is what Colgate's is made to do

THE Colgate idea of a dentifrice is the same idea that dentists have—something made simply and solely to clean teeth. Because Colgate's is made only to clean, it does that one thing superlatively well.

Why Colgate's cleans better

Since the real function of a dentifrice is to clean, everything in the Colgate formula works on this principle. The moment it is brushed on your teeth, two things happen:

1. It expands into a delicious, bubbling, sparkling foam. In this remarkable foam is calcium carbonate —a finely ground powder that delicately, safely scrubs off all bits of food and harmful foreign matter, polishing each tooth to dazzling cleanness.

2. Then, in a detergent-washing wave, this foam sweeps through the entire mouth, washing away all impurities and leaving teeth, tongue, gums, cleansed and fresh. Thus, the very causes of tooth decay are removed.

Your dentist will tell you to use a dentifrice for one reason—to keep your teeth clean. If you fear disease of teeth or gums, go to a dentist for treatment rather than trust a "patent medicine" dentifrice. Rely on a dentist to cure. Rely on Colgate's to clean and keep your teeth healthy.

"Of all our resources the most vital is land—soil—the stuff from which the future must eat. The loss of land by needless and useless soil erosion is one of the greatest material injuries that man is doing to his own future. He plows a hillside, grows crops of corn, cotton or tobacco, and after a very few crops the field is ruined. In this way we have already ruined the possible home sites of millions of men.

"We do this because we grow crops for which the land must be plowed, instead of crops that can live and thrive without plowing—tree crops. By an accident of history, agriculture started with annual plants: grasses, wheat, rice, corn, and so on, instead of with trees—date, olive, walnut, acorn. People have for ages eaten wild acorns and walnuts, as well as the seeds of wild grasses. We need a whole series of new crop trees making food for men and food for live stock, and at the same time holding soil on the hills with their roots.

"America is rich in native trees of great promise waiting to be improved: walnuts, pecans, hickory nuts, pine nuts, hazelnuts, butternuts, beechnuts. More important than these are the trees that may feed animals.

"The acorn-yielding oak may be made to rival corn as pig feed and cow feed. The honey-locust bean may rival wheat, bran, and cottonseed meal as food for the dairy cow. The persimmon is one of the most nutritious fruits grown in the United States, and it drops its fruit for weeks and months, ready for the pigs and turkeys to eat.

"A million dollars invested during the next twenty years in creative research and experiments would disclose the technique for a tree-crop agriculture. The creations and discoveries that would be made would be worth many millions the succeeding twenty years, and billions after that. There is an opportunity for some person to create a world-famous institution and render inestimable service to the American people and to the world at large!"

take out into the country and stretch through the bushes. Then they sit down near by, take the blinded song-bird out of a bag, or a pocket, and wait.

"The bird calls; and this attracts other small birds to the spot. Some of them become entangled in the net. The man winds it up and takes the captives home with him—to be eaten. Occasionally the thing is done in this country by ignorant immigrants.

"We found later that the game wardens were watching for two of these culprits, who were on a train that stopped at New Haven. The foreigners became alarmed, and threw the 'evidence'—their nets and the blind bird used as a decoy—out of the window, where the Springfield man found the bird.

Features That Make Chrysler "60" Inimitable

6-cylinder motor.
7-bearing crankshaft.
60 miles and more an hour.
5 to 25 miles in 7¾ seconds.
22 miles to the gallon.
Aluminum alloy pistons, with invar steel struts.
Impulse neutralizer.
Oil-filter and air-cleaner.
Chrysler beauty.
Luxurious mohair upholstery.
Hydraulic 4-wheel brakes.
Levelizers, front and rear.

Mr. Chrysler and his engineers, in designing and developing the six-cylinder Chrysler "60", set their hearts on a car which would in large measure advertise and sell itself.

They strove for a type and quality of road-ease and road-readiness and supreme comfort which would do its own talking — so that any man, woman or child could swiftly see that the "60" was a car among cars, unprecedented at its price and in its class.

They wanted the Chrysler "60" to settle all arguments by demonstration and by difference—and the extent to which it is dominating its own six field is an ambition splendidly fulfilled.

With such outstanding excellence in every phase of performance plus typically Chrysler smart appearance and complete equipment, it is surely not surprising that Chrysler "60" should be recognized as a value utterly unapproached by any other six of medium price.

Chrysler "60" prices — Touring Car, $1075; Club Coupe, $1125; Coach, $1145; Roadster, (with Rumble Seat), $1175; Coupe, (with Rumble Seat), $1245; Sedan, $1245. F. O. B. Detroit, subject to current Federal excise tax.

The End of a perfect shave

REAL shaving comfort means more than a pleasant shave. It means all-day face comfort after the shave is over. For years we studied how to keep the face feeling as fit as a Williams shave leaves it. That's how we developed Aqua Velva—a scientific, sparkling-clear liquid—made expressly for use after shaving.

Here's what Aqua Velva does

1. It gives the face a stimulating tingle.
2. It helps to heal little nicks and cuts.
3. It aids the skin in its daily fight against sun and wind, dust and germs.
4. It keeps the face feeling "well groomed" all day long. (And remember, Aqua Velva leaves no trace.)

Aqua Velva sells for 50c in the U. S. A., in big 5-ounce bottles—bottles especially designed to fit your bathroom shelf. Your druggist carries Aqua Velva.

If you'd rather "try before you buy," clip the convenient coupon below—or send a postcard—for a generous trial bottle FREE.

FOR USE AFTER SHAVING

MADE BY THE MAKERS OF WILLIAMS SHAVING CREAM

"After Blind Baby died, the taxidermist who mounted the skin for us discovered that the poor little creature was in a sad condition, as a result of the cruel operation those men had performed on her eyes.

"She used to sing; and one involuntarily associates singing with happiness. But I've thought of Blind Baby so many times, and wondered if she sang only because she had no other way of expressing feeling—whether the feeling was happiness, or pain and unhappiness.

"She could fly; but because of her blindness she seldom tried to. But sometimes she would suddenly start, flying in spirals, straight upward. We were afraid she might strike the ceiling. So whenever Blind Baby attempted this, the nearest child would get up quietly, take her in his hands, stroke her for a moment, then put her down in a safe place, and go back to his desk.

"THE children help us in various ways to care for the birds. Did you notice the bird houses around the building here? The boys made them and put them up. The children help us to feed the birds; and feeding fifty or sixty birds, which is the average number we have at our cottage nowadays, is quite a problem.

"One boy brought us a whole bushel of corn. He was living with relatives and was very unhappy at home. I think all his stifled affection was lavished on our birds. His people did not give him the corn he brought us. Probably they would have refused to give it to him. But he raised it himself, so that he could do as he pleased with it.

"Most of the grown people, however, are interested and very glad to help. Birds are brought to us, and sent to us, from miles away. We have had three owls. The children called the first one 'Spooky,' because an owl makes almost no sound when it flies; and the name has been handed on to each of our three owls.

"Spooky the First died after a few months. Spooky the Second, a screech owl, grew up and finally went to live in the outside world. But he seemed to think our house was home, for he never went far away.

"In winter he would come and tap on the window panes, asking for the food he knew he would receive. Whenever we came home at night in the car, Spooky would fly out to welcome us, and would light on its top.

"One night he was killed by an automobile, which he evidently mistook for our car. The men driving it reported that they had struck a bird; and as Spooky's body was found just beyond our place, it was clear that he had tried to alight on their car, believing it to be ours. We always slow down, before turning in at our entrance; but this car was traveling at high speed.

"We have a young screech owl now, Spooky the Third. It was brought to us, not because of any injury but because it was only a baby, whose mother had been shot. It is as playful as a kitten. We give it the freedom of one of the bird rooms, except that we never let it get near the little birds. It might hurt them. Spooky will soon be old enough to live outside, and I shall miss him terribly.

"We have learned a good deal about

Who has authority to lose money in your business

NO ONE! But investigate and you may find that someone has been losing money for you, month after month and year after year. Perhaps that someone, unintentionally, is yourself.

You adopt, as a matter of course, modern factory methods and modern factory equipment which will enable you to cut down your selling price. You would not tolerate for an instant the use of wasteful and old-fashioned methods of production.

But is this true of your office? Or are you still using accounting methods, which, on account of limited facilities, were accepted in the past, but which are now as out-of-date as factory methods twenty years old?

If so, you are losing money every day, either because someone in your organization is not familiar with recent developments in accounting, or because you as a higher executive have not found time to give this vital problem your personal consideration.

For one of two things must be true if you are not using modern mechanical figuring equipment. Either you are not getting the vital figure-facts you ought to have at the time you ought to get them; or you are paying too much for the figure-facts you get.

Don't wait for someone to come to you. Investigate! Call in the local Burroughs man today. Welcome his helpful and willing counsel. Let him show you on your own work what Burroughs can do for you and save for you.

For whatever your business may be, large or small, retail or wholesale, manufacturing or professional, no one has authority to lose money by faulty, costly and out-of-date accounting methods, when Burroughs up-to-date equipment will cut down cost and add to profits.

These tiny bubbles soften toughest beards

They get deep down to the base of every whisker — soften each hair scientifically right where the cutting is done.

COLGATE'S Rapid-Shave Cream lather is based on this scientific principle—that water is the real beard softener. Colgate chemists created this "small-bubble" lather that fairly swims with moisture. Look at the lather-pictures below. See the amazing smallness of the Colgate bubbles—how they saturate the beard-base.

How "small-bubble" lather works

The moment Colgate lather forms on your beard, two things happen:

1. The soap in the lather breaks up and removes the oil film covering each hair.

2. With the oil film gone, millions of tiny, water-saturated bubbles bring and hold an abundance of water down to the base of the beard, right where the razor does its work.

ORDINARY LATHER

This lather-picture (greatly magnified) of ordinary shaving cream shows how large, air-filled bubbles fail to get down to the base of the beard; and how they hold air, instead of water, against whiskers.

COLGATE LATHER

This picture of Colgate lather shows how myriads of tiny, moisture-laden bubbles hold water, not air, in direct contact with the base of the beard, thus softening every whisker right where the razor works.

Because your beard is properly softened at its base, your razor works easily and quickly. Every hair is cut close and clean, and your face remains cool and comfortable throughout the day.

A week's better shaves—Free

Once you try this unique "small-bubble" lather, we believe you will never go back to ordinary shaving methods. Prove this at our expense. Just clip and send the coupon. We'll send you a generous trial tube.

SOFTENS THE BEARD AT THE BASE

feeding birds. Some have to have predigested food. In addition to worms and insects, I get the best of baby foods; I mean those made for human babies. I mix them with water, and feed the hungry little mouths with a spoon.

"A great many people don't know that a baby bird is unable to feed itself. One woman told me that she had picked up a robin which had fallen from its nest. She had set it on the doorstep, placing food beside it.

"'And the lazy little thing,' she said to me, 'wouldn't even touch the food I put there!'

"I explained to her that a bird's vision is imperfect at first, just as it is in any other creature. You wouldn't put a nursing bottle beside a human baby, and expect him to see it and put it into his mouth. If you put a baby kitten down beside a saucer of milk, he doesn't see it.

"It is just the same with young birds. You must actually put the food into their mouths. Often you must open their mouths, yourself, in order to get it in. When their eyes, and their other organs of sense, have developed, they will feed themselves. But until that time they would starve, even with plenty of food within reach.

"Birds are like people in many ways. They have different tastes in food, just as we have.

"You saw Jimmy Crow over at the cottage. Jimmy is very fond of oranges. In fact, he seems to like anything that I have for breakfast. When I am eating, he always comes hopping to the table, begging for his share of my meal.

"Jimmy used to belong to a man who drove a motor truck in Springfield. He would go out with the truck, perched on the front of the car. When the driver went into a building to collect or deliver goods, Jimmy seemed to feel that he was in charge of the truck, and would caw belligerently if anybody came near it. He was injured in an accident finally, and his owner brought him to us. Jimmy is permanently lame, but he seems quite comfortable and happy trotting around from room to room."

BEFORE we went over to the schoolhouse as a precaution against interruption, I had been introduced to the birds that were sharing with Miss Coburn and Miss Ingraham the little cottage which they built the year after the fire.

It is a small house; yet two rooms are given up to the birds. There were fifty of them "in residence" at that time. Some of them were tame birds; a few canaries, for instance, which had become ill and had been brought to the hospital by their owners.

These pet birds were in their own individual cages; but the rest were either in groups in very large cages, or were in a room where they had almost the entire space to themselves, or were quite free to move about the other room where the cages were. Outside the second room was a large screened "apartment," which the birds in that room could enter through an open window.

In a corner of one room was the birds' refrigerator. Miss Coburn opened it and showed me the stock of food on hand. This included chopped meat, several pounds of which are bought daily. Feed-

Your need of the Mobiloil margin of safety has never been so great as it is today.

Automobile engineers know that. Mobiloil is by long odds their favorite oil.

Automobile manufacturers are awake to the need. That is why Mobiloil is recommended by more of them than any three other oils combined.

* *

Any lubricating oil which has simply maintained its standards during the past few years is not good enough today.

Not if you are at all particular.

Make sure of your lubricating margin of safety. You can get it with Mobiloil.

The Mobiloil dealer has the Mobiloil Chart. From it you can quickly determine which oil to use—with scientific exactness.

That oil is designed and produced with 1927 driving conditions in mind. That is why it gives you the greatest obtainable economy and operating efficiency.

Feet that cry for COMFORT

SOMEWHERE at some hour, the nerves of your feet seem to utter a little cry. As time goes on, the cry comes oftener and grows louder. It's a warning that fallen arches, backache, nerve strain, headache may develop. It's a cry for comfort; the comfort of Cantilever Shoes.

To stand at ease, to step out gracefully, to be fresh and ready for joyous activity; to feel your best at all times, your feet need properly shaped shoes as much as your eyes crave good-looking shoes.

Your feet desire shoe arches that are flexible like your own arches. The flexible arch of the Cantilever Shoe improves circulation and permits strengthening exercise of foot muscles. Cantilevers have no metal shank piece concealed in the arch as do ordinary shoes. Cantilevers fit up snugly to the arch of your foot and afford each foot the precise degree of support it needs. For weak arches that need correction, wear Cantilevers and see how quickly you improve.

Cantilever Shoes make it easier to shop, stand and walk without tiring so soon. Life seems brighter and happier, for your feet are comfortably cared for. It isn't as though you had to make a sacrifice for your comfort. Cantilever Shoes are not only beautifully comfortable, but they are good-looking. Prices are reasonable.

Ask for a demonstration at your local Cantilever store. There you will see a variety of smart oxfords and pumps, beautifully designed in the modish colors of the season. If the Cantilever store in your locality is not listed in the telephone book under "Cantilever" write the Cantilever Corporation, 402 Willoughby Ave., Brooklyn, New York, for the address and an interesting new booklet on footwear.

COMFORT~THROUGH~FLEXIBILITY

ing fifty or sixty birds is not only a good deal of trouble, but also rather expensive. It takes a lot of time and foraging—and costs about a dollar a day for the supplies that are purchased.

Knowing that country school-teachers are not paid extravagant salaries, I asked Miss Coburn if this wasn't a severe tax on her personal exchequer.

"Well—perhaps," she admitted. "But occasionally some kind friend helps with the expense. One lady, whom we did not know at the time, happened to pick up an old copy of a Springfield paper when she was on the steamer returning from Europe. She read in it an account of our bird hospital and sent us ten dollars to help carry it on. She sent us another check later; and others, who are interested, have been equally thoughtful. Of course we ourselves take care of most of the expense."

"BUT that isn't all," I said. "How can you ever leave home and take a vacation?"

"I can't," she replied quietly.

"You mean that you stay here all the time? That you never go away for even a few days?"

"How can I?" she asked. "What would become of my birds?"

"No," interrupted Miss Ingraham, "she never has a vacation. I do all I can to help her take care of them while I am here, for I love them too. But when school closes in June, I go to visit my family; or I take a trip somewhere, for change and recreation. But Miss Coburn never goes away."

"Well," said her friend, "if a thing is worth doing at all, it is worth some sacrifice. A few years ago, a friend who owned a place at the seashore invited me to visit her there during vacation. That was before the fire, and we had only about a dozen birds then. But I couldn't leave my patients, and my babies, no matter if there were only a few of them.

"When I explained this to my friend she told me to bring the birds too! She had a room in the attic which they could use. So I put them in cages and started off, looking like a traveling aviary.

"At that time, we had a black-crowned night heron which had lost one foot and been otherwise injured by being caught in a steel trap. The children had named him Bunty. He was Bunty the First. We have one now who is Bunty the Third.

"This one is a friendly, good-humored creature; but Bunty the First was much older when he came to us, and he was rather inclined to be cross. He and Miss Ingraham, however, got on especially well together. She would say to him, 'Comb my hair, Bunty!' And he would run his long bill through her hair, first on one side, then on the other.

"Near the cottage where my birds and I were visiting, was the Casino; and every night the orchestra played there for the dancing. As soon as the music started, Bunty would leave the box where he spent the night and stump across the floor to a window which looked out toward this Casino. He would stand there, as close to the window as he could get, listening to the music.

"There was one piece which was his favorite. The minute they started to play that piece, Bunty would begin to utter a peculiar note, a sort of quack, quack. I

WHEN Uncle Sam mustered his greatest Army and Navy to fight overseas, he had a million and one things to plan and arrange for. You remember the ships that were built and the equipment provided—camps at home and supplies abroad.

One of the wisest and kindliest provisions was to supply everyone in Service with life insurance at less than its cost to the Government—a lower rate than could be offered by any life insurance company in America. The Government had no taxes to pay and made no charge for overhead expenses.

More than $39,000,000,000 of insurance was taken by 4,500,000 Service men and women. Many of these wisely took $10,000 policies—the largest written by the Government. Others neglected their opportunities and either took out smaller policies or no insurance at all.

The policies were originally issued on the yearly renewable term plan. After the war, holders were invited to convert them into policies on a level premium, legal reserve basis such as is employed by large life insurance companies.

But, unfortunately, many policies were allowed to lapse. And now the officials at Washington, gratefully remembering the way the Government was supported in time of need, offer veterans a final chance to restore protection to their families with life insurance at rates below actual cost. All Service men and women who lapsed their term policies may have their insurance reinstated by the payment of one month's back premium when accompanied by a certificate of good health which any physician may give. Or they may now take out smaller policies at the same special rates. But—the necessary formalities must be carried through before July 2, 1927.*

There are perhaps 3,500,000 of you men and women specially privileged to get insurance at the old bargain rates offered in wartime. Will you, who have earned this right, neglect the golden opportunity?

*For information and necessary blanks send to any local headquarters of the United States Veterans' Bureau, or of The American Legion, or of the Red Cross, or to the national headquarters of any one of these organizations at Washington, D.C.

One of the most common misconceptions in the public mind regarding life insurance is that lapsed policies are a source of profit to insurance companies and therefore are desired by them. As a matter of fact, lapsed policies mean loss to both policy-holders and companies. Worst of all they often spell domestic tragedy.

Because of temporary financial pressure, men sometimes stop paying premiums hoping that a little later they may take out new policies—even though they realize that at an older age they will have to pay higher rates, if, by good fortune, they are able to pass again the necessary physical examinations.

Life insurance policies are not merely sound investments; in the majority of cases they provide the surest form of protection for American families. Once a man or woman has taken a life insurance policy, every possible precaution should be used to keep it in force at its full value.

The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company spends a great deal of time and effort each year urging policyholders whose misfortune may have caused them to lapse their contracts to apply for reinstatement. Also, we are glad to co-operate with Washington in urging Service men and women to get their Government insurance reinstated before it is too late.

The 3,500,000 eligibles for this bargain insurance are in a fortunate position. We hope they will take advantage of their extraordinary opportunity.

HALEY FISKE, President.

Mennen Shaving Cream does not stop at softening your beard. It soothes, tones up and protects your skin.

When you first feel the smooth, easy glide of a razor through a Mennen dermutized beard — the quickest, closest, most luxurious shave in your experience—you, too, will say: "Mennen is different!"

But keep on using Mennen and you'll soon see another striking difference. Complexion clearer and healthier. Skin toned up and more vigorously alive. Your face feels better and looks better.

The Mennen process—dermutation—so completely softens the beard and flattens the "mounds" around each hair that there's no scraping and nicking of the skin as in ordinary shaving.

Mennen dermutation does even more; it soothes and heals any irritated tissue. Five wonderful emollients in the cream feed, stimulate and protect the skin.

Buy a tube of Mennen on your way home tonight. Try it for a week. If you're not enthusiastic over results, send us the tube and we'll refund the purchase price. Mennen is different!

Now—for after shaving—try Mennen Skin Balm. Is antiseptic—mildly astringent—with a clean, masculine odor. Finish with Mennen Talcum for Men. It's a man's talcum—tinted so it doesn't show. 50c a tube for Skin Balm—25c for talcum.

SHAVING CREAM

suppose it was the nearest he could come to singing. He was like a person who is so fond of one particular melody that he wants to hum it whenever he hears it played.

"After our first robin, Ittie, was old enough to live outside, he still had such faith in human friendliness that he would go around to the various neighbors, begging for 'eats.'

"The birds nest all around the schoolhouse here, in spite of the fact that fifty children are shouting and playing close to them and that motor cars are constantly dashing along these two roads. One day, when we counted them out of curiosity, nine hundred and fifty cars passed the schoolhouse in a single hour on only one of these roads. There are usually about twenty occupied nests in this little triangle. People who know the subject thoroughly tell me that this is the most remarkable nesting record in all their experience. They like human companionship—when they feel that it is safe! And they are such beautiful and interesting friends that, in making them at home with us, we receive far more than we give."

IN THE fourteen years since that first baby robin found a home in the Sixteen Acres school, the two teachers and their pupils have befriended more than fifteen hundred birds. Each year the number of their feathered protégés increases. This year they have cared for more than three hundred birds. The day of my visit there were more than fifty birds, of fourteen different species, including robins, rose-breasted grosbeaks, blue-jays, orioles, red-winged blackbirds, field sparrows, a heron, an owl, a crow, and other kinds.

Miss Coburn's work has been officially inspected and endorsed by both the Federal and the State authorities. It is being helped by the Radio Nature League, which was organized about two years ago by Thornton W. Burgess, the well-known "nature writer."

In his broadcasted talks, Mr. Burgess has told of Miss Coburn's bird hospital. Dozens of wounded, or helpless, wild birds have been sent to her as a result of these radio talks.

This is just what she wants; but as I saw what it means to her, in work and in sacrifice of time and of money, I wondered how long she could meet these demands.

The Radio Nature League has "adopted" the hospital, and will help by building a large outdoor flying cage, which is sorely needed. But even though other assistance may come, the fact remains that she is giving up a large part of her life to—well, to what?

To the relief of suffering? Yes, that is part of the answer. To an attempt to interest people in preserving our bird species? Yes; that, too, is something she hopes to accomplish.

But, as she explained to me with that gentle, kindly smile of hers, the real reason is something deeper and more human. If the children under her care, the people of her neighborhood, the others who hear and read about what she is doing—if, indeed, you and I may be moved to make our passing impulse of pity more than an impulse, Mary Coburn's hope will have been realized.

1 Three on each side, they should be working day and night—

1 The numbers show where the mouth glands are located. One pair is clear back in the throat.

2 In the cheeks, a second pair needs daily care.

3 Under the tongue two more must be kept active. Daily use of Pebeco renews the vigor of the mouth glands, even where the toothbrush cannot reach.

Inside your mouth are the six real guardians of its Youth

YOUR PRETTY TEETH and sweet wholesome mouth. These are treasures indeed!

And nature has appointed guardians for them—six little mouth glands. These bathe the mouth with protecting fluids which counteract decay.

But you must keep the mouth glands working. Soft foods, lack of exercise, make them lazy. They slow up and leave your teeth unprotected.

Pebeco puts the mouth glands back to work. Its important salt awakens them to youthful activity with its keen sharp taste. How fresh and young your mouth feels now!

Made by Pebeco, Inc., a division of Lehn & Fink Products Company. Sole distributors, Lehn & Fink, Inc., Bloomfield, New Jersey.

How confident you can be, when you have used Pebeco! No matter how close to others you laugh and speak, you know your breath is always sweet and pure as a child's.

"Pebeco is more than a tooth paste," so many users say. "It is necessary to perfect and complete care of the whole mouth."

And now Thomas A. Edison answers another questionnaire . . . . .

In the photographic diagram above, wave No. 1 is that of the fundamental tone of an organ-pipe. The numerous waves beneath it are that organ-pipe's overtones. They are as elusive as a ray of sunlight, yet their capture and preservation on a phonograph record is utterly essential to full, perfect Re-Creation of an artist's performance. It is obvious that they cannot be preserved if their microscopic strength is dissipated in any way — moving machinery, for example. But let Thomas A. Edison give you his views on the subject.

QUES. What is musical sound?

Ans. When anything such as a tightly stretched string connected to a sounding board is caused to vibrate rapidly and regularly back and forth it sets the air around it in rapid vibration which in turn vibrates our ear drums back and forth. Through the mechanism of the ear these vibrations are transmitted to our brains and we "hear" a musical sound. Physicists call such vibrations sound waves.

Ques. Sometimes music is rich, mellow and beautiful. Sometimes it is harsh, sharp and unpleasant. Why is this?

Ans. The presence or absence of overtones controls the beauty and quality of a musical sound. The more overtones there are, the richer and more beautiful the quality becomes. The difference between the metallic tinkle of a child's piano and the mellow resonance of a concert grand is due to overtones.

Ques. What are overtones?

Ans. When we set the string I mentioned vibrating it sends out a powerful or fundamental wave. It also sends out many other related waves. These secondary waves are called overtones.

A simple illustration of this: Drop a large pebble into a pool of quiet water; wave rings are formed that go out in all directions in smooth and regular procession over the surface of the water. Now try dropping the large pebble again but at the same time drop several very small ones along with it. The wave rings caused by the large pebble will be there as before but, in addition, there will be many little waves or ripples criss-crossing each other and the appearance of the principal waves will be quite different from what they were in the first experiment.

"I don't use delicate overtones to move machinery."

The big waves may be compared to the fundamental sound wave, and the little ripples that are superimposed on them to the overtones.

Another illustration might be an automobile crossing a series of mountain ridges. The mountains and valleys correspond to the principal or fundamental sound waves and the "thank-you-ma'ams" to the overtones—only in the case of music the "thank-you-ma'ams" are enjoyable.

Ques. What, in effect, do overtones accomplish?

Ans. I've already answered this in Question No. 2. To put it in another way, however, one artist with a few simple lines paints a picture; another paints the same picture but fills out his canvas with backgrounds of light and shade and with subtle color effects. It might be said that the second artist has added overtones to the sharp fundamentals of the first artist's work. The greater the skill in handling the overtones, the greater the master and the more permanently pleasing the effect. This is also true in music.

Ques. Can overtones be recorded on phonograph records?

Ans. Years ago I recognized the fact that only through capturing the delicate and elusive overtones as well as the fundamental wave, and faithfully recording them on a record, could phonograph music earn its right to a permanent place in the musical esteem of mankind. I have worked always with this goal in view. Nature has been reluctant, but one by one she has given up her secrets. The present Edison Phonograph is very close to my ideal.

Ques. How have you captured these delicate overtones?

Ans. In many ways. For example, I made a thicker record of greater solidity which would not shake and vibrate as a whole when played. I developed an extremely hard and smooth surface for the record so that the sound waves—the minute ones which are overtones—would not be flattened out when the diamond point passed over them. By adopting a permanent diamond point I got away from making the sound grooves "grind in" steel needles. By mechanically feeding the so-called tone arm across the record I eliminated having the delicate sound grooves drag the arm across. In other words, I don't use delicate overtones to move machinery. Countless experiments in recording have taught us many vastly important tricks and processes. No one thing has captured the overtones for us. I have mentioned a few but there are many others. A combination of many details working together has achieved present results. ★

Nothing can be better than the BEST

A phonograph serves one purpose and one only—to reproduce voice or instrument as it sounded originally. When a phonograph has accomplished this, nothing more can be asked.

Five thousand tests, in which living artists sang or played side by side with the New Edison before critical audiences in such musical centers as Carnegie Hall in New York and Symphony Hall in Boston, have proved that there is no difference between the original performance and the New Edison's Re-Creation of it.

Eminent musical critics who attended these tests were unable to distinguish between the living voices or instrumental performances and the New Edison's rendition of them, and have put themselves on record to that effect. (Send for free booklet, "What the Critics Say.")

The nearest Edison dealer will be glad to demonstrate the New Edison Phonograph to you. Ask him also to play an Edison 40-minute record—the inventor's latest achievement—a record of ordinary size which allows you to hear a complete concert without interruption, and at a marked reduction from the usual cost of phonograph music.

The New Edison Phonograph is mechanically and technically correct. It is put together in a laboratory by skilled craftsmen. It is not a talking machine or a toy. In combination with the Edison Record, it forms the ideal method of sound reproduction, without distortion or tonal blemish. Try it for a few days in your home, and you will realize what this means. Any Edison dealer will be glad to allow you to make this trial — particularly if you can obtain some other make of machine with which you can compare the New Edison.

Your Aunt Emma

and you can tie this on the cat if you want to. I'm going to Central Africa, and live naked and eat things that disagree with me, and live forever. You are a good woman, Emma; but I'm really too well to keep you happy."

Well, that is one side of the story.

I can't tell all the other side of it, for it would make a book in itself—the half-dozen blood transfusions and skin graftings she has submitted to, and— But no. "Submitted to" is wrong. Joyously volunteered for, is better. For Aunt Emma has a genius for self-sacrifice. Our family doctor, when there is nothing much the matter with a patient, says, "Put the soft pedal on Aunt Emma, won't you? There's nothing much wrong here." But when things are serious, he looks grave, and says, briefly, "Might send for Aunt Emma."

And when she arrives, things change at once in the troubled household; for this extraordinary woman who can be so irritating and depressing where trivial scratches are concerned, is balm and healing to a deep wound, and health and regeneration to a vital hurt.

An adult member of my family—let us call her Lou—had pneumonia, and the doctor was pretty worried. "Better send for Aunt Emma," he said, and so I knew it was serious. She arrived within an hour, and she came with a pleasant look and an assured calm and at once Took Charge. That confused, whispering bedlam, that subdued, shadowy fright, which is so apt to possess and disorganize a household where one of the important members is lying dangerously ill, took flight at once upon the appearance of Aunt Emma.

IN TIMES of real crisis, there is that in her manner which puts illness on notice that there is a fight to the fore, and inspires her human allies with the nerve and quiet and capacity to endure and triumph which she feels within herself. Within three hours, the household tangles had been straightened out, the servants had been calmly lifted out of the disorganization which so often falls upon servants in a house where illness has entered, children and adults felt themselves and their schools and their business set back upon the basis of a regular routine, and both the night nurse and the day nurse, without being told to do so, automatically began to report to this super-nurse, who had so quietly and efficiently Taken Charge.

For Aunt Emma really knows more about nursing than most trained nurses; she has an infallible eye for a good professional nurse, and if the one on the job doesn't come up to her ideals and specifications, that one departs without fuss or flurry and one who does conform takes her place. This sort of efficiency, backed by real knowledge, and by fearlessness and devotion and confidence, helps a doctor—gives him confidence, too. And the mental state thus created gets to the patient, even though the patient may be in delirium.

For the queer thing about Aunt Emma

"—they're just as important to me as the smoke itself"

"And Some of These, Please—"

"And two packages of Life Savers," he said to the clerk when he had chosen his day's supply of cigars.

"They're just as important as the tobacco itself," he went on. "Great between smokes. I use them now all the time. You'll always find a couple of packages on my desk at the office. And in my pocket at other times. I wouldn't be without them."

More and more smokers are doing the same thing. We wondered if you knew this about Life Savers, those little candy mints with the hole; how they freshen your mouth between smokes, soothe your nerves and make the next smoke taste so much better.

It's a fact: Life Savers easily double your smoke enjoyment. Their wonderful aromatic flavors freshen your mouth like a good drink of water when you're really thirsty—and steady your nerves for work or play. Once you try them this way between smokes, you'll always have a package handy.

Six popular flavors: Pep-O-Mint, Wint-O-Green, Cinn-O-Mon, Lic-O-Rice, Cl-O-Ve, Vi-O-Let. Five cents a package everywhere.

Eat a few Life Savers between smokes

Have you tried LIFE SAVER FRUIT DROPS? Three refreshing flavors—Orange, Lemon and Lime. 5c a package.

that when everything is going well, she pessimistic; but when things are really oing badly, there never was such an ptimist in existence. Like Mark Tapley, "Martin Chuzzlewit," she "comes out trong under circumstances," and delights her ability to do so. In this particular ase, the struggle was long and tough. But somehow we all—doctor, nurses, the atient, and the household—clung to unt Emma as drowning mariners to a ock, and the unconquerable spiritual uality of the woman pulled us through. And when the danger was over, she took our hours' sleep and left us, left us to Take Charge of another serious case in the Community.

AUNT EMMA really should have been the executive head of some organization which would have called into activity all her possibilities and qualities. But circumstances denied that to her. If she were in charge of some great nursing organization, such as the Red Cross, she would be happy all the time, because she would be active all the time, active in the way she is best fitted for. As it is, she has to do the best she can in our town with the friends and relations whom fate has placed at her disposal.

I wonder how many cases there are in the world of people who have never found their real work.

Aunt Emma's activities in the autumn and early winter of 1918, when the epidemic of influenza and pneumonia struck this country, would make material for a novel, for an epic poem, for a drama.

Our community was one of those which was hardest hit. It was impossible to get enough physicians and professional nurses to attend to the persons who were completely down and out. Sad to say, there came one fortnight when it was actually impossible for the local undertakers to keep up with the number of deaths.

I am afraid to say, lest I be accused of exaggeration, how long Aunt Emma went without sleep or rest during this trying time, and how many stricken households she ministered to. It is beyond computation how many people actually owe their recovery to her self-sacrifice and indefatigable energy and high courage. She organized the town into fighting committees; and she herself was the most valiant warrior of them all. And when it was over with, she was little better than skin and bones—skin and bones; but there was a light shining through, there was an aura about the woman.

"You must go South for a vacation," I said to her.

"Not yet," she said; "there are still a couple of families here who need me."

"You're all in," I said.

"I'm happy," she replied, and she looked it.

Extraordinary woman! It was only a few months later that she almost fussed and fumed and worried me into a state of illness once more, all over nothing, for I was perfectly well at the time. And the very last time I saw her, she said to me, although the weather was all that heart could desire:

"There, you're going out without your rubbers again, and it will rain inside of an hour!"

THINK over the last few years. How often have outstanding books appeared, widely discussed and widely recommended—books you were anxious to read and fully intended to read, when you "got around to it," but which nevertheless you missed! This need be true no longer.

The Book-of-the-Month Club will deliver to you every month, just like a magazine, the outstanding book of that month, and with a guarantee against dissatisfaction.

The outstanding book each month is chosen impartially from all the important new books, whoever the author and whoever the publisher. The choice is made by a group of unbiassed critics, listed here, who have no business connection with the enterprise. The theory is—and it works!—that any book appealing strongly to a majority of five individuals (of such good judgment and such varying taste) is likely to be a book few people will care to miss.

But you are not obliged to accept the judgment of this committee. Their choice is simply a practical method at arriving at one outstanding book a month. Tastes vary. You are not expected, willy-nilly, to like and keep the books you receive.

Before the book-of-the-month comes to you, you receive a carefully written report describing what sort of book it is. If you think you will like it, you let it come to you. If not, you specify that some other book you prefer be sent instead. You make your choice of a substitute from a list of other worth-while new books, which are also described carefully, to guide you in your decision. However, if you let the chosen "book-of-the-month" come, and find you are disappointed, even then you may exchange it for some other book you may prefer.

Thus you can be absolutely sure that you will never again, through oversight, miss books you are anxious to read; you keep informed about all the best books; you choose your reading with more discrimination than ever before; and you do obtain the outstanding books you are anxious not to miss.

The cost of this unique service is—nothing. You pay the same price for the books as if you got them from the publisher himself, by mail. Send for our prospectus which explains how simply the service operates. It is working smoothly and satisfactorily for over 40,000 discriminating people. Your request for our prospectus will involve you in no obligation to subscribe.

What's your favorite alibi?

With a dozen clean shirts within arm's reach, a brilliant author will not discard his soiled one until driven to it by his wife. A slovenly man? Not at all. He merely dislikes the actual task of changing the buttons.

A very successful lawyer fails utterly to keep his nails clean. In fact, he declines to do it. He knows that he ought to, of course. But he dislikes doing the job himself. And he will not take time to go to a manicurist.

These are examples of a certain type of laziness that is present in most of us, however we may deny it.

You will notice it in your friends, if you know them well. And if you are honest enough to admit it, you will find it in yourself. To neglect the little tasks of life seems to be a very human weakness.

Heading the list of things people are lazy about is tooth brushing.

In your childhood, you will recall, it loomed large as a nuisance. Now that you are grown up, you probably alibi yourself, as so many of us do, with such feeble excuses as "I'll do it later," "I'm in a hurry now," or " too tired."

Recognizing this human weakness we set about to create a dentifrice to meet it —a dentifrice for busy people, for tired people—even for lazy people.

Now greater speed

A dentifrice to clean teeth quicker than ever before. And clean them whiter.

Our chemists created formula after formula. Three were selected. Each was tried by thousands. The result was noted. Then the most perfect of the three was chosen.

Minimum Rubbing

Now we offer it to you under the name, Listerine Tooth Paste. It provides a maximum of cleansing* with a minimum of brushing. The job's over in a minute. But that clean, fresh feeling in the mouth lasts a long time.

And only 25c

Compare this dentifrice with any paste at any price. Once you use it, we will wager you'll be delighted with its results —and its economy. Lambert Pharmacal Company, St. Louis, U. S. A.

P. S.—By the way, the 25c tube of Listerine Tooth Paste is a large one.

 This specially prepared cleansing medium (according to tests based upon the scale of hardness scientists employ in studying mineral substances) is much softer than tooth enamel. Therefore, it cannot scratch or injure the enamel.*

At the same time it is harder than the tartar which accumulates and starts tooth decay.

The Leading Case

will find it an instructive case, Mr. Ebenezer Ponsford, on the points involved here, and from an authority that you, yourself, will admit, unquestioned."

He paused as for a sort of emphasis and went on.

"It is the case of Saul, in the First Book of Samuel!"

He leaned on the table, regarding the tall old man.

"And, Mr. Ponsford, it is a case precisely like your own in every item of it. Reflect upon those items. You will observe that only in their degree and in their setting are they to be distinguished from your own. In their essential features and in their moving purpose they are the same. Saul, heretofore directed by Jehovah in dreams, could no longer reach Him. He was in grave perplexity, and he went to the witch of Endor. . . . And that medium, like your own, called up a dead man."

Again the attorney paused. His drawling voice tapered to a little piping note.

"Thus far, Mr. Ebenezer Ponsford, the great leading case goes evenly on all fours with your own. But I can see . . . I can see, sir, that you will claim a distinction at this point—a divergence that impairs this case as a controlling precedent. The witch of Endor, calling up Samuel, directed Saul to doom, while your medium calling up your father, directed you to fortune. It is a grave divergence, I must concede, Mr. Ebenezer Ponsford, and if it holds my leading case breaks down."

The witness lifted his eyebrows and drew down the muscles of his face. He was puzzled and in some concern, but he maintained his equanimity.

"Your knowledge of the Scriptures does you honor, sir," he said, "and I, with all men, commend you for seeking example cases in it. But, as you say, this case breaks down at its cogent point."

He leaned back, giving the aspect of a man at ease.

COLONEL BRAXTON, standing behind his table, his body relaxed, his eyes half closed, as one about a matter of no importance, again uttered his startling expletive.

"Ah! . . . but does it break down, Mr. Ponsford . . . Mr. Ebenezer Ponsford?"

There was a shuffling sound, as though the whole human mass in the court-room moved.

That high, sudden, whining expletive seemed charged with some hidden menace. It electrified us into a keen expectancy. The judge looked down at the witness and the attorneys turned about sharply in their chairs.

Colonel Braxton seemed to keep hold of the witness with his eye; to take, invisibly, a little firmer clutch upon him. But his voice retained its even tenor.

"But suppose, Mr. Ponsford," he continued, "it should ultimately appear that the vision of your father, thus called up, led you to disaster, instead of fortune; then, Mr. Ponsford, my example case

"Six months ago I was miserable, unhappy"

I WAS ACTUALLY LOSING all my rength. I had a terrible case of constipa-on. I was very thin; my skin was sallow, nd I was extremely nervous.

"I had been taking several different inds of medicines but all in vain.

"After reading a number of Fleisch-ann's Yeast advertisements I decided try this much talked of food, and im-ediately I purchased a number of cakes.

"Several weeks passed and I began to e my complexion clearing up, my old ep and vitality returning. I gradually gained my normal weight and I am ow enjoying wonderful health. I feel is due entirely to Fleischmann's Yeast nd I am more than pleased to have the pportunity of relating my experience."

MRS. CORA M. GREGORY, Dallas, Texas

IN the past year over three quarters of a million more men and women have started ating yeast. Today one person in every hird American family is making this remark-ble food a part of his daily diet.

To feel the way that Nature meant every-ne to feel you must keep your system clean —and active. That is what yeast does. It urifies the entire digestive and intestinal ract, counteracting putrefaction and pre-enting the absorption of dangerous toxins y the body. It strengthens weakened in-estinal muscles, daily aiding the sluggish rocesses of elimination.

Fleischmann's Yeast is the easy, natural vay to banish constipation and its attendant lls—indigestion, pimples and boils and that constant, discouraging feeling of weariness.

Fleischmann's Yeast is not a medicine; it is a pure corrective food—a living plant, rich in the nutrients of the grains in which it is grown. Unlike harsh drugs and purgatives, which merely whip the system into temporary abnormal activity, yeast gently, naturally tones up the whole system.

Start today to eat your way back to health! All grocers have Fleischmann's Yeast. Buy two or three days' supply at a time and keep in a cool dry place. Write for a free copy of the latest booklet on Yeast for Health. Health Research Dept. J-41, The Fleischmann Company, 701 Washington St., N.Y.C.

MRS. CORA M. GREGORY in the garden of her home at Dallas, Texas

MISS JEAN McLEAN likes the outdoors and thinks horseback riding is by far the nicest thing to do in it. She was made particularly miserable when she fell victim to a series of painful boils. Her mother writes, "My daughter Jean had such a bad boil on her leg that I persuaded her to try Yeast. She did and had no more trouble until she stopped eating Yeast. Then she had another boil—on her arm. She began the Yeast again, and again was all right—until she stopped. This time the boil came on her eye but after this third one she ate the Yeast more faithfully. This was a year ago and she hasn't had a boil since. I believe that the Yeast keeps her system in such good condition that there will be no further trouble with boils."

MRS. DANIEL McLEAN, Glendale, Los Angeles, Calif.

JOHN MURRAY ANDERSON, Well-known Theatrical Producer, N.Y.

"THEATRICAL PRODUCTION, demanding as it does constant rehearsals and irregular hours, is a severe strain upon the constitution. I find that the best way to counteract that run down feeling and to keep in perfect trim is the regular daily use of Fleischmann's Yeast. For several years now I have made it a practice to take Yeast every day. I drink it in a glass of milk and find it very pleasant. It relieves all traces of indigestion and keeps my system functioning normally."

JOHN MURRAY ANDERSON, New York City.

Keep well this easy, natural way

Eat three cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast regularly every day, one cake before each meal. Eat it just plain in small pieces, or on crackers, in fruit juice, milk or water. For constipation physicians say it is best to dissolve one cake in hot water (not scalding) before meals and before going to bed. (Be sure that a regular time for evacuation is made habitual.) Dangerous cathartics will gradually become unnecessary.

Pipe Smoker Risks Life Finding Can of Favorite Tobacco

Over a period of years, we have heard of many ways in which pipe-smokers prove their devotion to their favorite tobacco.

But the medal certainly goes to Joseph P. Fink of Darby, Pa.

His letter follows:

Darby, Pa.
November 12, 1926

Larus & Bro. Co.
Richmond, Va.
Gentlemen:

I take the liberty of writing you concerning a little incident that happened to me in the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia.

I have a mania for crawling through a number of unexplored caverns between the towns of Woodstock and Mt. Jackson. One cave was exceedingly dangerous with its tight passages, etc. I spent three hours in this cavity, groping blindly with a "dead" flashlight and a severed guiding string.

To cut my story short, I was finally rescued by a searching party after a terrible experience. It was a wonderful feeling as I sat at the mouth of the cavern telling my friends that I would not go back in there for love nor money. I meant it—until I reached for my can of Edgeworth. It was gone, and I recalled dropping something during the excitement in the cave.

It is queer what a man will do when his favorite tobacco is concerned. I realized that without my tobacco it would be as bad as being lost in the cavity—so I crawled back.

It was a grand and glorious feeling as my hand came in contact with the Aristocrat of Tobacco.

Yours very truly,
(signed) Joseph P. Fink, Jr.

Let us send you free samples of Edgeworth so that you may put it to the pipe test. If you like the samples, you'll like Edgeworth wherever and whenever you buy it, for it never changes in quality.

Write your name and address to Larus & Brother Company, 3 S. 21st Street, Richmond, Va.

We'll be grateful for the name and address of your tobacco dealer, too, if you care to add them.

Edgeworth is sold in various sizes to suit the needs and means of all purchasers. Both Edgeworth Plug Slice and Edgeworth Ready-Rubbed are packed in small, pocket-size packages, in handsome humidors holding a pound, and also in several handy in-between sizes.

To Retail Tobacco Merchants: If your jobber cannot supply you with Edgeworth, Larus & Brother Company will gladly send you prepaid by parcel post a one- or two-dozen carton of any size of Edgeworth Plug Slice or Edgeworth Ready-Rubbed for the same price you would pay the jobber.

[On your radio—tune in on WRVA, Richmond, Va. —the Edgeworth Station. Wave length 256 meters.] would be precisely parallel. It would be happily cited. It would go on all fours with your case not only in its preliminary features but also in its conclusion. And we could say, remembering this judicial trial, that the case of Saul in the First Book of Samuel was paralleled in our time by the case of Mr. Ebenezer Ponsford in this Circuit Court."

Mr. Wellington Monroe got up.

"Your Honor," he said, addressing the judge, "I am loath to interrupt the counsel for the defense. But he is introducing an innuendo that has no evidence to support it. His interrogations, when they undertake to assume a fact, must undertake to assume some fact appearing in the case. What evidence produced here can justify the learned counsel in the vague prediction of disaster which he introduces into his cross-examination . . . and, to his 'jaundiced eye,' what disaster is it that appears?"

The judge permitted Colonel Braxton to go on. The counsel for the defendant would doubtless presently connect his interrogations with the evidence upon which he based them; if not, a motion could be made to strike them from the record.

It seemed that this aside was a matter which Colonel Braxton neither saw nor gave regard to.

"NOW, Mr. Ponsford," he continued, as though there had been no break in his words, "your distinguished counsel, Mr. Wellington Monroe, wishes me to name the disaster which I see behind you in this case . . . and I will name it. . . . It is the penitentiary house!"

There was a great movement of astonished silence.

The aspect of the witness was that of a man behind a curtain, for his imperturbable demeanor held.

But his attorney was instantly on his feet.

"Your Honor," he said, "I demand that the defendant's counsel withdraw this statement, or at once connect it with something in the case."

He was now concerned and lost his facetious manner.

"And I do so connect it," replied Colonel Braxton; "I connect it with the very grant upon which this case is built."

He put out his hand and took up the Treasury warrant lying on the table before the witness.

"Your Honor," he said, addressing the judge directly, "there is a hole broken through this parchment where it has been folded." And he held up the ancient patent for all the world to see.

"Now, Your Honor, the writing of this warrant was all made at the same time, on both sides, except the signature of the governor, for it is a continuation of the long description of these lands in their metes and bounds; and this hole"—he indicated it in the parchment with his finger—"was either there at the time of this writing or it appeared afterward. If it was there at the time the warrant was written, then the scrivener would have written up to it, avoided it, and begun his word beyond, so that the sentence would run along evenly, irrespective of this hole in the parchment. But if this hole came later from fold or usage, a fragment of the word that had once occupied this space would now be missing, for the scrivener, in that event, would have been writing evenly along on an undamaged parchment."

It was a clear statement of an obvious fact that every man could see, and the whole court-room waited with a tense expectancy.

"AND this, Your Honor," he continued, "would be the case on both sides of this parchment if it were a genuine patent. But if it were not a genuine patent, if it were, in fact, a fraudulent and forged patent, one written down above the governor's signature, on a parchment of the time from which an earlier writing had been removed, then, in that instance, the forger, anxiously occupied with his fraudulent design, might forget, in writing the back of this parchment, how he had treated the hole in writing the other side.

"And this, Your Honor, is precisely what Mr. Ebenezer Ponsford did when he undertook to forge this warrant. He wrote the face of the warrant as though the parchment were uninjured, and he wrote the back as though the hole were in it; for the word "poles" is missing from the line running across the hole in this warrant on its face, while the sentence running across this hole on the back of the warrant is complete, leaving no word or letter missing."

He continued to hold up the patent, indicating the fatal error.

"And so, Your Honor," he concluded, his voice now big and dominant, "I maintain that the case of Saul in the First Book of Samuel is on all fours with this case. For the vision of Mr. Ponsford's father directed him to disaster no less deserved and tragic—not to fortune, not to the recovery of these lands—but to the penitentiary house!"

It was a great, smashing climax, and after a moment of tense silence the whole court-room cheered as in some popular assembly.

The judge pounded vainly on his desk for order.

And in the splendid confusion of this victory the gates of Paradise swung back for a moment for me. I was leaning close over the railing beside the girl, and when we all rose in the stupendous dénouement, she slipped her arm around my neck and kissed me.

That kiss was not intended for my mouth. But I received it! And like a vast enchantment it forever, for me, moved the common places of this Virginia court-room into the Kingdom of Romance.

AS ATTORNEY for the defendant in a murder case, Colonel Braxton introduced no word of evidence from the witness chair. His client had no witnesses; the case against him was strong; the prosecutor showed a motive for the killing, and then developed a powerful chain of circumstantial evidence. But Colonel Braxton broke the chain—and did it without a witness. In forthcoming issues you will read this story and others from the talented pen of Melville Davisson Post, in which the adventures of his great character, Colonel Braxton, are vividly set down.

"What's the verdict?"

When maddening pain drives men and women to the dentist in search of relief they discover that neglect has taken high toll in precious health. . . . Go to your dentist at least once every six months and you'll never fear his verdict.

CLEMENT DUNSHEA

4 out of 5 invite dread Pyorrhea

If let alone, Pyorrhea, the grim foe of health and beauty, reaps a rich harvest. Its poison forming in pockets at the base of the teeth ravages the system, and often causes such serious ills as rheumatism, neuritis, anemia, and a host of other diseases.

With neglect as its ally, Pyorrhea marks 4 persons out of 5 past forty and thousands younger. But such uneven odds can be bettered, easily.

By practising these simple preventive measures, you can safeguard health. Have your dentist make a thorough examination of teeth and gums at least twice a year. And start using Forhan's for the Gums, now.

This dentifrice, the scientific formula of R. J. Forhan, D. D. S., for many years a Pyorrhea specialist, forestalls Pyorrhea or checks its course, if used in time. It contains Forhan's Pyorrhea Liquid, used by dentists everywhere in the treatment of this disease.

Forhan's firms gums. It keeps teeth pearly white and protects them from acids which cause decay.

As a measure of safety, start using Forhan's regularly, morning and night. It helps to safeguard health and to protect you against Pyorrhea. Teach your children to use Forhan's for the Gums. They'll like its refreshing taste. It is health insurance for which they'll thank you in the years to come.

Get your first tube of Forhan's, today. At all druggists, 35c and 60c.

Pattern freely applied, colors delicately blended to delight the eye—just a promise of the numerous interesting color effects that the sponge-mottle treatment brings to your home. Its striking beauty belies the simplicity of application. First, an undercoat, either lighter or darker than the finishing color, is painted on the wall and allowed to dry. Then some of finishing color is poured on a board, and the flat side of a sponge pressed into it. Next the sponge is tamped against the wall. Two or more colors may be used for the mottling; though one color, in addition to the ground color, will be found sufficient to produce a most effective wall finish such as you see in the rooms below.

Paint with a Sponge?

WHY NOT . . . when the results are as beautiful as the walls you see here.

"Sponge mottle," the painter calls it. "Beautiful!" you will say as you watch the pleasing design appear under the gentle tamping of the painter's sponge.

The process is simple—and not expensive. The ground color, applied by brush in the usual way, should be a solid tone. Over this, a contrasting color, or two if you like, is sponged on. By turning the hand slightly, the painter varies the pattern left by the high spots of the sponge.

As in any painted wall finish, the true beauty of the sponge-mottle effect lies in the quality of the paint and the clearness of the colors used. Paint made of Dutch Boy white-lead and Dutch Boy flatting oil, mixed and tinted on the job, assures not only a beautiful wall finish, but also a washable and lasting one.

This sponge-mottle finish is but one of many distinctive interior treatments obtainable with Dutch Boy white-lead paint. Some of the more unusual of these effects are shown and described in our booklet on decorating the home. This booklet will be sent you free, together with an offer of further service from our Department of Decoration. Just send your request for booklet "M" to our nearest branch listed below.

Diogenes Had the Right Idea!

had served nineteen years. The governor pardoned me and let me out, on condition that I should find employment and make good as a free man within a year. If I fail I must go back to prison. I have applied in hundreds of places for a chance to earn my living. Nobody will give me steady work. People don't want anything to do with a discharged life man. I'm up against it. I must get work soon, or go back to prison for the rest of my life.'

"His face and voice and manner touched me. I saw that there was something good in him. His face showed no sign of dissipation. But his whole figure was black with discouragement.

"'WHY did they send you to prison?' I asked.

"'For doing what any man of spirit would have done,' he answered. 'I am no angel, but I can stand as much as any man without losing self-control. I was running a little restaurant in Dallas, Texas. My specialty was the old-fashioned flapjacks. They were well made. They got a reputation. The best people in the city came and sat at my tables. I was making money. One night, a lot of rich young bloods came in. They had been drinking. They got noisy and quarrelsome. I tried to get them to leave. They began to pick on me and break the furniture. A fool's fun is as dangerous as dynamite. He never knows when to stop. I grew angry. I couldn't help it. I began to fight, to protect myself and property. In a minute we all took fire. One of the young bloods drew a revolver. I got him before he got me. Yes, I killed him.

"'When a thing like that happens a situation changes quickly. It gets worse or better right away. As if a thunderbolt had fallen in their midst, those young fellows were scared and sobered. They quit their deviltry, picked up their fallen comrade, and went away.

"'I was arrested, tried, and convicted of murder. How could it have been otherwise? I had only my own word and a good character with which to defend myself. They were many. They swore me into prison for life. I served nineteen years.'

"'How about your family? Are they not willing to help you?' I asked.

"'When a man gets the mark of Cain on his brow I think that his family is likely to be harder on him than other people. To them he is dead, and they want him to stay dead. He would be like a ghost in the house, and even worse than that. He would be a skunk in the parlor. They have tried to forget him. They never speak his name nor do the neighbors. I have thought it all out. My family will have nothing to do with me. How is it with you, sir? Will you give me something to do—anything?'

"I believed him. Words are like metal. You know the sound of gold when you hear it and you know the sound of lead.

"'You're on,' I said. 'Come to-morrow morning ready to go to work.'

"He came in the morning with a happier look in his face. I put him at underground work. At the end of the week his boss gave me a good report of him. He had done his task well and faithfully. There came to my desk, also, a little tobacco sack. It was filled with the greater part of his wages, and a note requesting me to invest it for him. I did as he wished. The filled tobacco sack came every week, and a good report of his conduct. Soon he was promoted.

"He went on and on, doing his work faithfully and well. He won the respect of his associates. He was worthy of every trust put in his hands. Naturally, I became deeply interested in John Bowdoin. I dressed him up and lifted him into a place near me. I came to know and trust him, as one knows and trusts his own brother. He did his work quietly, modestly, cheerfully, and faithfully. There was something big and fine in the soul of him. You couldn't help feeling it. He had made a stepping stone of his sorrows and had risen to a noble manhood.

"Yes, I would call him a great man. In judging greatness, you must take account of the circumstances. It's a thing deeper than wealth or position or popularity. Never have I seen a higher type of character than that of John Bowdoin. You may judge how well I knew and trusted him when I tell you that if I were leaving home I had John go and sleep in the house to look after the family.

"He died, by and by, and there were those who wept for him. He left an estate of seventeen thousand dollars, and a will bequeathing it to me.

"How curious that certain members of the family that had cast him off put in a claim for it. Voluntarily I gave them five thousand dollars.

"Oh yes, I enjoy the hunt for honest men. You never know where you'll find them. It's a better sport than that of shooting lions or bull moose.

NEXT to honesty what do you consider the most important trait in a good lieutenant?" I asked.

"Optimism," he quickly answered. "Give me a man who likes the world he lives in, and who has the capacity to enjoy it. Give me a man who can put his heart in his work and his play—a man who has faith in other men and in himself, but not too much. He must be able to criticize his help, and to stand criticism and profit by it. Such a man, if he has health, will have energy and a kindly judgment of those beneath him. He will have poise. He will command the respect of all who serve his wishes."

"What other trait do you value?" I asked.

"Courage," was his answer. "Mr. Carnegie was right when he said that a man, seeing his way clearly in an emergency, who has the courage even to disobey orders when his principal is not at hand to be consulted, is a most valuable asset. There are many men who have sound judgment without the courage to trust it. Their way is strewn with fragments of wasted time and energy."

Our food is so soft...our gums so frail

In searching for the source of these widespread troubles of the gums, dentists have found that our gums are dependent on stimulation to keep them in health—stimulation which nature intended the roughage in our food to supply.

But modern cooks have thwarted this plan. For food, dentists point out, is too soft, too refined and too quickly eaten to give the gums the stimulation they need so much.

Small wonder that gums become soft, weak and tender—that "pink tooth brush," the first sign of gingival breakdown, may almost be counted a national ailment!

How Ipana and massage keep gums firm and healthy

Ask your dentist how to protect your gums. He will recommend massage—and very likely he will mention too, the benefits of Ipana Tooth Paste. For Ipana, because of its ziratol content, is held in high regard by the profession. Dentists recommend it as an aid to the massage in toning and strengthening weak, undernourished gums and in rendering them more resistant to disease.

Try Ipana for a full month

The coupon of course, will bring you a ten-day trial, enough to acquaint you with Ipana's cleaning power and its delightful flavor. But the better plan is to start at once with a full-sized tube from the druggist. Use it faithfully for one month. That is a fairer test of Ipana's power to improve the health of your gums.

Why Firestone Serve You Better

During the month of March, Firestone held many tire educational meetings throughout the United States, which were attended by most of the Company's great field organization of 30,000 Service Dealers. They were given the latest information regarding the construction, care and repair of tires.

For the past several years Firestone has conducted repair schools where Firestone Dealers and their repair men could learn the up-to-date methods of tire repairing.

Many thousands of these dealers have installed in their new Service Stations, or equipped their present Service Stations, with Firestone specially designed equipment, enabling them to make expert repairs on Balloon, Truck and Bus Tires, not to be obtained elsewhere.

It will pay you to call on the nearest Firestone Dealer and let him inspect your tire equipment. A few simple suggestions may greatly reduce your mileage cost. Too many automobilists—otherwise careful of their cars—give their tires little or no attention. For instance, it is quite common for some motorists to run their tires without valve caps! You will be surprised to learn how seriously anything so easily overlooked can affect tire service.

As proof that the public is today more appreciative than ever before of what Firestone Service means, it is significant that sales of Firestone Gum-Dipped Tires during the first four months of the present fiscal year were over 100% greater than the corresponding months a year ago.

Firestone specializes in the manufacture of tires and sells only to regular tire dealers direct through 148 Factory Branches and Warehouses, assuring prompt service and fresh, clean stocks in all sizes and types. The Firestone Dealer is able and willing to help you enjoy complete motoring satisfaction. See him today.

had committed themselves to sounding, masculine approval of the meal before she told them that she had prepared it herself.

"It's sure noble chuck," declared Uncle Jud. "You sure got yourself a permanent job, Mrs. Marjory, cookin' for this outfit!"

But she was looking at Harleigh. He was frowning. Already she was learning, as Uncle Jud had long since learned, the meaning of the line that settled at the edge of Harleigh's lips. He was not successful in attempting to disguise his firm resolution with light words.

"Play around with your chickens and your cute little pigs as much as you like, dear," he said. "But I don't want you to start drudging. I'll just hop over to Wendelville to-morrow and rustle a new maid."

UNCLE JUD scowled at him. After dinner he wanted to remain—a sort of instinct to lend his strength to her in the talk she must have with Dave. But he left them alone. Outside the ranch-house, he gave his confidence to the quaking images of stars in Dry Creek.

"It'd be a heap better," Uncle Jud told them, "if Mrs. Marjory was kind of a nagger. But, bless her, she couldn't be an' be the thoroughbred she is. Dave's overdoin' this 'strong, silent man' business a whole lot. A woman is a woman, born East or West. Especially a woman like Mrs. Marjory. Dave's making a mistake. She don't want to be coddled. She wants to be a wife."

Uncle Jud sighed.

"Besides which," he told the broken stars, "the way she cooks dumplings is a gift!"

In the house, Mrs. Marjory lost the conviction that she wanted to put into her words. It was as if she knew Dave less well than when she had first seen the lean brown man walk curiously into a New York studio. He had been out of place, but he had not been in the least disturbed. He was so sure of himself. Now it was she who felt like an outsider.

"But, don't you see, David?" she wavered. "I love to do it—for you."

His smile was a smile that one might give to an eager, earnest child.

"That's mighty brave of you to say, honey," he began, gently enough.

"It's not being brave, David," she broke in. "I love this country of yours. I want to feel that, in a humble way, I have become part of it—with you. I want to do my little share of the work."

"But there's no need of your working, Marjory dear."

"Yet you work every day." It was almost arguing.

"It's different with a man," he said. "It's a man's country. And, besides, I've never had anything else."

She looked at him, helplessly. So helplessly, that for a moment he might have believed she was going to weep. He had never seen her in tears. It might be necessary to postpone the trip to Wendelville for a day or two.

He put his arm around her and patted her shoulder, as one might caress, in dismissal, a disappointed little girl.

"Play for me, Marjory," he asked her. "That's the sort of thing I like to see your pretty hands doing."

She went to the piano. Her hands reached for familiar, friendly chords. When she played it was a tune as happy as a gypsy dance; as care free as the chuckle of sweet water over the smooth stones of Dry Creek.

Uncle Jud, on the bank of the creek, listened. Mrs. Marjory sure could play a piano.

"It's as close as she can come to lyin'," said Uncle Jud. "It'll fool Dave. But it don't swindle me a little bit!"

Next day, Dave Harleigh went to Wendelville. As Marjory played, the night before, he had decided that she had forgotten her disappointment. He need not postpone the hiring of a new maid.

He made other solitary journeys to Wendelville. She had learned not to expect explanations from him. She hesitated even to ask him little questions about things she saw on the ranch: The ways of cattle; the preference of horses for certain types of bunch-grass; the use of farm implements that looked like grotesque, childish imaginings. Such questions as a newcomer to the country might ask. She did not wish to remind him that, after all, she was an outsider. A tenderfoot. He had laughed once, and called her that.

SUMMER began its long siege in a day. One morning the poplars laughed at the cool caress of the wind from Blue Mountain. The next day they rustled thirstily and seemed to droop. The air stood still. The sun made a slow, pitiless march across the sky. At midday it halted and hung over the hill of two names. A slow, killing heat, patient and merciless as a vulture. Heat—heat—

Dry Creek went dry a week earlier than usual that summer. The whole country was parched. The rich soil crumbled. Great cracks opened in the earth. Around the hill of two names, all through the day, hung a shimmering curtain of haze.

There was the wind, of course. But it no longer brought the cool blessing from the top of Blue Mountain. Traversing the plain, it gathered the hot breath of the suffering land. The wind struck warm against the face. Breathing it was like breathing at the door of a baking oven.

The wind languished. But it had malice enough left to play its old, torturing trick with the powdery earth. For hours and days on end it swept the dusty fields like an energetic but slipshod housewife. It raised busy clouds of dust, lifted tons of fine dirt and carried it—ten yards or ten miles—to drop it for another sweeping.

Marjory would find the fine drifts of it under the doors an hour after she had swept. She was the undisputed housekeeper by that time. There was no chance of keeping a maid at the place in the heat of summer.

Marjory, having finished sweeping and dusting, smiled—sometimes a little desperately—and began sweeping and dusting all over again.

It made cooking a problem too. It was bad enough to work over a stove in that heat. But the food, despite all her care, would have a gritty feel between the teeth.

"Which I can give you a mite of advice," offered Uncle Jud. "The same being not to make mash' potatoes while this dusty spell is on."

DAVE HARLEIGH left the house early each day, to accomplish as much as he could in the fields before the torture of heat drove him and his men to shelter. Marjory admired the fact that he could keep his men working for him. All over the country, ranch owners were complaining of the modern workmen.

"It sure ain't like the old days," explained Uncle Jud. "Not like when I was a youngster, and Dave's paw run the ranch."

"But David's men are loyal, aren't they?" Her eyes were glowing. It made Uncle Jud a little bold.

"It's because Dave's always fair," he said. "He's got a way of handling men. He sure understands men."

For the next day or two he wondered about the swift look she had turned on him at his deliberate emphasis.

"I better mind my own fool business," Uncle Jud warned himself. "It might've been she was glad there was someone beside her who knowed how mule-headed that Dave can be. But I ain't sure she wasn't ready to take my scalp for so much as hinting that Dave ain't perfect in all respects."

The terror of the heat clung to the wheat country.

Marjory did not falter. At least, there was no sign that worrying Uncle Jud might read. She would not have been a woman if she had not become a little disheartened sometimes at the drifting, sifting dust. Early in the summer she was a little pale, and there was a flush high in her cheeks that comes to the faces of women in the tropics.

Somehow, despite the universal dirt, she managed to keep in clean dresses. She had taken to wearing light, ginghamy things. When David rode back to the ranch at the close of each day he found her looking cool and crisp in brave blue and white checks, or in a flowery, pinky dress.

It refreshed him, just to see her standing there in the doorway. There must have been real admiration in him for her plucky persistence. But it is certain that his resolve never relaxed. Lest he betray that vigilant determination of his, he disguised his emotions with the easy words he habitually used toward her—words he might use to a little girl—"playing house."

Once, when even he had to abandon hope of keeping a maid during the summer, he had suggested leaving the ranch. Marjory had reminded him, gently enough, of his promise to give her at least one season of life as he had always lived it.

"Would you quit, and go into town, if I weren't here?" she asked.

"I was hoping," he said, "that by now you'd realize that ranching isn't the romantic picnic they write about in books."

"Can't you believe yet, David, that I am proud to be part of this country, even the little part I am? Or I would be, if only you— But we will stay, won't we?"

"I'll keep my word, Marjory. We'll stick on the ranch. For the summer, anyway."

They stuck. He kept at his work in the fields. Marjory, in the ranch-house, dusted and swept, washed and cooked. By the end of the summer the tropical flush had left her cheeks. In its place was a healthy ivory brown.

At the end of that summer, David took her to Wendelville. He made heavy pretense that it was only a brief visit. It was in Wendelville she learned, with a sudden shattering of her hope, the reason for his mysterious, solitary journeyings to the big city of the wheat fields. He had bought her a house, quite a lavish house. The day that he took her there, a new automobile was standing just outside of the garage. That was hers, too.

Dave was jubilant as a boy over his surprise. Because of this, she masked her despair. In spite of everything she had done during the long, brutal summer to prove her fitness for his life, his original conviction had not wavered. He had looked upon her ranch days as a childish whim. While she was most earnest and most hopeful, he had been planning and building this house.

"It's a beautiful house, David," she told him. "Any woman ought to be proud of it."

IT TOOK more fortitude for her to face life in the city of Wendelville than he had ever imagined she would have for living on the ranch. She adjusted her mask more securely.

"This is what I've wanted for you from the beginning," he told her. "Now you can live the life you've been used to."

He was eager for her to enter the social life of the little prosperous city.

"Of course, it isn't like back East," he apologized.

It was, though. That was the ultimate sadness of it. Wendelville, with its background of pioneer history, chose to fashion its social life after the pattern of the East, as assuredly as its dressmakers cut their goods along the models in the Eastern style magazines. It was a very good imitation. Why not? But an imitation.

Dave had arranged their membership at the country club. The new generation of Wendelville played golf on a rolling plain where its fathers had heard the high chant of Indian warriors, where the earth had thundered under the hoofs of the wild-horse herds.

Back at the Harleigh ranch that winter, Uncle Jud, with disconsolate devotion, took care of Mrs. Marjory's chickens and the young pigs. He refused utterly to visit the new Harleigh home in Wendelville. Dave drove to the ranch in the new car—there was a chauffeur—with the invitation.

"No, Dave, I reckon I won't," said Uncle Jud. "I ain't cut out to be no social butterfly."

He had been relieved to find that Dave was not wearing knickerbockers. Nevertheless, there was an accusation in his tone.

"You don't think I crave living in

WARNING SIGNALS in the Line of Vision

Such was the warning signal of primitive days: balls of smoke sent skyward, carrying the message of approaching danger, warning surely — unmistakably.

Today, the Boyce Moto Meter is the accepted warning signal for more than 10,000,000 motorists. The rapid rise of its red column arrests attention and warns, in time, of the many costly dangers in an overheated motor.

Mounted on the radiator cap, its position is the only place on a car constantly and directly in the line of driving vision.

Thus, the Boyce Moto Meter affords relaxation, relieving the driver of the strain of constant dashboard attention.

town, do you?" exclaimed Dave. "I feel the same way about that soft life as I've always felt. But I figure I can stand town, and soft living, better than she can stand ranching. I'm mighty willing to do it for her sake."

"Mrs. Marjory took to ranchin' mighty handy, I thought." Uncle Jud said. And, as Dave climbed into the big car, he added, almost in appeal:

"You've thought it out, ain't you, Dave? From the start? You ain't ready yet to lighten your pack by sharin' it with a old side-kicker?"

"You mean I'm still mule-headed, Uncle Jud?"

The veteran covered his emotion with a surly response: "I was tryin' to be polite and ladylike, the way city dudes are."

"You've got to remember," smiled Dave, "that mules have a way of looking out for themselves. Mules are pretty smart at that, aren't they, Uncle Jud?"

Jud did not assemble his reply until the big car was making a wake of dust in the direction of the hill of two names.

"Yes, mules sure look out for themselves a heap," he admitted. "With mules it's called being a mule. With folks it's called being downright selfish!"

DAVID and Marjory remained in Wendelville all that winter and the next summer. It became necessary for Dave to run out to the ranch often during the spring. Only once he brought Marjory with him. Uncle Jud saw that she had become pale. He rather expected her to change into one of the ginghamy house dresses, and sweep and dust. She didn't. There wasn't the laughter in her eyes that there had been that first season.

"An' Dave still thinks," Uncle Jud addressed the dust of the departing car again, "that his maw was the one who had the real hardships!"

She didn't visit the ranch again all summer. Uncle Jud read in the Wendelville "Tribune" that she was often hostess to what the "Tribune" called Wendelville's younger married set. Her name was listed with those at the country club dances, at bridge parties and dinners.

"If it was anybody else," mused Uncle Jud, "I'd say Dave had broke her spirit. It's moral certain she ain't the kind to run with that younger married set. She's doin' it because she thinks that's what Dave wants her to do."

It was in the fall of that year that the bottom dropped out of wheat. Perhaps two years of prodigal prosperity had made Wendelville reckless. But there isn't much you can do when the bottom drops out of wheat. Good men are likely to fall with the bad. That year wrote tragic and heroic chapters into the story of the wheat country.

David Harleigh faced the torrent of misfortune, silently and grimly. Out of it, he salvaged enough for Marjory. He had thought all that out too. By himself.

AND now he was riding back, alone, to the Harleigh ranch where, for sixty years the Harleighs had carried on the struggle with the soil. He was riding back on the buckskin instead of in the big car. He was glad of that. It made him feel stronger for the work that was ahead of him. Work would be good for him right now. Hard, long work. Plenty of it—knocks out that "knock"..

ETHYL GASOLINE

..turns carbon into power

What Ethyl Gasoline will do in your own automobile

1 It will end all carbon trouble and make carbon formation an asset.
As carbon forms, both temperature and compression (pressure) are increased. Ethyl Gasoline neutralizes the higher temperature and the increased compression becomes increased power.

2 It will give you more power, particularly on hills and heavy roads.

3 It will make your engine operate more smoothly.

4 It will reduce gearshifting.

5 It will increase acceleration, making your car easier to handle in traffic.

6 It will eliminate "knocking" under all driving conditions.

7 It will reduce vibration and engine wear and tear.

8 It will save the expense of carbon removal.

9 It will give you more power from each gallon of fuel that you use.

IN SHORT, the advantages of Ethyl Gasoline over regular gasoline are so marked as to make the small premium it costs a real economy.

IT is important that you differentiate between Ethyl Gasoline and other "anti-knock" gasolines. Ethyl Gasoline is the only fuel which eliminates "knocking" under all conditions, thereby making present day automobiles perform more efficiently.

It was developed by General Motors Research Laboratories after 8 years of scientific research which resulted in these two important discoveries:

1 That "knocking" is an inherent characteristic of all gasolines. What had previously been called a "carbon knock" or "ignition knock" or "engine knock" is in reality a fuel knock, due to the too rapid combustion of gasoline in the cylinders.

2 That "knocking" could be completely eliminated in gasoline by the addition of Ethyl Brand of Anti-Knock Compound. This ingredient was discovered by General Motors research engineers after experimenting with more than 33,000 chemical compounds.

SO SUPERIOR is Ethyl Gasoline to other so-called "anti-knock" fuels that it has been adopted wherever unusual performance by a gasoline engine is required. That is why the United States Navy uses Ethyl Gasoline in its latest types of airplanes. That is why Ethyl Gasoline is used by the racing car drivers who are setting up new records.

Ethyl Gasoline is available throughout the United States and Canada through leading oil companies and responsible jobbers. It is sold at pumps which display the "ETHYL" trade mark shown below.

"What can have happened to them? Do you suppose they've had an accident?"

"More likely Jim is having tire trouble again; he doesn't seem to learn by experience. I switched over to Kelly-Springfields long ago."

"Yes, it's the best way," he found himself saying, as the buckskin made eager tracks along the trail from the hill of two names. Sweet water for the buckskin.

"The best way," he repeated, like a tired ritual, a religious formula of consolation.

It had to be the best way. There was no other way now. He had thought it all out. He had sent her away and, in the end, she had realized that his way was best. He remembered her pale smile.

The sun had dropped below the horizon. The western sky was the color of an ocean wave, where the sun strikes through. A cold green. He hadn't been able to tell her to get a divorce. He'd wanted to, but at the last the words wouldn't come. That was one of the disadvantages of keeping your words and your thoughts always to yourself. It made it hard to speak when you wanted to.

The cold sky made symmetrical silhouettes of the poplars. The first evening star, abashed, winked suddenly in the sky. Well, it was a poor man who couldn't carry his own pack. It didn't lighten the load any just to talk a lot of words to somebody. Words didn't weigh much—just words.

Oh, but he was going to miss her! No use trying to shift the pack. It weighed just the same. No use trying to lie to himself. It weighed terribly.

Far on the other side of the ranch-house, he made out the figure of Uncle Jud. The veteran retainer was riding away from the ranch. It was as if he were taking the far trail to avoid meeting Dave. It seemed almost like desertion. But he knew Uncle Jud better than that. Even in his bitter, strange loneliness he knew that Uncle Jud was not quitting in this time of adversity. He was on some late chore, likely as not. He'd be back presently, because he'd left a fire in the stove. Against the poplars scrawled a slow pattern of gray smoke.

THE tall trees made the dusk deeper around the house. He had always told her that it was lonely. But he had never appreciated himself how miserably lonely it could be. The house was a dreary shadow set in other shadows. Dave told himself he should have chosen another hour for his solitary return. Sundown was always such a sad hour.

"I feel homesick," said Dave, in wonder. "Homesick now that I'm back at my own home—where I've lived since I was a boy!"

The buckskin had been pressing forward eagerly. He shook his head impatiently when Dave held him in. The smell of sweet water was in the horse's distended nostrils. Still Dave held the reins firm.

His home since boyhood. Yet they were not memories of boy days that rose from the shadows to meet him; that lurked under the somber symmetrical poplars. He remembered her delight with the song of the creek. He recalled her way of meeting him, fresh and cool and smiling, when he came weary from the fields. Her slim fingers making music for him. Little, secret words they knew together.

He made a long rite of unsaddling the buckskin. The big horse snorted his impatience. Even as he lifted the saddle off, Dave fought with the temptation to replace it and ride back the way he had

PAIGE for $1095

THIS beautiful and capable car is built like a watch, and as exquisitely finished. It is in every sense of the word a PAIGE—smart, wonderfully performing, extremely capable, satisfying.

Inlaid walnut finish panels, beautifully clustered instruments glowing in reflected light—these are indicative of the luxury of the 6-45 interiors. The exteriors are graceful in line, and delightfully finished in duotone colors.

The motor is enlarged and improved, and fitted with all of the latest mechanical developments. The sturdy chassis enjoys the matchless safety of Paige-Hydraulic 4-wheel brakes. There is no other car with such fine performance (as there is no other car of such fine appearance!) available at so moderate a price.

Comparing this charming car by any standard, you cannot fail to recognize its superior value. And at similarly low prices, representing equally sound values, you may select either the 5-passenger 4-door sedan, the 5-passenger brougham, the 4-passenger cabriolet roadster, the 2-passenger coupe or the 5-passenger phaeton.

The nearest Paige dealer will gladly demonstrate these cars entirely without obligation.

LOOK FOR "MAZDA" ON THE BASE

National MAZDA auto lamps

To Know Auto Lamps:

You can tell no more about an auto lamp by just looking at it than you could about a watch by just looking at it—unless you look for the mark of the maker.

MAZDA Lamps cost you no more than other lamps which look much like them—so why not have one acknowledged standard? And your dealer will give you a little metal kit, to keep your "spares" in.

THE MAZDA mark on a lamp certifies that it was made under MAZDA service—with all the advantages of design and manufacturing developed by the Research Laboratories of General Electric Company. Thus MAZDA is not the name of a thing, but the mark of a Service; and only lamps whose makers are entitled to that special service are or can be marked MAZDA.

A GENERAL ELECTRIC PRODUCT

come. Then he decided that he would find some chore to do around the corrals until Jud came back, and they could go into the house together.

"No!" he finally told himself. "I've got to face it alone. It's going to be just as bad to-morrow and the next day—and all the days there are."

His spurs rang with the stiff swiftness of his stride toward the ranch-house. For a final moment, at the door, he halted. Then, with his burden overpowering him, he entered.

It was dark inside the house. He felt his way into the living-room to find a lamp. His fumbling fingers struck a match. The lamp wick took the flame, guttered and swelled into a soft, yellow glow.

MARJORY stood before him, framed in the door of their bedroom. Marjory in a cool ginghamy dress, with a slow smile in her understanding eyes.

The spell of the dark still clung to him. She seemed unreal in that light; in the memory of the lurking, despondent shadows. But she was real—very real.

"Marjory!"

The way he spoke her name must have been enough. It must have answered any question that was in her heart. A woman would understand, then, why she asked:

"You are not angry, David dear?"

He could not speak. He was dazed with the splendid vanishing of his nightmare of loneliness. There was hammering in his ears the pulse that beats in the first awakening from a bad dream.

"You are not angry," she repeated, "that I have disobeyed you, that I am so stubborn? I didn't go far; and I have come back to stay, David; to live your life—to be your wife."

He was struggling to speak. He took a step toward her, his arms stretched out in an imploring gesture.

Then he dropped to his knees at her feet. His arms went around her cool, lovely body. His head was pressed close to her. Then the words came—

Marjory listened and smiled down on him. Her slender fingers tangled in his hair.

"Dear boy," she murmured. "Dear, dear boy. I've been waiting so long!"

IT WAS a long time before the wheat country knew all of the story of Marjory's desertion. Even to-day, it is not quite clear as to some of the simplest facts of the very simple tale. But then, if all things were always known, there would be no gossip. And for some folks it would be a dreary, cold world without gossip.

ALBERT PAYSON TERHUNE, in "Your Family Tree," coming next month, says he used to be uncommonly proud of his ancestors until he looked up a few hitherto unexplored branches of his family tree, and discovered some distinctly unsavory forebears about whom the less said the better. His article is not only entertaining but also extremely informative on the intriguing subject of genealogy, and furnishes conclusive evidence that if anyone is keen about claiming William the Conqueror (or any other Illustrious Ancient) for an ancestor, it is pretty simple to prove his claim.

How does the car owner benefit by the United States Rubber Company's operation of its own Cotton Mills?

COTTON CORD is the backbone of every tire. So no tire can be better than the cord used in it—and the quality of United States Tires benefits greatly by these cord mills.

Owned and operated by the U. S. Rubber Company, they were established for the purpose of producing an adequate supply of fine cotton cord, made strictly according to the specifications laid down for United States Tires, and always uniform.

The establishment and operation of these mills, like every other United States Rubber Company development, leads directly to longer tire life and greater value for the car owner's dollar.

The De Luxe Light Six Sedan

Unique Beauty—a 7-Bearing Motor and an Array of Costly Car Features

A pronounced advantage the De Luxe Light Six Sedan enjoys over other cars in its field is its 7-bearing motor.

As contrasted to a Four or to a Six still powered with the older type 3 or 4-bearing motor its performance superiority is so great as to be almost unbelievable until you actually experience it.

You'll find it trigger-quick in getaway, of great power and speed, and with the supreme smoothness and quietness inherent only to the 7-bearing type of motor design.

Its finely-modeled body, of genuine hardwood construction like the world's highest priced cars, is a symphony in blue, with the lighter shade of the body proper and the fenders handsomely set off by the darker tone of the upper body.

In the interior there is further evidence of costly quality, for choice Mohair Velvet is used for the upholstery, the steering wheel is of solid walnut, and the instrument board and window ledges are of walnut finish.

Among many notable attractions included in its standard equipment are front bumpers, bumperettes, motometer, 4-wheel brakes, and 5 disc wheels.

And Nash has set the price so low as to be but little more than that of a Four or cheap Six.

out how all that had been resented, counted against her somehow. Mrs. Dudley said little. She was a tall woman, soddened with housework, living alone in the bony house with her daughter and her daughter's child. The daughter was neutral-tinted, from the effect of trouble.

Bill had told Maud about the trouble; but Maud had paid little attention. Georgia's husband had run away and later been divorced, leaving as his only bequest, the child, Jimmy. But Jimmy was something to leave, the one glowing thing in the scrimping household of women: a sturdy, noisy boy of eleven who looked amazingly like Bill when he smiled.

Maud saw that they were poor, and that in addition to poverty they were bound by their own inadequacy. There was nothing clever about the housekeeping, nothing graceful about the furnishings, nothing well flavored in the food. Bill's presents—the ones she herself had bought—stood about, contrasting with everything about them, useless. The floor lamp, the tea wagon, the mahogany tip-top table, the cabinet phonograph. There they were, testifying mutely to the gap between Bill's life and that of his mother. It seemed impossible that big, jovial Bill could have come from such a setting.

They cared for Bill. They had brought Jimmy up in the glamorous idea of his Uncle Bill, rich, affluent, generous. That was the note most often struck, the one of Bill's generosity. It was a tradition.

"HE WAS so generous. Once when he was in Syracuse he sent Mother a rose tree as high as this room for Mothers' Day," said Georgia.

That was Bill, having a sentimental spending jag, thought Maud. Why hadn't he sent his mother an insurance policy, instead of letting some florist flatter him into a rose tree as high as the room? She saw the worn places on the rug, the hole in the tablecloth, mocking the rose tree.

She felt apologetic when she gave them the few possessions of Bill's which she had brought.

"He really didn't have many things," she told Mrs. Dudley, as she brought out the watch, the ring, the few clothes worth keeping. "You know how he was. He'd wear a thing out and throw it away."

"You breaking up housekeeping?" asked Georgia.

"I've really nothing to break up. We rented the apartment furnished."

"Rented your furniture?"

"Yes."

Mrs. Dudley sighed.

"Poor Bill," she said, almost unwittingly, and Maud flushed. She started to tell them that Bill had wanted it so, but it was impossible to add to that look of distress on her mother-in-law's face.

"It doesn't seem real he's gone," said Mrs. Dudley. "He worked so hard. Never stopped to enjoy himself."

Maud saw their picture of her in a flash. The extravagant, city-mad wife, refusing to have a home, insisting on furnished flats.

FANDANGO

AUTO SEAT COVERS Protect & Beautify Your Car

1 Only FANDANGOS snap on or off in 10 minutes—by the watch.

2 Only FANDANGOS are attached with absolutely no tacking or sewing.

3 Only FANDANGOS leave upholstery and interior unmarred when removed.

4 Only FANDANGOS have the new patented fasteners whose features insure perfect satisfaction.

VITAL IMPROVEMENTS

to be found only in FANDANGO SEAT COVERS

FANDANGO Auto Seat Covers completely cover the upholstery of your car. They protect light dresses and do away with dust-raising whisk brooms which wear out upholstery fabrics. No need to scrub at spots with costly cleaners to keep the inside trade-in value of your car as great as its outside value. Fandango Covers keep cars and clothes clean, and are easy to clean after long service.

THEY FIT PERFECTLY

Fandango Covers fit perfectly, because master patterns are cut for every model car listed as soon as exhibited at the shows. Remember—the serial number on your engine no longer wholly governs your car's worth. Its worth is what your dealer thinks he can sell it for.

The beautiful Fandango striped fabrics in restful greys and exquisite blues, with perfectly harmonizing Spanish art leatherette reinforcements at all wearing edges, improve the appearance of many new cars.

YOU GET TEN PIECES IN A SET

The sets consist of covers for seats, backs, side panels, arm rests and door covers with large pockets. The back part of the front seat cover reaches the floor, thus offering protection against the feet of the rear seat occupants in the car.

MONEY BACK GUARANTEE

Fandango Seat Covers must satisfy you in fit, workmanship, material and appearance—or you can return them. Over 100,000 car owners adopted Fandango Covers in 1926. We are the world's largest seat cover manufacturers. Many $50 to $75 made-to-order seat covers do not fit, look or wear as well as Fandangos. Our low price indicates the quantity we sell, not the quality you get.

ON OR OFF IN TEN MINUTES WITHOUT HARM TO UPHOLSTERY

Unlike other methods, the new patented Fandango Snap-on Pin, found only on Fandango Covers, leaves no marks, lays flat, and needs no sewing. This exclusive feature enables you to easily attach or remove the covers. Complete instructions come in each box.

Prepared House Paint—at its best.

Don't be fooled on House Paint!

"Cheap" paint isn't cheap at all!

WHEN you buy paint to dress up and protect your house, don't let a "low price" blind your good sense. Thousands of home owners are bewailing a "cheap" paint job this very minute and paying the penalty in hard cash.

"Cheap" paint is made of cheap or skimpy materials. How else could it be sold at a low price in the highly competitive markets of today?

Cheap or skimpy materials make a poor, weak grade of paint. That's only sense. It may look like paint and smell like paint in the can. But on the brush and on your house—the poor quality shrieks.

Compare the "cheap" formula with SWP!

If you are tempted to use a "low price" house paint—one that is claimed, even guaranteed and warranted, to be "just as good as SWP,"—GO SLOW!! Remember that low price and low quality go hand in hand. You can't make a silk purse from a sow's ear.

Make the formula test! Insist upon seeing the formula of the "cheap" paint, either on the label or in the literature of the company.

Compare the materials used in making the "cheap" paint with the ingredients of fine old SWP House Paint—as shown in the formula which is plainly printed on every SWP can. Take Outside Gloss White for example:

Note the big percentage of White Lead Carbonate and White Lead Sulphate used in fine old SWP Outside Gloss White. White lead should be the basic ingredient of all white paint and light tints. It is to these paints exactly what flour is to bread.

See how much less of this basic ingredient is used in the average "cheap" white paint.

Zinc oxide, another costly pigment, is the next essential ingredient. A liberal percentage of zinc oxide combined with a large amount of white lead makes for a balanced formula—such as the formula of SWP Outside Gloss White House Paint. It assures a finish of superior wearing quality.

THE ACCEPTED STANDARD THE WORLD OVER . . .

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

SHERWIN-WILLIAMS HOUSE PAINT

More than 90% of the pigment content of SWP Outside Gloss White is made up of these two important ingredients—white lead and zinc oxide.

In the majority of "cheap" white paints you will find only 50% or less.

It is the liberal quantity of this expensive basic material in every can of SWP Outside Gloss White that gives this fine old paint its remarkable covering capacity.

In the darker colors like browns and greens, the "balanced formula" of SWP is even more important. Naturally, these dark colors can contain little, if any, opaque white pigment such as white lead or zinc oxide.

Sherwin-Williams have the pick of the world's colors. Sherwin-Williams Dry Color Works produce practically everything except the natural earth and mineral colors. That is why SWP colors are so rich, so permanent and so true to character.

Greater durability of the paint film on your house is assured by SWP due to the use of a specially treated, pure linseed oil—made in Sherwin-Williams' own linseed oil plant.

360 square feet per gallon or only 250—which?

Some people think that SWP House Paint is an expensive paint because it costs more per gallon.

As a matter of fact, SWP is the least expensive house paint on the wall—on the market. And here is why:

Ask your painter to use SWP—for best results.

A gallon of SWP will properly beautify and protect three hundred and sixty square feet of your house—two coats to the gallon.

Will a "cheap," low price paint do that? No!

The best you can get from a gallon of the average "cheap" paint is two hundred and fifty square feet!—two coats.

Right there, in that forty-four per cent greater coverage—in the fewer gallons of SWP needed—the difference in price per gallon is nullified.

On the wall—in actual gallons needed to paint your house—Sherwin-Williams House Paint costs no more, and often less, than the cheap, low price kind.

And remember this: It costs no more to put on good paint than to put on "cheap" paint.

Which would you rather have?

You get more years of service, too

Once your house has been painted with SWP House Paint your saving has only begun. A beautiful SWP job outlasts a "cheap" paint job by several years.

It dries to a firm, elastic, glossy surface. It weathers slowly. There's no cracking or chipping or peeling—if properly stirred and applied.

Long after a "cheap" paint job has taken on the appearance of a pair of faded overalls, you can wash the dust off an SWP job with plain soap and water, and the colors will come up fresh and bright.

Less repainting expense

And when repainting is needed it can be done easily, quickly and with much less paint, because the SWP surface is in perfect condition.

Compare that with a "cheap" paint job that fades out and wears out quickly—that cracks and chips and peels—that has to be repainted often—and that costs more to repaint because it has to be burnt off, or scraped off, at every repainting.

SWP House Paint is sold by leading paint merchants everywhere. And each of these dealers is "Paint Headquarters" in his district. One of them is no doubt located near you.

See "Paint Headquarters" and save money

Before you let "cheap" paint blind you to real economy—see your local SWP dealer. He will estimate your requirements in SWP.

Compare the SWP estimate with what "cheap" paint will cost. Then remember the greater durability of SWP—the exquisite colors that do not fade. Then specify the paint you think will give you best results.

If you do not recall "Paint Headquarters" in your locality, write us for the dealer's name. If you want expert help on a color scheme, our literature, color cards, or the famous Sherwin-Williams Household Painting Guide—just write. There is no obligation.

Get rid of money worries for good!

TWO MEN were talking in a club-house reading room.

"Everything's going pretty well with me —now," said one of them. "I make enough money to pay the bills, enough even to take a vacation now and then. But I sometimes wonder how it would be if anything happened to me. I know perfectly well the house might be sold, my son taken out of school..."

The other man smiled.

"That's just the way I was fixed," he said. "And then a funny thing happened. I answered an advertisement and got hold of a copy of the Phoenix Mutual 'Prosperity Plan.' Maybe you've heard of it. I filled it out.

"I was paying 6% interest on our mortgage at the time. The Phoenix people showed me how by paying only about 1½% more I could fix it so the bank would hand the home over to my wife clear of debt. That was the end of that worry.

"Then they made a special arrangement that will put Jimmie through college. That fixed that. And just recently they fixed up what they call an 'income agreement'— and now the family will have an income of $100 a month after I'm gone.

"So the only things I had been worrying about are taken care of—and all because I filled out that little piece of paper!"

WOULDN'T you like to make your life plan financially foolproof? Wouldn't you like to get rid of money worries for good?

You can. The coupon at the bottom of this page will bring to you, free, the remarkable Phoenix Mutual "Prosperity Plan."

Sending for it is the first step towards real independence—protection for you and your family no matter what happens—an education and every advantage for your children—leisure and comfort for yourself in your later years.

"I wish he'd enjoyed himself more," said Mrs. Dudley.

Maud's clearest picture came back to her: Bill, in the tiny kitchen between living-room and bedroom, holding a cocktail shaker high, a little flushed, a little raucous, pulling off a party!

"He wasn't unhappy," she said gently, "truly he wasn't."

IT WAS only a little later that she discovered that they thought she was rich. Evidently, their measure of Bill's circumstances had been the rose tree. There was nothing covetous in their manner. They simply assumed that she had Bill's money. She caught Georgia's eyes once, shifting from the pinhead diamond that still adorned her own finger in memory of her miserable marriage, to the clusters on Maud's hands, and back again, in discouragement. But they asked for nothing, hinted for nothing. They were dull people, but they were fine too.

"Your diamonds are wonderful," said Georgia, seeing that Maud had caught her comparison.

"They're a good investment," Maud hinted.

Georgia regarded her sister-in-law.

"It must be wonderful to look as young as you do, Maud. But I suppose that's the way you feel when a man is so crazy about you. I think I could have stood it better if my husband had just died. Kept on caring, and died. Then I'd have something to look back on, anyway."

"You've got Jimmy to look forward to."

Georgia shook her head.

"What's going to happen to Jimmy? That's what we worry about, Mother and I. She's not been herself since Bill went."

"But your mother hardly ever saw Bill," Maud reminded her.

"I know. But he was there, successful and rich, and he was hers. There to rely on, in a pinch. She'd sort of hoped that Bill would take an interest in Jimmy. There's not a man left in the family now. She feels lost, somehow."

"I know."

"Of course you do," said Georgia politely. But there was no pity in her voice. Maud saw that they couldn't pity her, because she looked so young and healthy. They couldn't pity her, because of the diamonds and the wardrobe trunk lined with blue velvet, and the presumable fortune she had in New York. They had an idea that she didn't appreciate Bill. "Why," thought Maud, "I lived with him. I knew him from A to Z. The Bill they knew here is a myth!"

Georgia was talking on.

"Poor Bill," she said, and Maud had an impulse to scream at the recurrent phrase. "I remember when he was going to be married. He came in the week before, just like a crazy kid. He was full of plans, and talking about what a beauty you were and all. I always remember his saying to me about you: 'She's not going to spend her life in a kitchen like Mother. Believe me, that girl is going to have some time! She's going to wear diamonds!'"

"Oh," said Maud, with a sick little gasp, "don't, please." She could feel the tears rushing on her. That was what he wanted, to keep her from this down-at-the-heels domesticity. Perhaps it explained things. She saw the diamonds on her hand winking boastfully at the sunlight.

"I didn't mean to upset you," said Georgia, with her pale, apologetic smile. "It just came back to me, that's all, what he said. He hated the way Mother was always worrying."

"She still worries, doesn't she?"

Georgia evaded: "It's been a bad year."

"How do you mean?"

"You see, she usually has a little money coming in quarterly from some stock that Father left her. But they aren't paying dividends this year. It bothers her to borrow. She hates mortgages, and doesn't want to put one on the house. She doesn't see how she'd ever pay it off, but she needs money for this year. Now, don't you tell her I told you! It'll work out somehow."

"But," said Maud, very evenly, "I should think the money that Bill left would help out there. Or isn't it enough?"

"Bill left?" asked Georgia dumbly. "What did Bill leave Mother?"

"It was about four thousand dollars, wasn't it?" asked Maud. "I think a thousand for your mother and three thousand for the boy's education. He told me about it. There's a memorandum or something. I thought of course you knew. She'll hear about it soon. It takes so long to get things straightened around, with those lawyers, you know."

Jimmy came into the room, with Bill's smile on his face, and she met it bravely.

"Didn't you know your uncle Bill left money for you to go to college?" she asked. "He expects you to be a fine man, Jimmy. You're not to disappoint him!"

IN THE third booth in Jensen's beauty parlor in the Hotel Morocco, a very pretty girl with a model shingle shifted from one foot to the other. It was funny, she reflected, how soft you were after being out of work for ten years. This standing all day did certainly get you.

"Aren't you burning it a little?" asked her customer crisply. "Seems to me I smell something."

"I don't think so," said Maud, looking at the soft, fat face of the woman whose hair she was working on. She had never seen her before, and she never wanted to see her again.

"When I was in Chicago last week, I had a hot oil," the customer's plaintive voice went on, "the best I ever had. Now, they always say New York is so far superior to Chicago, and I say, why can't they have as good hot oil shampoos? I don't feel rested after this one to-day at all."

"Neither do I," thought Maud bitterly, and went on making bedspring curls in the scanty mongrel hair of the woman in her chair. Day after day they came, this meaningless stream of people, in and out, in and out. No permanence, hardly a face that grew friendly or familiar in the long line of customers. She thought of the shop on Seventy-eighth Street suddenly, that neighborly, pretty place done in Colonial style which she had meant to establish, and tossed the thought angrily out of her mind.

"Is that right?" she asked the lady deferentially.

"That wave, the second from the top, should point downward instead of up. You see what I mean. It's more becoming to my face. However, I can't wait now. It will have to do!"

Maud unpinned her, as one takes the bib off a cross child, and let her go. She stood looking at herself in the mirror. Three months she'd been at this, and there were already signs of fatigue in her face, already signs that one of these days the freshness would be gone. She made a little gesture of defiance at her reflection in the glass, and Alva came teetering in on her heels, large and impressive, and kindly too under her white apron, and energetic as she always was during shop hours.

"Bozo to see you out there, Maud."

"Know who it is? I wasn't expecting anyone."

"Well, hurry up and see him, and then take that woman in the blue outfit who looks like a heavy storm. Shampoo, clip, and water wave. Take her clear through, and there may be a good tip in it, dearie."

Maud went to the outer parlor, wondering. She thought she had settled that business with the lawyers completely, and hoped nothing had broken loose. It would be awful if the Dudleys found out that she had sold her diamonds to give them Bill's "legacy," and had nothing left.

IT WAS Mark Wooley who was waiting for her. He walked over to her quickly and drew her down on one of the absurd litt e cretonne-covered benches

"I've been hunting everywhere I could think of. I went home, and discovered after about forty-eight hours that I was coming back under any conditions to take my chance. You'd gone from the apartment and I cou'dn't get a trace of you," he said simply, "unti finally I stumbled on your lawyer, and he told me you were working here."

"Why shouldn't I be working here?"

He looked at her. It was strange to find herself blushing like that.

"Why did you try to give me the wrong idea about yourself?"

"I didn't. You had it."

"And you wouldn't run down Bill. Gosh, you're a good sport! But how was I to know how he'd left you?"

"What did that fool lawyer tell you?" she asked hotly.

"He's my lawyer too," said Wooley. "Our lawyer, I hope. Oh, he told me plenty. I dug it out of him. Don't blame him."

He looked down at her bare white hand, thin and muscular from much shampooing, bare of everything except the wedding ring Bill had given her.

"How lovely your hand is," he said quietly.

"Can you take your customer now?" asked Alva from the doorway. "She's been waiting a long time, Mrs. Dudley."

Maud jumped guiltily to her feet.

"But she's your last customer," urged Mark, "isn't she, Maud? We're having dinner together to-night. Same place, same time."

"Same dress," she agreed; "but no diamonds!"

"There'll be a new one soon," said Mark, under his breath.

Equipment perfected for gasoline stoves

Every housewife who now uses, or who is thinking of purchasing, a gasoline stove rightly demands—a flame varying from low to intense heat, perfect control of that flame, and a lighting system which guarantees quick and sure response.

That is why she wants the PRESSURE

KEROGAS

TRADE BURNER MARK

Here is a variable flame always at your command by a simple turn of the control wheel. But more than that, every stove equipped with Pressure Kerogas Burners is also equipped with the remarkable K-Direct Gas Lighter. This guarantees the housewife quick, safe and sure response.

Go to your nearest dealer. Select the make and model of gasoline stove to suit the requirements of your kitchen, but be sure that it carries a complete Kerogas equipment of Pressure Kerogas Burners plus the K-Direct Gas Lighter.

For the woman who prefers kerosene as a fuel, dealers are prepared to show a large variety of brands of stoves which have the famous Patented Kerogas Burner.

The Kerogas Oven for Baking and Roasting is a fitting companion for the Pressure Kerogas Burner. It is especially constructed to withstand the intense heat provided by these Burners. The Kerogas Oven is reliable, durable, and gives sure, uniform results.

Ten Ways to Make a Fool of Yourself

interested in paying my life insurance premiums; and I can't see the sense in rushing across a street filled with mad motors to keep an appointment to the second, when the other fellow will probably be half an hour late.

But I guess the hurry-hurry bug is born in us. Way back in the days before there were automobiles, men and women used to rush across streets in front of cable cars, horses and mules, and then turn around and stand on the curb and watch the rigs go by for fifteen minutes. Their children now dodge across among the automobiles, and traffic is held up while they are loaded into the ambulances.

We had a man in Flushing where I live, who ran like the dickens to catch a train, and as he reached the station platform he dropped dead of heart disease. If he had walked and caught the next train, only ten minutes later, he might to-day be paying income tax and serving on a jury. Any train in the world may go, for all I care, and I'll get the next one, but I will not run for a train.

It has to be admitted, safe as railway travel is, that there are accidents now and then, and in every case the people who are killed or injured are those who caught those trains, and very seldom the people who missed them and took the next trains to leave. In something like nine thousand engagements I have had to meet people in New York, there has been but one occasion when the man or woman I was to meet did not keep me waiting from ten minutes to an hour, and that one time was a funeral. The only New Yorker who is ever on time is a dead one.

Even in Detroit—and there the traffic is even worse than in New York, they tell me—people rush to get across the street, and get killed and maimed by the dozens. And in Detroit, I was told, people are so seldom on time that when I was advertised to lecture at eight o'clock, we did not leave the dinner table until eight-fifteen, because no one went to eight-o'clock affairs until eight-thirty. Young fellows who were invited to nine-o'clock dances went home and went to bed at nine o'clock and slept until twelve, and then went to the dances. The casualties among the young men rushing across streets through traffic to get home in time to get to bed by nine in order to go to dances at twelve is said to be something frightful. They will take chances.

ANOTHER complaint I have against my fellow men is that the waters of America are beginning to be clogged with what is left of human beings who make fools of themselves by diving into the rocks in shallow water without first testing the depth, by going out in flimsy boats and canoes without knowing how to handle them, and by saying, "Oh, pshaw! this ice ought to be thick enough for skating!" I know it's not my job to correct the matter, but I thought I'd squeeze in this protest about people making asses of themselves in this manner. (It isn't numbered in the ten ways.)

Now, a much pleasanter way of making a fool of yourself and one that will create more laughter—for I don't laugh when I see you try to commit suicide—is to make errors in etiquette and deportment. These things cause blushes of shame in the victim, but they do give the others a hearty laugh. Just after I came to New York, an editor gave me a dinner at the Lafayette and asked me if I would have a benedictine. I replied, "Well, just a small glass!" I blushed about that from 1898 until prohibition arrived and it no longer mattered that benedictine is served only in glasses the size of a thimble. It was to the home of this same editor that I was invited one evening for dinner, and arrived in full-dress regalia the night before. But I was not the man who, when the floating island dessert was served, found that he had nothing with which to eat it but an oyster fork—he is a celebrated artist now.

My favorite bad break used to be opening my napkin with a flirt of my hand and throwing the sly little roll that was concealed in it clear across the room. Now I stalk all doilies cautiously, letting my right hand creep up on them silently, giving them a gentle tap with the forefinger, and then opening them fold by fold with an elbow on each side to head off any buns or biscuits that may try to make a dash for liberty. In the past five years only one roll has fooled me, and it got away only by trickery, going down between my knees and I was able to put my foot on that one before it got far away. Once I blushed a whole evening because I offered a lady the wrong arm when taking her in to dinner, and found I was the only male on that side of the procession.

ANOTHER way to make a fine "etiquettel" fool of yourself is to wear the wrong clothes. A man can do this nine times out of ten if he is given a chance. I have found that the fatter a man is the greater longing he has to wear golf clothes to business; and on a city street in the morning a fat man in golf clothes is about as inconspicuous as a balloon in church. The first time I ever golfed was with a brand-new outfit a friend had picked out for me on a liberal scale, including a sweater he had chosen to fit Chang, the late Chinese giant, on the theory that it might shrink. It was one of those first-class sweaters that you can bend by putting one foot on the lower rim and pulling upward with both hands on the collar.

I had never been on a golf course. The friend who was going to teach me golf came to the house for me one broiling-hot day in August, and I rushed up-stairs to get ready. As my other friend had told me to buy the sweater, I thought a sweater was an imperative requirement of golf, so I put it on. This sweater was a rich brown-red like the side of a cow, but more itchy. I knew something was wrong with it because when I tried to walk, the spikes in my new golf shoes caught in its lower rim. I pulled it up to my waist, but this brought the neck edge up beyond my eyes, and I could see nothing but a red sweater barrel, except when I looked straight upward. Then I saw the ceiling.

Now Comes – Simplified Electric Refrigeration

THE CREATION OF GENERAL ELECTRIC— THE LEADING RESEARCH ORGANIZATION OF THE WORLD

THE GENERAL ELECTRIC ICING UNIT is the revolutionary feature of new-day refrigeration.

THERE is now a new development in electric refrigeration for the home. An amazingly simplified icing unit by General Electric Company. A factor everyone, from now on, must take into account when considering an electric refrigerator. Electric refrigeration—above all things an electrical problem—has been solved electrically by the world's outstanding group of technical experts.

The General Electric icing unit is so supremely engineered and so precisely constructed that its operation is practically noiseless three feet from the refrigerator. It uses very little current and no special wiring is needed to hook it up—the regular house circuit is adequate.

The entire mechanism is housed in an hermetically sealed casing mounted on top of the cabinet. You never need oil it—never need touch it. It operates automatically, maintaining a practically constant temperature in the refrigerator.

Only an institution like General Electric Company—with its world-wide electrical resources—could have produced so outstanding an electrical achievement.

It marks 15 years of intensive research. Some 64 leading engineers cooperated in its development. Their goal was to produce the simplest, most practical electric refrigerator Electrical Science could achieve. Several thousand refrigerators—of 19 different designs—were built, field-tested and improved before production of the models now announced, was authorized. They embody the best thought of the leading electrical research organization of the world.

GE Refrigerator

Outstanding Advantages

Simplified—no pipes, no drains, no attachments. Portable—install anywhere. Just plug into nearest electric outlet and it starts.

Quiet—three feet away you can hardly hear it.

No Servicing—never needs oiling or attention. All moving parts are enclosed in an hermetically sealed housing.

Economical—uses very little current and maintains uniform temperature.

Clean—the circulation of air through the coils drives dust away from the top of the refrigerator.

Guaranteed by General Electric

Now thousands who have debated the purchase of electric refrigeration will want to see this new creation, will wish to find out what General Electric has done in the field. Buying any other way is a mistake.

Remember that the efficiency of any electric refrigerator you may purchase rests basically on its efficiency as an electrical device.

The General Electric Refrigerator is obtainable in various sizes suitable for every home. Different models are now on display at lighting companies and dealers everywhere

Write for Booklet No. 6-A. It tells all about this new-day refrigerator.

However, after turning back the cuffs of the sleeves until they snuggled neatly up under my arms, I managed to free my hands and put on my golf bag.

For years my golf bag was famous as the largest and heaviest golf bag ever seen in America. When it was empty, an ordinary caddy could almost lift it off the ground; but my friend had made me buy all the kinds of clubs that had been invented up to that time. I had some clubs that other golfers used to stand around and gaze at with awe. I think there was one called a "biffick," which was used when a ball lay in front of a boulder and the boulder had to be shattered in order to hit the ball. Another was called a "moppus;" this was to use when a hill or small mountain was in the way, and needed to be sliced off and thrown to one side. The bag itself was of white canvas with leather strips up its sides, and iron gas pipe was concealed under the leather. It was a neat little outfit and not as heavy as a carload of coal. It had all the clubs needed to permit a man to do 128 on nine holes, which is what I did. Before the end of the year I got down to 120.

On the side of the golf bag was a strap, of brown leather two inches wide, fastened at each end. This was to sling the bag onto one's self with. I had considerable trouble getting into the strap, because the sweater took up so much room; but I finally managed to get my head through the strap and one arm through it. This made it impossible for me to breathe, but I could still sweat. I bent my knees and got my golf cap from the chair and put it on my head and went down-stairs carefully and backward. This was because the golf bag extended diagonally across my entire front, with the heads of the "biffick" and the "moppus" pushing my Adam's apple back so far that I gagged.

As soon as I saw my friend I knew I had made a fool of myself. He was standing on the porch talking to my wife, and he had a golf bag as big around as a pencil and there were only four golf clubs in it, and none of them was either a "biffick" or a "moppus." He wore a pair of tennis shoes of the year 1874 and flannel pants that had not been washed since the Civil War, and a shirt through which you could see his heart beat. He looked at me and drew a deep breath. But he was a gentleman. All he said was, "I don't think you'll need a sweater to-day."

HERE are two more perfectly simple ways of making a fool out of yourself, which, strictly speaking, do not come under etiquette and deportment. They come under the extra suggestions for good measure I promised in the beginning of the article. But while I'm on the subject of clothes, let me recommend for the "brown derby" the man who goes out in a downpour of rain minus rubbers, when rubbers are only a dollar and a half a pair, and even the cheapest undertakers charge two hundred dollars. The other prize goofus is the chap who wears his cotton underwear in zero weather because he thinks it's smart to do so.

And, I ask you, what kind of double-barreled fool do you feel when you introduce people by their wrong names?

I believe my favorite stunt is forgetting names. I can sit down at a table alongside a man I have seen every week for ten years, and forget his name with absolute completeness. If I have a friend with me I begin to grope for the names in order to make a few introductions, and presently a name comes to me.

"Mr. Gammis," I say, "I'd like to introduce my friend Smith. Mr. Gammis," I say cheerfully to my friend Smith, "is the man who wrote that bully book on codfish—fishing on the banks, you know—the name escapes me just now, but I did enjoy that book! I think, Gammis, it is the best thing you ever wrote."

"Yes," says the man I called Gammis, "only I did not write it. My name is Bidenbender, you know. I illustrated that last story of yours."

This is somewhat distressing to me, because the week before I had been complimenting Bidenbender on the illustrations he had done—only I had uttered the compliments to John Garrymount, who was Bidenbender's worst rival. I wonder I have any friends left. For if there is anything that gets a man's goat it is forgetting or mispronouncing his name.

YEARS ago, when "gallery gods" and cheap prices prevailed, I saw a woman make a fool of herself in the old Grand Opera House, in Eighth Avenue, in New York. Along toward the middle of the show two toughs in the gallery began a fight and someone yelled "Fight!" In the orchestra seats many mistook this for "Fire!"—I stood up, saw the fight in the gallery, and guessed that there was no fire. But a very stout woman one row in front of me did not wait. At the very first cry of "Fight!" she climbed onto her seat and jumped into our row. Now, those were the days of long skirts, and her skirt did not come with her all the way. It caught around the back of her chair; there was a sound of tearing cloth, and in an instant she was almost ready to go to bed. Her husband, who had been trying to pull her back, climbed after her, and in half a minute had her coat on her.

"It ain't a fire, it's a fight!" he was saying over and over. "It ain't a fire, it's a fight! Look what a fool you make of yourself!"

I knew just how she had felt when she began her dash. I had done the same thing one night when I was a boy. My father and I were burning papers in a house into which we were going to move, and a church congregation passing by thought the house was on fire and pounded on the door. We had a lantern, and I grabbed it and fled, scared white with panic. I did not know what I was running from or where I was running to. I was one mass of unreasoning fear. The shouting and the pounding on the door robbed me of any sense I ever had. I could think of nothing but flight. That was panic.

The man who, when the house catches fire, throws the mirror out of the window and carries a feather pillow carefully down-stairs in his arms is the same sort of panic victim. I ran, carrying with me the lantern my father needed for navigating the dark halls and stairs, in order to reassure the excited people outside, who would have broken down the door in another minute. It is possible that one of them shouted "Fire!" and that set me off, but I certainly did make a fool of myself.

Probably the verbal dressing-down that r father treated me to cured me of pan- to an extent; at any rate, I have such ear of making a hasty fool of myself at I would now sit in a burning theatre til my shoes burned off before I would k, casually, "Don't you smell leather rning, my dear?" While I make a fool myself in all the other ways possible— d at a moment's notice—I think I am nost panic-proof.

T'S the panicky feeling that makes the biggest fools out of both nations and en. All of the great national panics have sulted from fear, and made fools of nancial systems and of business, because eryone tried to climb over the backs their chairs when someone shouted Fight!" After which, the nation went ound for a while without petticoats. In a reverse attitude, it is this same anicky feeling that makes men rush un- ainkingly to "get in on the ground floor" real estate and other booms that so ten blow up and leave nothing but an lor of hot air and scorched pocketbooks. he same men who make one kind of fools themselves rushing to get in on the round floor are the men who make the ther kinds of fools of themselves by ushing to jump out of the window, when e ground floor has been jacked up to the venty-seventh story.

This is the same panicky feeling that nakes a chicken utter loud squawks and ash into the middle of the road when an utomobile approaches at fifty miles an our, and the difference is that we laugh t the man who buys at the top and sells t the bottom, while we feel sorry for the hicken.

And this brings me to the last important vay of making a fool of yourself. In most nen it is caused by a desire to avoid that ery panicky feeling I have just been tell- ng about—by a desire not to make a fool of one's self by appearing frightened, when here may be nothing to be frightened about.

"I would look like a fool, wouldn't I," ou say to yourself, "going to old Doc Smith and saying, 'Doc, I'm afraid I've got coromentis of the dulcinea, or some- thing,' and then having him look me over and tell me that all that is the matter with me is that I've been reading patent medi- cine advertisements."

So you never go near a doctor, except when you decided to take out a little more ife insurance to satisfy your banker. If you are accepted for more insurance, you let it go at that; if you are rejected, you know you have been a fool and that you should have gone to a doctor long ago.

I have an idea that reluctance to see a doctor lest he thinks you are foolish to come to him has put more men prema- turely under the sod than war or auto- mobile accidents have.

Health, when you come right down to facts and leave figures alone, is absolutely the most important thing any man can have in this world; and the man who takes a chance with his health, or who allows himself to drift into a serious disease with- out consulting the man who knows how to keep him alive and well, is making of himself the biggest fool of all.

Anyway, making a fool of yourself is merely doing something you should have intelligence enough to avoid doing.

Baby Bandit, a step-plane powered with a Big Twin, driven by J. Fiske of Cocoa, Fla., won the Nation's most coveted outboard racing trophy . . . the Col. E. H. R. Green cup . . . at Miami Beach, March 18th.

In winning the Col. Green Cup, Baby Bandit outclassed one of the largest field of entries ever started in an outboard racing event.

A new world's record of 26.53 m. p. h. for mile trials was made by a Johnson Big Twin at Mt. Dora, Fla., February 26th. At Tampa, on March 5th, a record of 25.89 m. p. h. was made by a Big Twin in competition with other motors.

There are 4 models of Johnson Motors:
26-lb. Light Single $115
37-lb. Light Twin $140
55-lb. Standard Twin $165
85-lb. Big Twin, $210
Speeds of 8, 13, 22 and 27 m. p. h., respectively are possible, depending on boat used

IOWA—

BETWEEN the tranquil middle reaches of the blue Mississippi and the champagne-colored flood of the Missouri stretches a flowing prairieland that breaks frequently into high rolling hills crowned with groves of fruit and nut trees and drained by swift streams. Sparkling lakes dot its northern boundaries. In summer the air is scented with honey-locust and the fragrance of wild flowers. In winter the bright landscapes have the charm of rare old colored prints. Tilted warmly to the south, the extraordinarily deep, fertile, porous soil makes it one of the most wonderful agricultural regions in the world.

This is golden Iowa. An unequaled wealth-producing area where an almost perfect balance is maintained between industry and agriculture. A great region where virtually the entire land surface is rich tillable soil.

POPULATION: With a population of 2,500,000, there is only one city of over 100,000 inhabitants. There are 18 with over 10,000! Population is distributed with great evenness. The city here reaches its highest point of development—a compact industrial unit supported by the wealth of a rich soil. Typical are Des Moines, Dubuque, Cedar Rapids, Sioux City, Davenport, Council Bluffs, Ottumwa, Mason City, Boone, Clinton.

AGRICULTURE: The total annual value of farm crops is close to $1,000,000,000! Iowa leads the Nation in the production of corn. More than doubles the hog production of any other state. Stands second in the number of beef cattle. Third in dairy cattle. First in value of poultry and eggs. Of Iowa's 210,000 farms, more than 123,000 are operated directly by owners or managers; their average full value is estimated at more than $35,000!

INDUSTRIAL: Industrial development has gained with significant suddenness in the last ten years. This has taken the form of a great variety of manufactories, employing local materials. According to the 1920 census, Iowa's factory output was already $745,000,000 annually; it has increased considerably since then.

POWER: Great hydroelectric resources are available in the tremendous flow of the rivers that bound Iowa. Keokuk Dam, the largest river water-power project in America, is typical of what may be done. In addition, coal fields extend through 23 counties, already producing 9,000,000 tons annually.

TRANSPORTATION: No other state is so well served by railways. It is claimed there is a railroad within ten miles of every farm in the state. Three trunk lines of The Milwaukee Road serve Iowa, giving it outlets north, east, south and west.

The height of civilization

Located in the strategic center of a prosperous and peaceful nation, Iowa has attained close to the ideal of civilization as a commonwealth. With industry and agriculture about balanced, its population evenly distributed, and small, live metropolises as regional centers, it is in addition distinguished for the number and excellence of its educational institutions, its high standards of living, and the health, stamina and beauty of its rising generation.

A farmers' railroad

To CO-OPERATION between farmer and railroad must go credit for the marvelous development of Iowa. Neither could exist long without the assistance of the other. Most typical symbol of Iowa's growth is the small country grain elevator standing high beside the tracks at a wayside station. The overwhelming bulk of this region's produce flows to market over the rails; and the tools of production and the necessities and luxuries of life come flowing back.

The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway serves Iowa with three trunk lines and a network of branch lines. It extends the same character of service over all the northwestern block of the United States from the middle reaches of the Mississippi to the Pacific.

The Milwaukee Road is 11,000 miles long, employing 60,000 men. It reaches from Chicago to Kansas City, Omaha, Des Moines, Sioux City; to Milwaukee and the upper Michigan Peninsula; to Minneapolis and St. Paul and Duluth; westward to the Black Hills; and to Butte, Spokane, Seattle, Tacoma, Olympic Peninsula and the Pacific.

To the Coast

A master stroke of railroad engineering was achieved with the extension of the line to the Coast in 1911. For 660 miles over four great mountain ranges —Belt, Bitter Root, Rocky, Cascade, to shipside—it is electrified. The hydroelectric power is generated chiefly in Montana. The latest development in this most modern railroad is the adoption of roller bearings on passenger cars.

The Milwaukee Road is the short line to the Coast. Scenery of extraordinary grandeur alternates with the beauty of richly cultivated plains and valleys. The world-famous Olympian and the Columbian will take you in restful luxury.

"Long GREEN" or "Sky BLUE?"

Uncle Sam's greenbacks—our beloved "long greens"—are the prettiest money in the world; and mighty handy to have about.

The only trouble with them is that they are so hard to get, and harder to keep.

Harder to keep! So many people want them. Want yours—all they can get of them. Sometimes you get full value for them; or you get nothing—you lose them; or, as often happens these days, they are stolen from you. In either case your "long green" money is gone forever.

And right here is where the "sky blue" American Express Travelers Cheques have the advantage for everyday use over Uncle Sam's "long greens."

If you lose your American Express Travelers Cheques or they are stolen, you are not the loser. If your Cheques have not been countersigned by you or exchanged for value, the American Express Company makes good your loss.

And it costs only 75 cents to change $100 of your "long green" money (which is just as useful to anyone as to you) into "sky blue" American Express Travelers Cheques (which are yours and yours only, no matter what happens).

Sample them. Try them out. Compare them with greenbacks. Buy two or three ten or twenty-dollar American Express Travelers Cheques. Carry them in your pocket instead of greenbacks—and note the difference.

The "sky blues" will give you an unbelievable sense of comfort in the knowledge that your money is always safe. The more money you carry in American Express Travelers Cheques, the greater the comfort.

And be sure your Travelers Cheques are "SKY BLUE." physicians were helpless. Death stalked in every block and made the nights hideous with the rumble of carts bound for the cemetery.

But a group of volunteers, organized as the Howard Association, stood their ground. They went into the stricken homes and served as nurses. They dug the graves, acted as ministers, and helped bury the dead. John G. Lonsdale, Senior, thirty-two years old, was treasurer of this group. His wife was at his side. And before the yellow scourge had lifted both had given their lives. John, Junior, at six years of age, was left an orphan.

He went to live with an uncle, Captain J. P. Mellard, first at Frankfort, Kentucky, and later near Hot Springs, Arkansas. The boy's only estate was a few thousand dollars paid as insurance on his father's life—that, and a memory that was to be the guerdon for his loss.

"To this day," Mr. Lonsdale told me, "I am grateful for that insurance. It kept me from absolute dependency, and later paid for my education. I believe that no man who marries and becomes a father is fair to his family, or true to his family's trust in him, if he fails to carry life insurance. I would say to the young man, 'Buy insurance before you buy the ring!'"

Young John didn't shine in school, but he could run faster and jump farther than any other youngster of his age. Every darky for twenty miles about knew and worshiped "Marse Johnny."

ONE old negro servant, James by name, but known only as "Uncle Geemes" was the boy's most devoted mentor and admirer. There was no shaking old "Uncle Geemes" in his solemn prophecy that some day "Marse Johnny was going to be a great big man up No'th."

Uncle Geemes taught Marse Johnny where the rabbits ran, how to build a box trap and to set a snare, and the whereabouts of the deep pools in which the big fish lurked. And when Marse Johnny went to bed with the measles, the whooping cough, and the mumps, it was anxious old Uncle Geemes who hovered by his bedside, tender and concerned as a mother.

"He was the first soul on this earth," said Mr. Lonsdale softly, "to have faith in me. That faith was bounded by neither earth nor sky."

Impulsively he reached into a trouser pocket and held up for my inspection a horsechestnut, worn to a silken sheen by the passing years.

"Now laugh your head off," he challenged, and though his own hearty laughter rang out I saw a suspicious moisture in his eyes. "Uncle Geemes gave me this whim-wham when I was a boy—to keep away the 'rheumatiz,' he said. The virtues of the gift may be questioned, but those of the giver never. He's been dead these many years; but I've kept the token and always will. It's an antidote for pride.

"I don't believe anybody," he said, "influenced me more than did old James. A man must have faith in himself; and old James, though only a poor darky, built in me, an orphan, the fires of faith.

"'Marse Johnny, go No'th,' was one of old Uncle Geemes's constant injunctions.

"The South was still staggering from the defeat of the war. It was without money. It lacked schools. More clearly than many a white man old James saw the need of a new viewpoint, that only Northern education could give.

"THERE came a time, when we were building the railroad between Little Rock and Hot Springs, that our last dollar had been spent. Every source of possible help seemingly had been exhausted, and we were beaten.

"'Go No'th!' the old darky said again. 'Them Yankees are just rollin' in money. How d'you all know they won't let you have some if you don't ever ask 'em for it?'

"I went North," said Mr. Lonsdale. "I got the money. The railroad was built; and it was the woolly head of old James that made it possible!

"Our first train ran with the governor, state officials, and local notables aboard. As the gayly bedecked coach came into the station, there was a cheering from the assembled crowds. Above the voices of all I could hear that of old Uncle Geemes, who had spied me on the train.

"'There he is!' he was shrieking. 'I knew it! I knew it! Marse Johnny said he'd come with that railroad, and I declare to goodness he sure did!'

"I wanted no higher praise from any man; for there is no greater satisfaction than the knowledge that you have justified another's faith."

Lonsdale built his first railroad when he was ten years old, and in that too he "filled a need." During one of the hottest summers Arkansas had seen in many years, a traveling carnival "went broke" near Hot Springs. Part of the equipment left behind for a group of wide-eyed boys to wonder at was a track that had been used for the roller-coaster.

"Gee!" gasped one youngster, recalling the thrill of the roller-coaster ride, "wouldn't it be great if they'd left the cars too!"

"I tell you what," spoke up young John. "I'll build a railroad. That's better any day than a roller-coaster."

"Where you goin' to get an engine?" demanded the other jeeringly.

"Don't need an engine," said John, and went to work. Out of odd bits of board and a miscellaneous assortment of wheels he constructed a coach. But it was in laying the tracks that he exhibited his engineering gift. They were run down one small hill and up another. Gravity furnished the motive power.

The passenger fare was set at one penny a ride; but, pennies being scarce, marbles and "treasures" were accepted, and the road was an immediate success. "At that time," laughed Mr. Lonsdale, "I thought that Jay Gould and I owned all the railroads in Arkansas."

FRANK C. CLARK, Times Bldg., N. Y.

Originator of World cruises. Established thirty-two years.

His consuming interest was railroading. There was only a stub short line running into Hot Springs from the south, and the lack of a railroad to the east was a regular source of complaint to older folks. The virtual railroad monopoly of the Gould interests in the state was one of the most vital topics of the day.

Once young John asked his mentor, Uncle Geemes: "Since they want a railroad so bad, why don't they build one?"

"Marse Johnny," the old negro replied, "folks hereabouts resolute too much on this railroad. They get together an' resolute, an' resolute again. So much time is taken for resolutin' that no time's left for buildin'."

Uncle Geemes wasn't far off in his diagnosis. Several bales of resolutions had been passed by civic and business bodies; but not a foot of right-of-way had been purchased or a tie laid.

Lonsdale went North to finish his schooling at St. John's Military Academy, at Manlius, New York, and at a business college in Baltimore. He was eighteen when he returned home to enter the real estate office of his uncle-guardian. He worked hard for a few dollars a week; sold bits of land in Hot Springs, farms and chicken ranches; rented hotels and boarding-houses, and did all the detail work of his uncle's business.

But he was always thinking and dreaming of that needed railroad into Hot Springs. Here was a great health resort, virtually cut off from the world. He could see what a railroad would do for the hotels, for land values, for farms along its way.

And the Chamber of Commerce was still "resoluting"!

One afternoon a youth whose jaw was clenched and in whose eyes was the gleam of a Sir Galahad rode out of Hot Springs on a runt of a Western pony. He headed into the hills, toward Little Rock. He had a map in his pocket on which was roughly penciled a line, crawling from village to village—the railroad to be. But he depended more on his eyes than on the map.

The lone rider was young Lonsdale. Folks said that no railroad could be built through those hills without expensive tunneling and grading, and an expenditure of untold millions of dollars. But this boy on the pony had hunted those hills. Old Geemes and he had got through without a lot of climbing, by following the gaps. Standing in one gap, with the hills rising on either side of him, his keen eye ran an air line to the next discernible gap. Why couldn't a railroad be built through the gaps?

WEEKS, months, he rode and walked those hills. It wasn't sufficient merely to find a way through; that way had to be the most direct and practical. The work had to be done in spare time, during evenings and on Sundays. Old Uncle Geemes was his sole companion—and though the town laughed at the dream of this boy, the black man didn't. To him it was serious, sober endeavor. He believed in "Marse Johnny."

Then, one night, an imposing and important individual appeared before the local chamber of commerce. He wore a frock coat, which swung back majestically from his portly belt line. A huge pearl was in his rich cravat; he spoke of Wall Street as if he lived there, and called the nation's financial giants by their first names. The chamber was impressed.

"What about this railroad you talk so much about?" demanded the stranger. "I'm interested in such matters. Railroad building is my specialty."

So they told him how badly they needed a railroad; they read the latest resolution on the subject.

"But the route?" the stranger insisted. "What have you done about the right-of-way?"

They had done nothing. Finally, somebody spoke up a little dryly: "There's a young fellow over in Captain Mellard's real estate office who claims to know something about that. The name's Lonsdale. Reckon you might see him."

The promoter, for such he was, hunted up Lonsdale, heard his arguments, and studied his maps. He brought in an engineer, and the three went over the route Lonsdale had laid out.

"It's the route," decided the engineer. "But what about buying the right-of-way? How much will it cost?"

"I've settled that," said Lonsdale quietly. "I've got options for all of it. I've convinced the farmers and land owners that this railroad is going to help them. They'll give the land to get the road!"

THE promoter smiled and rubbed his hands. To show his confidence in the success of the project, he said, he individually would subscribe for a half million or more in stock, which he would have issued at once. Also he would "negotiate" with his influential friends in Wall Street. The "Little Rock, Hot Springs and Texas" would be the name of the new railroad, for shortly it would be extended into Texas.

Contracts were made, workmen engaged, construction machines brought in. Along the sixty miles of the proposed road the country seethed with enthusiasm. And, not doubting for a moment the promoter's sincerity and honor, Lonsdale went to the friends he had made among the townsfolk and the farmers. They subscribed for stock and laid down their hard-earned money for it. They extended credit. The mountaineers came down from their hills to wield picks and shovels; farmers hired with their teams. The new road was under way!

Eventually, the bills began to come in. They were paid out of the funds subscribed by Arkansans. But these funds dwindled, and Lonsdale had to extend his appeals into a wider territory and utilize more heavily the new road's credit. The promoter, who had not yet put up a penny, was still "negotiating." The company began to be pressed for money.

Picture at this stage Lonsdale's predicament. He had involved every friend he had in this railroad venture. Even old James had gone out and raised what money he could among his few affluent friends. And a business panic, that of the early nineties, was rapidly spreading over the country. Creditors had to have their money. And there was no word from New York!

In desperation, Lonsdale went to New York to confront the promoter. At the man's home the door was slammed in his face. He stayed around and made some careful inquiries, learning finally that the promoter was expected at a certain doctor's office. He went there and sat down to await his coming. After two hours' wait, the promoter appeared.

"Oh, hello," he greeted cheerfully. "How are things out in Arkansas?"

Lonsdale poured forth his story of the perilous situation, and the imperative needs of funds. "We're on the verge of bankruptcy!" he finished. "You've made promises. Now what are you going to do?"

The promoter stuck his thumbs into his suspenders, pursed his lips, and teetered calmly on his heels. "Since you're that bad off," he said, "I couldn't possibly let you have money. The best thing you can do is to declare yourselves bankrupt."

The road did go into bankruptcy, and Lonsdale was appointed the receiver. Careful liquidation, he estimated, would just about enable them to meet their debts. Much of the roadway had been built.

THEN the promoter for the first time really showed his hand. He presented a claim for personal and other services amounting to more than six hundred thousand dollars. It was a shrewd move to get complete control of the road and its assets, for under the bankruptcy law at that time claims were allowed preference in the order of their filing. The promoter had filed his claim first.

In the meantime, the local situation was such that Lonsdale dug into his own savings to buy food for men and mules employed by the company. Right down to his bottom dollar he went. His only explanation of this act was, "I didn't know those fool mules could eat so much."

One night, anxiously poring over the bankruptcy laws to find a possible loophole through which to foil the promoter, he found a clause that made him jump up and cheer. It declared that stockholders of a bankrupt company could be sued for whatever portion of their stock subscription remained unpaid. The promoter's claim was for $600,000. He had signed, but not paid for, $675,000 in stock!

Lonsdale himself owed $1,000 on stock he had taken, which was a pile of money to a youngster of twenty-four who was "broke." However, he raised the $1,000 and paid it in. Then he instituted his suit against the promoter, with the result that that gentleman was seen no more in Arkansas.

Lonsdale's next move was to call the stockholders and creditors together and effect a reorganization of the company under the more modest name of "Little Rock and Hot Springs Western." It was then that old Uncle Geemes suggested that "Marse Johnny" again "Go No'th," and see if he could not interest Yankee capital in the project.

Lonsdale steered clear of New York this time and went, instead, to Philadelphia. There, to conservative men, he frankly told the story of the bankruptcy and reorganization, and presented facts to show the soundness of the venture. The Philadelphians promptly investigated, and when they found Lonsdale's facts to be as represented, they did not hesitate to furnish the funds to complete the road.

"I knew it!" chuckled old Uncle Geemes.

So the dream of the boy on a runt pony came true; and John Lonsdale in the eyes of Hot Springs was a "made" man, at twenty-five years of age!

TO GET THE TRAINS THROUGH . . . SAFELY, SWIFTLY, AND ON TIME

These Pennsylvania signal lights tell the engineer about the track for miles ahead. Uniquely designed to penetrate fog or snow, as well as to stand out brightly in the glare of noon, they burn night and day, ensuring the greatest accuracy and security yet developed by signal engineers.

As the Great Limited speeds through the night

A thousand signal lights, a thousand unseen human eyes . . . watch over its swift flight

YOUR conductor and brakeman, sometimes even the engineer and fireman of your train—these you see and come to know.

But out in the night that flows by the windows of your speeding train, there is an army of men you seldom see, watching over your swift flight, playing a vital part in the comfort and security of your journey.

They are everywhere along your route: skilled operators in a thousand towers, guiding your train through the miles of tracks and switches; dispatchers in each divisional headquarters carefully tracing your progress; skilled inspectors awaiting you at every stopping point; track walkers, levermen, relief crews. . . .

And aiding them, supplying an additional check on human decisions, there is a system of uncannily accurate mechanical devices; the largest private telephone and telegraph system in the world; indication lights of the latest design; automatic block machinery and signalling apparatus.

Over two billion dollars have been invested in the huge transportation machinery of the Pennsylvania; over 200,000 men, in a thousand different jobs, devote their lives to it. And the object of it all, the final objective of every man, is to get the trains through safely, swiftly and on time.

His next step to "meet another expressed need"—the establishment of a direct telegraph wire and brokerage office in Hot Springs—found an immediate supporter in Colonel S. W. Fordyce, a local magnate. Fordyce had watched Lonsdale's railroad fight, and he did not hesitate to introduce him to the visiting money kings. At Hot Springs these men were on vacation, with leisure on their hands. The result was that Lonsdale, in a year's time, was better acquainted with many of the greatest financial figures of the day than many successful brokers who had spent years in New York. He rose like a rocket in the brokerage world. Before he was thirty great New York firms were bidding high for his services.

In 1904, quitting Hot Springs, he moved to New York and became a partner in the banking and brokerage firm of Logan and Bryan. During the next ten years he was almost phenomenally successful. He engineered "big deals." He made more money than he had ever dreamed of possessing. But those ten years held no "high spots," except his marriage in 1913 to Marie Allen, of Georgia. That marriage in a few short years was destined radically to change his whole life.

Lonsdale had been previously married and left a widower. A daughter had been born to that union; but a son was born to this, and he had longed for a son. There was no prouder, more delighted father in New York.

They were living in a fashionable block on Fifth Avenue. One morning Lonsdale made out an impressive list of various things the new baby would need. Then, summoning the nurse girl, he dispatched her to the drug store on the corner to buy such of the articles as usually are sold by druggists.

The nurse returned empty-handed. "The druggist doesn't keep any of these things, sir," she stated.

"What?" roared Lonsdale.

"He says, sir," repeated the nurse, "that nobody hereabouts ever has babies, and it doesn't pay him to keep baby supplies."

Mr. Lonsdale recounted the incident to his wife. "Marie," he said, "we've wandered a long way from home. This neighborhood and the New York that we know is too highly civilized."

"Homesick?" inquired Mrs. Lonsdale.

"You bet I am!" exploded Lonsdale. "I'm homesick for a bit of Arkansas mud on my shoes! I'm tired of walking on concrete. I want our boy to grow up where a new baby is the town's first citizen!"

AND down in St. Louis, which is just a night's jump from Arkansas, the troubled directors of the National Bank of Commerce were considering the suggestion which a great capitalist had made that they secure Lonsdale for the presidency. John Lonsdale confessed to me that, deep in his heart, he believed God had something to do with making that board of directors consider his name.

In due course a letter came to him in New York: "We would like you to come to St. Louis."

Lonsdale hesitated. After all, in New York he had attained wealth, position, and what men called success, and he was only three years beyond forty. Was it wise to give up all this to become a stranger in a strange place, at the head of a bank which had suffered almost a mortal blow?

"At least, go and talk with them," suggested Mrs. Lonsdale. And she added slyly, "Doesn't that bank do some business in Arkansas?"

Still uncertain, head fighting with heart, Lonsdale boarded a St. Louis train. It had been twelve years since he had left the Southwest. As the train turned westward through the hills of Pennsylvania, the car wheels began to sing the song heard by every man bound home!

"That bank does do business in Arkansas," muttered Lonsdale. "And there's no reason why it can't do more."

He settled back comfortably into his seat and listened to the wheels. The Big Town was behind him and he was "rollin' home"!

I SUPPOSE there were a good many business men in St. Louis at that time who often wondered why "somebody" didn't make it his business to take the lid off the National Bank of Commerce. It was the biggest bank in the city, with assets of $60,000,000; but its wonderful possibilities were bottled up and sealed by an excess of conservatism.

Lonsdale proved to be the Somebody. First off, as I've mentioned, he turned the organization inside out by establishing private offices for stenographers, and abolishing private offices for executives. "You fellows that want responsibility," he said to them, "can have it. Go ahead and show what you can do. It's teamwork of the entire organization that's going to count."

Next, he studied the list of $6,000,000 in questionable assets that had been charged off the books prior to his arrival. He concluded that some of these assets were collectable, and proceeded to collect. When it became necessary, he instituted suits, though some of these suits involved people high in financial circles.

"This bank," he announced, "will play no favorites. Depositors, large or small, will be treated alike. The only requirements a borrower must meet are personal character and sound collateral."

Twenty-eight railroads have lines entering St. Louis. The bank had little or none of this business. Lonsdale went after those roads, and made a majority of them patrons of his bank.

Here and there in the Southwest he spied aggressive, able young men at the head, or near the head, of purely local institutions engaged in banking. These men had "made good" in their own communities. They had followings. One by one Lonsdale reached out and brought them to St. Louis to serve in executive capacities in his bank. He wanted the business of those wide-flung communities, and he got it—by recruiting their own best talent.

To-day the National Bank of Commerce is a $100,000,000 institution. It had 8,000 customers when Lonsdale took charge. Its customers now number 100,000. The deposits have jumped in twelve years from $37,000,000 to more than double that figure. In fact, there's no sounder bank in the whole Southwest than this once tottering structure.

And John Lonsdale is the man who made it so.

"The supreme combination of all that is fine in motor cars"

BALANCE

What Packard means by "balance" in a motor car goes far beyond the mechanical balance of parts which assures silent, vibrationless operation. Packard's clientele takes that for granted.

The balance in which Packard takes pride is that perfect balance of desirable qualities which led one enthusiastic owner to write that his Packard was "the supreme combination of all that is fine in motor cars."

Packard's deliberate aim for 27 years has been to develop a car of all-around excellence—not a car famous merely for one outstanding trait but of acknowledged superiority in all. Those who own Packard cars know how well Packard has succeeded.

Whatever you may expect from a motor car the Packard will provide to an unusual degree. Beauty, smartness and distinction recognized and imitated the world around. Speed unsurpassed by any but racing cars. Roominess and comfort which are proverbial. Low operating cost and long life which make Packard ownership a real economy.

It is the balanced excellence of Packard cars which makes them so universally admired and desired.

Do You Know What Makes a Popular Song Popular?

name of this song was 'Gee, I Wish I Had a Girl,' and it sold one million seven hundred thousand copies.

"Unfortunately, it was published just before the law went into effect giving composers their share of the mechanical rights on player-pianos, phonographs, and other reproducing machines, so we did not get anything out of those; but we did quit our jobs and get married on the royalties."

"How many songs have you written?"

"I have no idea. For the first ten years I used to write about ten or twelve a year; but now I work. I have written as high as eighty-five in a year."

"How long does it take you to write a song?"

"About an hour. If I can't do it in one sitting, I can't do it at all."

"What do you write first?"

"The last line of the chorus, and work backward. I usually have a great many lines left over from the first verse, and I take the second verse out of them."

"Is the music written first?"

"Nearly always. One of the boys, like Walter Donaldson or Ted Fiorito, with whom I have written a great many songs, will come over to the house and say, 'I've got a flock of tunes I'd like to play for you.' So he sits down and plays ten or twelve or twenty tunes. When he plays one that sounds good to me I stop him and have him play it over and over again, and then I try to hear what the notes seem to say. A trick in writing popular songs is to write words that actually fit the music."

"HOW many popular songs are published every year?" I asked. "How many make money? How many are hits? How many are total losses?"

"I'd say roughly," replied Kahn, "that about two thousand popular songs are published every year by reputable publishers; that less than ten per cent make any money worth mentioning; that seventy-five per cent are total losses, and that the real hits assay about one half of one per cent.

"Between ten and fifteen million dollars are spent by the public each year for popular songs, and this is about ten times as much as was spent for popular songs twenty years ago. Women are by far the biggest purchasers—five to one.

"The West and Middle West are the biggest markets. And more popular songs are sold per capita in the city than in the country."

"What makes a song popular—the words or the music, or both?"

"The happy combination of both. The ideal set-up comes when the words say just what the music says, and when these words express colloquially something that every young person has tried to say—and somehow can't. If the music has a rhythm that matches the rhythm of the words, and if the words have sounds that harmonize with the music, you've got something."

"What rhythm is the most popular?" I continued.

"That one's easy!" smiled Kahn. "There are ever so many popular fox-trots and one-steps, of course, but I'm sure that the outstanding hit of every period is a waltz. I'm referring to the big nation-sweeping hits. Just look at a few of them. Start with 'After the Ball,' 'Merry Widow,' 'My Hero,' 'Pink Lady,' 'Isle of Golden Dreams,' 'Beautiful Ohio,' 'Naughty Waltz,' 'What'll I Do?' 'Three o'Clock in the Morning,' 'Midnight Waltz,' and 'Sometime.' They are all waltzes."

"What are the most popular themes?"

"A cinch! 'Mother,' 'Sweetheart,' 'Home,' and 'Yearning for You.' All these simple heart-tugs have infinite variations.

"Father is usually good in songs only when he is comedy. He isn't taken seriously. Remember 'Everybody Works But Father,' and 'What's the Matter With Father, He's All Right.'

"I think the 'home' song originated in the South, and many of them with the negroes," Kahn went on. "We also got our moonlights, and balmy breezes, and wish I was back again stuff from them."

"Why do the Southern states get the spotlight in popular songs? Why is it you never hear of people wanting to go back to North Dakota, Montana, or Rhode Island?"

"I think it is because most Southern states have musical names—Carolina, Mississippi, Alabama, as examples. Compare such names with Massachusetts, New Jersey, and New Hampshire. You must also remember that popular song writers are partial to names that are easily rhymed.

"Incidentally, I'll tell you something curious: Whenever I write a song that I cannot sing the way a colored singer would sing it—if it doesn't sound smooth when sung with the darky accent—it's almost sure not to go. Don't ask me why, because I don't know."

"WHY do popular songs die so suddenly?"

"The main reason is that there are so many songs nowadays. Years ago, one singer went all over the country with a song, and it took several years to go around. Now, a song written at three o'clock in the morning in New York is being broadcast on the radio at seven o'clock in the same evening, and is heard simultaneously in Seattle, Minneapolis, and in Miami.

"If it sounds good, wires are coming into the New York and Chicago offices for orchestrations, and within a week a thousand orchestras are playing it all over the country, it's being sung in vaudeville, in movie theatres, and it's being dinned nightly into a hundred thousand homes from fifty radio stations, more or less. Probably more people heard 'Sometime,' and heard it more times in the first three months of its existence, than have

Why some women look old before their time

In this fast moving era with its ill-adjusted habits of health, many women, even very young women, suffer in looks from the poisons they themselves set up — the poisons of Auto-Intoxication.

TRUE beauty comes from within. A clear skin, flashing eyes and radiant animation are results of a healthy physical condition—the rewards of obedience to nature's laws.

Yet glance about you and see how few women enjoy perfect health. See how this quick-step round of duties, cares and pleasures has taken its toll from nine out of every ten women you know.

Nature rebels when we lead nervous but physically inactive lives. Digestive disturbances develop and frequently stoppage of waste products in the intestines ensues. These waste products, fermenting, set up poisons which are carried through the body by the blood—causing a form of self-poisoning known as Auto-Intoxication.

Auto-Intoxication shows itself in dull headaches, fatigue, indigestion and in a hundred different ways. It makes women look old before their time. It brings unhappiness, depression, irritability.

To combat Auto-Intoxication "stoppage" must be swept away. To do this Sal Hepatica, a palatable effervescent combination of several salines, is a safe and approved standby.

It stimulates the release of the natural secretion of water in the intestines and this, in turn, brings about prompt elimination by flushing.

You may take Sal Hepatica on arising, or, if you prefer, half an hour before any meal.

Send for the new booklet on Auto-Intoxication which tells you how this common ailment affects health and beauty.

heard 'Love's Old Sweet Song' sung in ten years."

"The man of the street would like to know how a popular song gets popularized," I said. "For instance, he hears it in vaudeville, then on the radio, and then at a dance. How does it get started, and what are the ways in which it is pushed?"

"Well, first of all, the lyric writer has succeeded in fitting words to a tune which one of the melody boys has hammered out. They go to a publisher with it, and play it over for one or two gentlemen known as 'song-pickers.' They are the ones who exercise the executive 'No.' In fact, they say 'No' so much that they have almost forgotten how to say 'Yes.'

"Now, they don't know what the public wants any more than I do, but they do know some of the things the public doesn't want. Years of publishing have furnished them with a large stock of experience, and they have bought a great many costly mistakes which they don't intend to buy again if they can help it.

"A youthful beginner who comes bouncing in, full of vim and vigor and blissful ignorance, does not know all the things that cannot be done, so he goes ahead and does them. If he gets away with it, something new is accomplished, and the old stand-by boys come following along after him.

"Well, anyway, the song-pickers decide that the new song has a chance. Then a copyright copy is printed, a plain black and white copy, and this is submitted to the best singers available in the New York locality. These singers try it out on the public, and in that way they get a line on the song's possibilities. If it seems to go over, the publisher gets out orchestra arrangements in two to seven keys. Then the publisher gets out special orchestrations for dancing, quartet arrangements, brass band arrangements, glass slides and reels of films for the movie houses, and organist copies.

"But to return to the publisher, who is still getting out different variations of the song. He must now get out special professional versions. For instance, one for two boys to sing in duet form; one for a boy and girl to sing in duet form; others for two girls in duet form, or for extra choruses, or for comedy choruses, or for patter choruses. A patter, as you know, has one of those long monologue talks between the verses while the orchestra is playing a few introductory bars of the song over and over again.

"All this material is shipped to the various offices. Important firms, like Remick, Berlin, or Feist, have at least a dozen branch offices, in Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Detroit, St. Louis, Kansas City, Chicago, Denver, and other cities. Out of these offices travel people who sing the songs, people who persuade acts to use the songs, salesmen who see the trade, and various other missionaries of light and laughter. Would you believe there are from twenty to thirty thousand orchestra leaders in this country who eventually get orchestrations of a popular song?"

"WHAT chance has an unknown song-writer of getting a hit?"

Mr. Kahn smiled a tired smile. "Well, I suppose I ought to say he has a very good chance; this would enliven and hearten about forty-eight million fellow Americans, of whom thirty-seven million write to me regularly. But, to be brutally frank, the unknown writer has about the same chance of putting over a song hit as one who knows nothing about stocks and bonds has of making a killing in Wall Street. It has been done, of course. Occasionally, someone breaks the bank at Monte Carlo. Two unknown youths wrote 'Yes, We Have No Bananas,' for instance.

"I don't mean to say that the publishers aren't always looking for new stuff, but they are doing it out of the corners of their eyes. Naturally, they look to the writers of the current hits for their next hits, and they give the recognized writers the most careful consideration. As a matter of self-protection, the publishers listen to everything that comes in. There is no telling when a 'Yes, We Have No Bananas' is going to show up. But it seldom does—and the publishers hardly expect it."

"WHAT has become of the old-fashioned song-writer—the one who wrote poems that were later set to music?" I inquired.

"He went out along with detachable cuffs," replied Kahn. "To-day, practically all songs are written to be danced to. They have nervous, broken rhythms, with the result that the lyric writer must fit words to these rhythms, with efforts that call for considerable ingenuity. You will find this is one of the reasons for so many repetitions in song lyrics and the introduction of colloquial expressions which can be repeated, like 'Oh, Oh, Oh,' 'Yes, Sir; No, Sir,' and the result of this use of colloquial expressions, repetitions, and general offhand tone is that when a person reads a really good popular song he immediately says, 'Oh, for heaven's sake, I could have written that myself!' When a song writer hears people say that about a song, or when he hears them singing it when they are dancing, he goes right out and starts spending the royalties."

"How many copies are supposed to be a good sale?"

"If you sell a million to-day, it's a 'wow'—five hundred thousand is a big sale. In the good old days, two million was not unheard of. Sales are picking up again, however, and you'd never guess why.

"Pick up a copy of a popular song to-day, and you will notice a line of funny little black dots running across over the top of each bar of music. They look something like Braille type for the blind, but they are ukulele chords.

"The ukulele is bringing the popular song sales back."

"What does the average really popular song make?"

"Well, the composer and the lyric writer may get from twenty thousand dollars to forty thousand dollars—evenly divided between them. This includes the royalties on sheet music, player-piano rolls, phonograph records, and so on."

"What is there to the popular legend that a great many melody writers deliberately take themes from classic composers and revamp them for their own purposes?"

"Well, I think all the first-class melody boys conscientiously believe they create

That's got it!

I KNEW what I wanted all the time. That's got it . . . that P. A. taste. I'm sold! And now I'm going to make up for lost time by working P. A. on both shifts. The minute I got a full whiff of that Prince Albert fragrance, I felt I was on the right track.

Now I know. I couldn't ask for more. P. A. has everything I ever wanted in a smoke. It couldn't be more to my liking if I had grown the tobacco myself. The very aroma that comes floating out of the tidy red tin is a treat. And that's only a starter.

When you tuck a load into your pipe and light up, that's the real thrill. That taste! That mellow, mild, can't-get-too-much-of-it taste! Cool as the spray from the bow of a boat. Sweet as a grape, plucked fresh from the vine. Fragrant as a pine-bough.

Mild, too, with a mildness that saves you from tongue-bite and throat-parch. Mild, yet with that rich, full tobacco body that lets you know you're smoking and makes you glad you are! Try Prince Albert, Men. Then you'll say with me: "That's got it!"

P. A. is sold everywhere in tidy red tins, pound and half-pound tin humidors, and pound crystal-glass humidors with sponge-moistener top. And always with every bit of bite and parch removed by the Prince Albert process.

their themes. They do not deliberately go out and grab a melody and write around it. I believe, however, there is a standing prize of five million dollars for four original bars of music, which nobody has been able to collect for some years. Naturally, the fellows who are in the music business, and listen to music all day long and far into the night, hear lots of things that soak into their subconscious, and the subconscious hums it back to them, and says, 'Listen, here's something brand-new. Take it and go to it.'

"At the same time I see no reason why a composer cannot use a theme for a starting point with just as much authority as a preacher will take a text for a sermon, or the author or playwright will borrow his own experiences or those reported in a newspaper story, out of which to fashion a novel or play.

"Some popular songs have had amusing beginnings. I'll tell you about one of them! A few years ago someone gave my little boy a toy pig for Christmas. It was one of those little German musical pigs—you twisted its tail and it played a little music over and over again. Walter Donaldson came over to the house one evening and succeeded by some low cunning in taking the toy away from my child. For the rest of the evening he amused himself by sitting there and twisting the little pig's tail, and listening carefully to the result. A few days later he came over to my place and played a melody for me which I liked so well that I wrote a lyric for it. It was published and was quite a sizable hit. The song was 'My Buddy,' and the idea for the music was given to Donaldson by the tune the little pig played. Neither Donaldson nor myself split any of the royalties with the pig."

It is interesting in connection with this to know that "My Buddy" forms the theme of the music which has been played in moving picture theatres to the accompaniment of "The Big Parade." And this tune, which came from a German toy pig, is played with the greatest fervor in those parts of the film where the Germans and Yanks are shooting each other.

A GREAT many people are so curious about the origin of popular song melodies," said Mr. Kahn, "that I can think of nothing more apropos than to quote from Sigmund Spaeth's excellent book, 'The Common Sense of Music,' what he has to say about the origin of 'Yes, We Have No Bananas:'

"'Sometimes one melody is not enough to create a popular song. That riot of Græco-Americanism, "Yes, We Have No Bananas," contains three melodic germs. Its opening strain is a shock. If you have ever listened to Handel's Messiah, the oratorio that is sung every Christmas in Carnegie Hall, and even more often elsewhere, you may remember the solemn moment when the chorus rises and the audience rises too, by a fixed tradition, for the famous "Hallelujah Chorus." The first four notes uttered by the mixed voices are intended to convey the word "Hallelujah."

"'Hereafter they will inevitably suggest their modern offspring, "Yes, We Have No—" and jazzinine listeners will unconsciously add their mental "bananas." There is no escaping the exact parallel—

The CROIX DE GUERRE of American Achievement

You will see this emblem only on jewelry stores of character

GRUEN WATCHES

THE GRUEN PENTAGON

Who first called it this we have never known. Nor have we yet discovered just when and how the Gruen Pentagon began to deserve the title.

For there exists no official committee in American commerce, industry or politics that adopts such things as standard.

And yet no official cachet could have marked the Pentagon more plainly as America's accepted presentation watch.

It has become that, as authentically as if it were solemnly appointed for the purpose, by sheer frequency of individual selection.

This was recognized when the commander of the American Expeditionary Forces was presented with a Pentagon upon his retirement.

It was recognized by friends and supporters of John W. Davis when they presented him with a Pentagon during his campaign as a candidate for the Presidency of the United States.

It has been recognized by hundreds of other organizations and individuals in America who have made the Pentagon their tribute to important achievement.

This almost universal choice must, of course, be attributed to the particular qualities of the Pentagon itself.

It is unique first of all by its shape. But its five gracefully rounded sides give it more than beauty.

The Pentagon can not tip over in the pocket. Keeping the upright position at all times permits its finely finished parts to operate with greater uniformity, hence with more constant accuracy. Its Gruen Precision movement, too, represents the Guild's highest standard of timekeeping excellence.

For the retiring official, for the fellow-worker who has been promoted, for the valued employe who is passing a milestone, for the son who has won academic honors, the Gruen Pentagon is now everywhere recognized as the logical tribute.

The Gruen jeweler nearest you can show you the Pentagon pictured here, as well as many others priced from $2500 to $75—including the Paladin model at $250. Consult him about the details of presentation. He can give you valuable help.

"'But this is only the beginning. The "Bohemian Girl" contains a fine melody, "I Dreamt That I Dwelt in Marble Halls." Its middle section is literally transcribed in the corresponding portion of "Yes, we have no," and so on, the only difference being in the time.

I Dreamt That I Dwelt (middle section)

"'Next comes a complete phrase from that good old American song, "Aunt Dinah's Quilting Party," also known by the words of its chorus, "I was Seeing Nellie Home."

Aunt Dinah's Quilting Party

"'And at the end the Hallelujah of Handel once more resounds triumphantly, an everlasting reminder of our unconsciously good taste. "Oh, Bring Back my Bonnie to Me" may be recognized in the closing line; but as this is a conventional ending, the parallel is probably accidental.'"

"DO YOU always collaborate with the same melody writers?" I asked Kahn.

"For the first four or five years I wrote all my songs with my wife, Grace LeBoy, who, as I told you, wrote with me 'Gee, I Wish I Had a Girl.' I could not write with anyone else for a long time; and then one day I met Egbert Van Alstyne, who, as you know, has written many of the biggest song hits this country has ever had: 'In the Shade of the Old Apple Tree' and 'I'm Afraid to Go Home in the Dark,' to mention only two.

"Well, you can imagine that when Van Alstyne asked me to write songs with him, I said I would. And day after day I used to go up and sit in his apartment, and he played tunes for me for three months, and I kept sitting there and thinking—and I was so impressed and awed I couldn't think of anything to write. Finally, I did get started, and among the songs I wrote with him were 'Memories,' and 'Pretty Baby.'"

"Do you know anything about music yourself?"

"Well, when I was nineteen years old I started taking piano lessons. I took two lessons a week—for two weeks—and then my aunt, on whose piano I was performing, moved the piano to another town and ruined my musical career. Since then I took one zither lesson; but it didn't help much either."

"Have you any superstitions about your work? For instance, do you write better with your hat on, or looking out of the window, or at night? Can you work on the train? Do you require a lot of noise, or a lot of quiet?"

Kahn squirmed uneasily! "I have no superstitions."

But his wife chimed in, "Oh yes, you have. Tell him about your titles."

"I certainly won't," said Kahn emphatically.

"Well then, I will," she replied. "Gus tries awfully hard to get titles with six syllables. He believes they are good luck. Our first one had six syllables: 'I Wish I Had a Girl.'"

"Have you ever written any songs that you did not like after they were finished and published?" I inquired, turning back to Kahn again.

"I should say so. I wrote one once called 'So Long, Mother,' that I think is the most terrible song ever written. I prayed that it would not go, and hoped nobody would ever see it, and the darn thing sold nine hundred thousand copies, and I heard it in my dreams. I broke our lease and moved twice because people in the same apartment building sang it, played it and danced to it every day and night."

QUICKSAND! The very word sends a chill down the spine, and conjures up a vision of unsuspecting human beings and animals being sucked under its grayish surface. Next month, J. F. Coleman, for thirty years an engineer in the Mississippi Valley, tells of thrilling encounters with this treacherous substance, which has destroyed mines, wrecked railway tracks, and caused entire cities to sink many feet.

In these articles too you now can have the style and durability you expect in the best of watch cases

YOU have learned to take much for granted in a good watch case. From nothing else do you so confidently expect lasting day in and day out service.

Now you can be just as sure of your belt buckle! Just as sure, too, of the band that holds your watch on your wrist.

For belt buckles and watch bands are now offered by Wadsworth—the same Wadsworth whose watch cases have for more than thirty-five years been the consistent choice of leading watchmakers and importers for the dress and protection of their finest movements.

The Wadsworth Belt Buckle, made in 14-kt. white or green gold filled, can not tarnish. It therefore offers all the beauty of solid gold at only a fraction of its cost.

It is the only gold filled belt buckle which meets the standard approved by the Federal Trade Commission for satisfactory wear in a watch case.

It will not slip. A patented grip locks the belt tight in any position and automatically adjusts itself to any thickness of leather.

Wadsworth Watch Bands, too, are made in 14-kt. white or green gold filled.

Your Wadsworth Watch Band will wear and keep its beauty as long as the watch to which it is attached.

It will add a new note of smartness to your strap or wrist watch. It can not absorb perspiration or discolor the wrist, and will always remain cool and non-binding. It never needs to be replaced for the life of the watch.

Wadsworth Watch Bands and Wadsworth Belt Buckles are to be found at your jeweler's. Ask to see them.

Broadway Comes to Lakewood!

only the air of the theatre? Haven't you labeled them, in your own mind, as vain, jealous, self-seeking? Have you ever thought of them as sharing your own simple, wholesome tastes? You have dreamed, perhaps, of spending weeks in the Maine woods or some other haunt of nature lovers. But would you ever have dreamed of an actor as your ideal of a companion?

I doubt it. Yet, for more than a quarter of a century, there has been no dearth of actors at Lakewood. On the contrary, ten times as many as can be used there are eager to go.

Because of the money reward? Decidedly not! The salaries they receive are so small as to be negligible. They go because they love just what you and I love!

I went to Lakewood myself last summer. I watched the members of the stock company rehearsing in the morning, playing in the afternoon, and play-acting in the evening. I never saw a happier set of people. And the secret of their happiness was that they were combining play and work! The work was just as necessary to their enjoyment as the play was.

HAVING been introduced to this group of figures in the story, let us go back to Herbert Swett, the leading character in it. Here, too, our traditional notions about people are likely to receive a jolt.

Mr. Swett is a business man: a rather stout, rather bald, gentleman, with the crisp, efficient manner of the typical office executive. He can think and talk in terms of dollars and cents.

But a surprising number of these unromantic-looking business men possess a certain unsuspected trait: They sincerely want their business to "show a profit" in something more than dollars and cents. They have their ideals; and they try to bring them into their business.

Herbert Swett is this kind of business man. When he found himself running a street-car line to an amusement park which was really a man-made scar "on the fair face of Nature," he began to work toward his ideal of what such a park might be.

To-day, as you approach Lakewood by the road, you do not see a phalanx of garbage cans. You do not see even the rear of a cheap hotel. Instead, there is a vine-wreathed pergola, through whose white pillars come glimpses of blue water.

That pergola might be said to mark the site of a battle fought and won. When Mr. Swett proposed tearing down the hotel, the suggestion was received with consternation.

What! Tear down something that brought in money? Not much money, to be sure, but a little, nevertheless. Tear it down and put up a pergola, which wouldn't yield a nickel in revenue?

People thought he was crazy. They could not see that order and cleanliness and beauty have an actual cash value.

As time went on, this battle for his ideals was fought again and again. After some years, Mrs. Shepherd, on whose sympathetic understanding he could always count, died. There were other changes in the personnel of his associates. Finally it came to a definite break. As he baldly described it, he was fired.

The situation was not one that would encourage a man to have faith in the ideal he had striven for. But Herbert Swett's faith remained unshaken. With a little backing from friends who shared his ideas, he acquired the traction company property, including the park.

During the previous twenty years, he had accomplished something toward its transformation. Now, with absolute control, he staked everything on his belief that people do want the finer things of life—beauty, simplicity, wholesome recreation, all that stimulates body and mind.

OTHER summer resorts have done some of the things which he is doing at Lakewood. They have horses for riding, links for golfers, a country club for dancing, a tea-house, tennis courts, and dinners, and bridge parties. They, too, have canoeing and sailing and speed-boats. But Lakewood alone has the Lakewood Players! That institution is unique.

Two years ago, the old barn was enlarged and made into a real theatre. There wasn't any too much money with which to accomplish the transformation; not enough to spend on external show, if the interior was to be made comfortable and properly equipped. Outside, it is just a neat white building without architectural pretensions, although this will be changed in time.

But it is a real theatre; and in certain ways it is unlike any other theatre I have seen.

In the first place, it is always open! The doors are not closed, from early in the morning until after the audience has departed at night. All day long, people wander in and out.

The curtain is not down. There is the stage, set for the first act of the evening performance. On either side of the auditorium are groups of windows, with inside window boxes, filled with flowering plants.

These windows, hung with gay cretonne curtains, open into the forest. But I watched the people, as they came and went; and it was not the forest outside that claimed their interest. Sometimes they would sit there for fifteen minutes without saying a word, or speaking only in hushed voices, almost as if in a church.

It may seem a little thing, this keeping the house open during the day; but it is an example of Herbert Swett's instinctive understanding of human nature.

To most of us the theatre, with its tremendous power to influence us, has been quite another world from the one in which we live. Not one person in a thousand ever sees the interior of a playhouse except during a performance.

If a city manager would leave his doors open, as some churches do, and let us go in and out at will, I believe there would come a subtle sense of mutual "belonging" which would bring our world and the world of the theatre much closer together.

To the people who go to Lakewood, this theatre is as accessible as your grocery

For Graduation give an Accurate Watch

There is one gift of which every graduate is inevitably and most justly proud—a handsome watch.

A WATCH has beauty, it has elegance, it has lasting value. But a gift-watch must have two further qualities—accuracy and dependability. And these are the distinguishing characteristics of the Hamilton Watch.

In a fine timepiece, accuracy is indeed the prime requisite. It is the outstanding achievement of the Hamilton—the quality which has won for it the name—"The Watch of Railroad Accuracy." It is, in fact, so accurate that it is preferred by most American railroad men.

The Hamilton Watch has an inherent dependability, too, that justly sets it apart from other watches. If you could see the watch in the process of making, you would realize why this is so. Each tiniest screw and pivot, each balance wheel and spring, is fashioned to that minute precision which insures the accuracy and dependability of the Hamilton Watch.

This smart new Hamilton model with its rigid bow reflects the latest style touch in case design. Green or white filled gold with 17-jewel movement. Price $50

MAY we not send you our two informative booklets, "The Timekeeper," which illustrates Hamilton Watches at prices from $48 to $685, and "The Care of Your Watch"? Address Hamilton Watch Company, 883 Columbia Avenue, Lancaster, Pennsylvania, U. S. A.

HAMILTON offers a splendid selection of 17-jewel thin models in cases of white or green filled gold, plain or chased. The prices range from $48 to $57, with a particularly attractive group at

YOU CAN TRUST THE NAME "SQUIBB" AS YOU TRUST YOUR PHYSICIAN

MORE than a professional man—more than someone with vast experience—your physician is most frequently a friend whose confident advice brings comfort and courage.

And you realize as never before how you rely upon him when you face the first challenge of motherhood and look to him for support.

At that time he may recommend certain medicinal products in order to bring relief and combat conditions. On the purity and effectiveness of those products much will depend. How will you be sure that the articles you buy are the best you can obtain? There is only one way!

Observe the name of their maker, and what it stands for.

There is one name you can trust as you trust your physician —Squibb. For almost seventy years this name has been recognized by physicians, pharmacists, and users of medicinal products everywhere as full guaranty of skill, knowledge and manufacturing integrity.

When you buy any product under the Squibb label, its finer quality becomes immediately apparent. Squibb's Milk of Magnesia is an excellent example. It is perfectly smooth, entirely free from the unpleasant, "earthy" taste of the ordinary product. It is pure, uniform, easy to take and of full strength.

These qualities are the result of years of effort and research directed to the one end of producing a Milk of Magnesia as nearly perfect as skill and science can make it. That is why Squibb's Milk of Magnesia is acknowledged everywhere to be "The Standard of Quality."

Milk of Magnesia is frequently prescribed by physicians to expectant mothers because it neutralizes acids both in the mouth and the stomach, often helps digestion and acts as an extremely mild laxative. If your physician recommends that you use Milk of Magnesia, you will find it well worth while to insist that your druggist supply you with Squibb's.

To help you in selecting other products of distinctive superiority we have prepared a booklet—"What Your Medicine Cabinet Should Contain." This booklet tells you what products you need most often in emergencies. It is authoritative—written and approved by physicians. We will send you a copy free upon receipt of the coupon. E. R. store is to you. They have an everyday intimacy with it. If it wasn't a first-class playhouse they would resent the fact; just as you would resent having to buy your food at an unsanitary market.

It seems to me a fine thing that they should have that feeling. Yet this particular method of achieving the result never had occurred to me until I saw how Mr. Swett has done it at Lakewood.

IN TALKING with me about the Lakewood playhouse, a good many people have spoken of it as a "unique theatrical venture." But if it were only that, I should not be writing about it. To me it seems an extraordinary human *ad*venture.

Over and over again, Mr. Swett has had tempting offers from people who wanted to put in the "jazz" features common in most amusement parks. He refused these offers, even when he sorely needed money to develop his own plans.

He was called visionary and impractical. His ideals were laughed at. To give the best plays in the Maine woods, for instance! How would he foot the bills? Maine was a notoriously bad theatrical state, anyway. Even the town theatres, putting on cheap road shows, had hard sledding.

To all of which, Mr. Swett replied: "Perhaps they have hard sledding because they put on cheap shows. Perhaps Maine is a bad theatrical state because its people want something better than they are offered. I was born and brought up in Maine. I know that I, for one, want the best, in the theatre and in everything else. I have enough faith in the people of my state to believe that they want it too."

We were in his office, which is in one corner of the theatre building, when he repeated this to me. We had been sitting there an hour, talking of his dreams and efforts at Lakewood. The conversation had been interrupted, every few minutes, by telephone calls. They came from Skowhegan, Madison, Augusta, Bangor, Jackman—almost at the Canadian border; from Solon, Bingham, Guilford; from villages too small to dream of supporting a theatre of any kind; even from farmhouses on lonely country roads.

These telephone calls were orders for seats: "bunches" of seats; three, four, five; even one for a party of twenty!

During the performance, the previous night, more than two hundred automobiles were parked under the trees which flank the roadway. After the play was over, it took these cars half an hour to pass, in a steady stream, up the road to the main highway.

There the stream divided and whirled away in three directions. Many of those cars would not reach their destination inside of an hour. Some of them would be two hours or more on the way. Lakewood plays begin promptly at eight and close at ten-thirty. But, even so, it would be early morning before some of the audience would get to bed. And in a region where early rising is more or less of a necessity this means more than it would in a city.

An audience at Lakewood is an interesting slice of life. In it you may see such men as Judge Pattangall, of the Supreme Court of Maine, one of the most brilliant lawyers in the state. He attends every play that is given during the season. Or you may see the head of a great corporation, with a party of guests—important business men from Boston or New York. You will find there "the best people" from the state capital, aristocratic Augusta.

But you will find, also, little groups from the villages "up-river;" people who are hungry for entertainment. What kind of entertainment?

Well, how about "Outward Bound," a play which captivated the critics and other alleged high-brows? These Maine folks packed the Lakewood theatre every night of the week that "Outward Bound" was presented. They liked it so well that they asked to have it repeated. They crowded the house to see "The Green Goddess," "The Boomerang," "The Ghost Between," and other metropolitan successes. They are eager for the best, in plays and in acting; and they appreciate the best when it is given them.

In some ways, the performances at this literally backwoods theatre are better than the New York ones. The company is called a "stock company;" but probably no other stock company can show so brilliant a list of members.

The director is Howard Lindsay, who directed the Broadway production of "The Poor Nut," "Dulcy," "To the Ladies," "The Haunted House," and other successful plays. Any city stock company would jump at the chance of getting Howard Lindsay. He goes to Lakewood instead; simply because he is happier there.

For the same reason, Arthur Byron heads the list of players. With his long and brilliant record on the stage, he is perhaps the star of the company. Stars are supposed to be decidedly "high hat"—jealous of their prestige, insistent on having all the "fat rôles." Yet Arthur Byron, after playing the lead one week, will take a minor part, or even a small "bit," in the next week's production.

That is the spirit of the whole company. It is a splendid example of team-work. No one tries to grab all the glory. In fact, no one wants all the glory, because no one wants to do all the work! That is the understanding; divide the work so that all will get a chance to rest and to play.

The members of the company live in separate bungalows along the lake front; but they take their meals at a clubhouse which Mr. Swett has provided for their use. Here they eat at a common table.

IF YOU could attend one of these plays, you would be amazed to learn that each one is put on after only five rehearsals. This would be impossible if the members of the cast were not experienced actors.

In one case, this was not true. Last summer, "The Old Soak" was given at Lakewood; and the leading rôle was played by its author, Don Marquis, the famous newspaper columnist and writer. It was Marquis's début as an actor; but he gave a wonderful interpretation of the character which he had created.

There is another amazing thing about these Lakewood productions: A new play is put on each week—and the same scenery is never used twice!

If the theatre were in a city, there would be immense storehouses, crammed with scenery, stage settings, and properties which could be rented. But these resources do not exist in the Maine woods! Yet, every single week of the season, the Lakewood stage blossoms out with newly-painted scenery and newly-built settings. Where do they come from?

One morning, in search of the answer to this question, I went "back-stage" to look around. I found myself in a lofty, open space, with a huge canvas leaning against the end wall. It was painted to represent a Spanish interior; and, standing in front of it, was a man in paint-stained overalls.

This man's name is Charles F. Perkins, although it has been genially shortened to "Perk" by his Lakewood friends. I wish I could give Perk a story all by himself. He deserves it. For ten years he has been the scenic artist of this unique theatre; and as a scenic artist he, also, is unique.

Mr. Perkins lives "up at the corners," a group of three or four houses at a country crossroads. Originally, he was a house painter. During the spring and the fall, house painting is still his occupation; but during the summer he becomes an artist, and by no means the least interesting of the unusual features of Lakewood life.

He has had no outside training for that job. He never has been back-stage in a city theatre. He has taught himself the technique of his work. He must paint scenes from various countries and of various historical periods; but there are no art galleries or rich libraries to which he can go for ideas and for accuracy of detail.

When I asked him about this, he pointed to the iron-bound trunk on which I was sitting. His art galleries and libraries were in that trunk! It contained, so he told me, thousands of prints and photographs which he has been collecting for years; scenes from all over the world; streets and houses, exteriors and interiors; mountains and valleys; rivers and lakes and seas.

The day of my visit, he was preparing for the next week's production of "The Squall," a Spanish play by Madame Jean Bart. Incidentally, it was to be the first production of this drama in any theatre. The Maine "back country" was to see it before New York did. The author herself was there. Blanche Yurka and Pedro de Cordoba had come to Lakewood, to be guest stars in the production. A brilliant theatrical première in the heart of the wilderness!

I SAID before that taste and intelligence are not matters of geography. I want to add that talent and ability are not matters of social rank. If you doubt this theory, try it out in your own community. Try it in your civic activities, your school boards, your women's clubs. I have seen it done. And I have watched, with amused satisfaction, the general surprise when some hitherto humble citizen, or obscure housewife, turned out to be a shrewd counselor or to have some unexpected talent.

We talk glibly about "the best people" in our town. But we don't really know who the best people are, unless we give all of them a chance to show their value to the community.

That little sermon was preached to me, back-stage at the Lakewood Theatre, as I talked with Charles Perkins, gray-haired graduate from house painting.

Hanging on the walls were some of the small settings he had made for "The Green Goddess," a play whose scenes are laid in the Himalayan Mountains. I asked him how he, a Maine countryman, could paint these scenes.

"There's more than one way of traveling," he replied calmly. "Some people go all over the world, and see nothing. Some stay at home, and see pretty near everything. If you ain't got imagination, there's no use traveling. And if you have got it, you don't need to travel. I never was any nearer to the Orient than I am this minute. But I can feel what it's like, because I have imagination.

"But you mustn't think I depend entirely on that. I study a whole lot. I've got to be a good many things besides an artist. When I paint mountains, for instance, I got to be a geologist. I want to know how a stratum of rocks would run. I wouldn't want some scientist to look at my scenery, and say, 'That ain't right! Them rocks wouldn't run that way!'

"When we put on 'The Bad Man,' I had to paint scenes out West in the desert, and folks said to me, 'How can you do that, when you ain't never been West?'

"But I could do it, because I know just how that dry, burning heat would feel; and how the sunlight would make blue shadows on the sand. I got to know about air and climate and geography."

He picked up an illustrated magazine, and showed me a scene in Spain.

"For one act in this new play," he said, "I wanted to show, through an archway, a glimpse of distant mountains. I could have painted 'em in just any old way. But I dug up this picture of Spanish mountains. Then I figured out what season it was, the time of day, and what the air would be like, so I could get the right effect."

All this, for a mere detail of one scene, in a play that was to be given one week, in the Maine woods!

WHILE we were talking, other "artists" were at work, each in his own way, to make this one-week production as perfect as possible.

In a separate building, the stage carpenter—another native product—was building the sets under the direction of James Bell, a well-known New York stage manager. Somewhere else, a native seamstress was making the costumes. On the stage itself, a brilliant cast was rehearsing the play. And, in the front office, the man whose vision and whose faith had brought all this about was reserving seats for people from many miles away.

It was an extraordinary bringing together of those who are eager to give the best and of those who crave to receive the best.

I asked one of the playwrights who summer at Lakewood how the audiences there compare with metropolitan ones.

"They are better!" he declared with emphasis. "Among theatrical folks there is a common saying that 'New York is the biggest bunch of rubes in the country.' Here at Lakewood we get the cream of the people for miles around; good old American stock, shrewd and intelligent. It is a joy to play to them. I wish there were hundreds of theatres like this one. It would be a great thing for the American drama and a great thing for the people.

"But that would mean having hundreds of men like Herbert Swett! Men who combine business sense with idealism—and who have the courage to build on that combination.

"Perhaps you haven't noticed one interesting thing about this place. Did you ever before see an amusement park without a policeman, or any kind of officer to preserve order? There is none here, and there is no need of one. The place has no pretensions to luxury or show. But everyone who comes here reacts instinctively to Mr. Swett's ideals of simplicity, quiet, order, and natural beauty. The spirit of jazz can't get in here. He won't let it in. And no one is more grateful to him than we stage folks are. I wish the season lasted six months instead of thirteen weeks.

"When Blanche Yurka arrived, the other day, it was raining; not the best conditions under which to see the place for the first time. But when someone asked her how long she could stay, she drew a deep breath and said, 'I don't know. But if I keep on feeling as I do now, I'll be here until Christmas!' It is that way with us all. We wish we could stay here, resting and playing and working indefinitely."

AS FOR the Maine folks, they echo that wish. They know these actors as Broadway cannot know them. They see them off the stage; Arthur Byron and James Bell in corduroy trousers and flannel shirts, building a sailboat; Howard Lindsay and Robert Hudson and Pedro de Cordoba having afternoon tea at the well-named Acadia Tea House, while a dozen ladies from Skowhegan are enjoying a bridge party in the adjoining room.

Last summer they could see Don Marquis honeymooning there with his bride, Marjorie Vonnegut, the actress. Lakewood visitors learned to know the Kathryn Keys of the stage as Mrs. Arthur Byron; and they saw the two young daughters of Mr. and Mrs. Byron make their début in the Lakewood Theatre.

Nedda Harrigan, daughter of the once famous Harrigan of "Harrigan and Hart," was there with her husband, Walter Connolly, who acted last in "Applesauce." So were Albert Hackett, vacationing briefly from "The Cradle Snatchers;" Dorothy Stickney, Hortense Alden, Estelle Carter, Eric Dressler, Cornelius Van Voorhies, and Sam Wren.

The last-named gentleman performed the duties of publicity representative; and that reminds me of how this publicity has grown. Twenty years ago, the Lakewood plays were advertised in only the two nearby towns, Skowhegan and Madison. Last season they were advertised in one hundred and twenty-five cities and towns!

"We are doing sixty per cent more business this year than last," Mr. Swett told me. "We are just striking our gait now—and it is a gait that goes by leaps and bounds. But the goal isn't going to be changed! It is the same one I had before me all through the years when I could only creep toward it, an inch at a time, as it seemed."

"And that goal?" I asked.

"Well," he said, "I guess I am trying to give people a chance to be healthy and happy; to give them surroundings which will be good for both mind and body. I have staked everything on my belief that people do want what is really fine. I have proved that the people of my own state want it. And although I, naturally, am prejudiced in favor of Maine," he smiled, "I don't suppose we have any monopoly of intelligence. I'd be willing to try this same experiment in any state of the Union."

Present-day dental findings urge the importance of starting early in children the habit of removing film twice daily from the teeth by Pepsodent. Gleaming smiles, the reward of daily care, bring charm and popularity in later life

Mother! Look for Film

Every Day—on Child's Teeth

The film on teeth to which authorities ascribe many of your own and your children's tooth and gum disorders

Send Coupon for 10-Day Tube Free

TEETH and gums are imperiled, say many authorities, by a film that forms on teeth.

Ordinary brushing having failed to combat it effectively, a new way in tooth cleansing has been advised. A way that differs in formula and effect from previous methods. These are embodied in the special film-removing dentifrice Pepsodent.

Now an effective film combatant

By running your tongue across your teeth, you will feel a film; a slippery sort of coating. Ordinary brushing does not remove it.

Film absorbs discolorations from food, smoking, etc. That is why, according to leading dental opinion, teeth look dingy and "off color."

Film clings to teeth, gets into crevices and stays. It invites and breeds the germs of decay. And that is why it is judged so grave a danger to the teeth by authorities.

Film is the basis of tartar. And tartar, with germs, is the chief cause of pyorrhea. That is why regular film removal is urged as probably first in correct gum protection.

Most dental authorities urgently advise thorough film removal at least twice each day. That is every morning and every night.

For that purpose, obtain Pepsodent, the special film-removing dentifrice which leading dental authorities favor. Different from any other tooth paste.

Pepsodent curdles the film, then removes it; then polishes the teeth in gentle safety to enamel. It combats the acids of decay and scientifically firms the gums. It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. And meets, thus, in all ways, the exactments of modern dental science.

On dental advice, people are adopting this new way of tooth cleansing. Obtain Pepsodent, the quality dentifrice, at drug stores. Two months' supply at a moderate price—or send coupon for 10-day tube. Use twice every day. See your dentist twice each year. Make both a habit.

The Thing I'd Like Best of All to Do

FIRST PRIZE

I'm Saving My Pennies for a Trip to the Ocean

I WANT to see the Pacific Ocean! I want to hear the thunder and roar of its great waters; see the surf, the gigantic waves, the tides, the sands. I want to sit on the rocks and paddle with bare feet in the water. I want to don a bathing suit and get into the water. I want to ride in a steamer, a yacht, or a canoe, just so it's afloat. I want to fish with a hook and line for a whale, a crab, or a tadpole, just so I fish. Oh, I want to sit on the sands of the beach and drink in my fill of the ocean!

When I was but a tiny child, a lady gave me a conch shell, and told me its roaring was the roaring of the Pacific Ocean. I spent hours with my ear close to the shell, listening to the story it told me. I dreamed of the sands, and the great waves, and as I grew my dreams grew also. I resolved to see that ocean.

As a country school-teacher, my opportunities were limited, for wages were small in those days. But later, as a farmer's wife, I started the "Ocean Fund" with odd pennies in an old sugar bowl. And it grew.

By and by, sickness came to us . . . the "Ocean Fund" was used to tide us over.

I began again. More years went by. Finally, after much careful financing and repeated sacrifice, I felt the time had come. Everything was in readiness and my trunk was packed.

A telegram came that my aged father, who had gone to spend the weeks of my purposed absence with a relative, was dangerously ill. Doctors, nurses, hospital, operation . . . the old sugar-bowl again yielded up its store.

Have I given up? No! I'm beginning again! There are less than a hundred pennies in the "sugar-bowl bank" to-day, and the silver threads are gleaming thickly in my hair; but if I live long enough, and some new billow does not again wreck the bank, I'm bound for the ocean-wave, to make that dream come true! SECOND PRIZE

I'd Like to Have Another Try at Farming

FOR the past twenty-five years I have been cooped up in an office, doing clerical work, and for the greater part of this time I have known that the thing I'd like best of all to do is farm. I would rather have a two-horse farm of fertile land, in a good location, with two good mules, and enough riding plows, cultivators, and live stock, than be President of the United States.

I have tried several times to gratify this longing by buying small farms, and doing farming as a side line. I have bought five separate farms, and tried to carry out this plan—with no success.

My first venture was in white potatoes. I went into it on too large a scale; and when I had marketed my potatoes, I was just five hundred dollars poorer than when I had planted them. I failed on tobacco and on cotton. Then I had a try at strawberries. Through the advice of inexperienced people, I set out the wrong variety, and lost heavily.

With all the above setbacks, I have just as much faith in farming now as I had at the start, and I am just as hopeful as ever. And I would still rather have a farm than be a Captain of Industry.

Yet I have a hunch that I will have to remain in an office as long as anyone will employ me, and that I will join my fathers without having had a real try at my favorite vocation. L. M. S.

THIRD PRIZE

I Want the Means to Live Up to My Education

THE thing I'd like best of all to do is to draw a comfortable salary check each month. My education has fitted me to enjoy the best in literature, drama, art, music, home-furnishings, and clothes. My school-teacher's salary forces me to accept the mediocre of life's necessaries, and to deny myself almost entirely the pleasures not necessary to mere existence, but vital to balanced living.

I like to work for my living. I like to teach school. I do not ask for luxury. But I would like, best of anything I can imagine doing, to draw a salary out of which I might provide myself with the things I have the ability to appreciate and to use.

I want a modest home furnished in good taste, located in a congenial neighborhood. I would like to afford one good play or concert every week, and sometimes one or two of the better movies. To be able without scrimping to buy one new book each week, and indulge in all my favorite magazines, would be luxury for me. I would like to be able to purchase all the benefit tickets I am asked to buy, without having to deny myself street-car fare or magazines.

I want to be able to make my Christmas and birthday gifts generous. My idea of an orgy of pleasure is to be able to buy more than one dress at a time, without considering whether or not it is appropriate for school. I'd like to entertain friends at dinner as often as I chose, without arguing with my budget. Each summer I covet one trip. Most fervently of all do I wish to put enough in my savings account each month to insure me against the day when I am too old for the schoolroom.

I don't want to be left a fortune. I don't care to marry a rich man. My wildest dream is a salary of four hundred dollars a month twelve months in the year. This means escape from nagging worries, and a reasonable amount of enjoyment through the things that feed and clothe the mind and spirit. B. C.

No half-way verdict — Camel is supreme

THE American people have had many favorites. But there's never been a choice like Camel.

Camel is the most popular cigarette this nation ever had. Millions unite to place it first, and there's no comparison. Camel is supreme.

There must be reasons back of such a preference. There must be mountain-high quality in this famous cigarette to make millions join in saying, "I will have only Camel."

That is true. Camel quality is just as supreme as its leadership. In Camel, no substitute has ever been made for quality. No compromise has ever been made with expense. For Camels, the world's largest tobacco organization buys the choicest Turkish and Domestic tobaccos grown. There simply are no better tobaccos or blending.

If you don't yet know that supreme tobacco enjoyment, try Camels. All the taste and fragrance, all the mild and mellow pleasure you ever hoped to find! We invite you to compare them with any cigarette made, regardless of price.

"Have a Camel!"

Louise Takes Things Into Her Own Hands

deas as her mother. She'd say, "Oh, hank you, we never take coffee at night," hough Mrs. Curley was the only one it ver kept awake. And, "No, I've never earned to swim. We're both awfully fraid of the water." We all got out of the vay of speaking of Louise Curley and her nother, and into the way of pairing them ff together as "the Curleys."

Then we had all begun having babies, nd didn't have time for so many evening parties, anyway. Louise would always be he first one to come to see every new baby. I never knew a human being who vas so crazy about babies. She used to ry to get her mother to adopt one. But Mrs. Curley would laugh and say, "Mercy me, Louise is the only baby I need."

The truth of the matter is that, though Louise was only twenty-six, she had begun to seem a little of an old maid.

It never occurred to any of us that he minded this, till she suddenly began going with Mr. Pawling. We had all thought she was perfectly contented. Contented—why, she must secretly have been getting desperate! When a girl only twenty-six years old begins to go with a baldheaded man who gargles night and morning, and carries his change in a pocketbook, it's a dead cinch that she hates the prospect of being an old maid.

"Do you think Mr. Pawling is really serious?" I asked Dulcie.

"Oh, I don't magine he's proposed, or anything like that yet," she answered; "but he's going to see Louise two and three times a week. And now that his brother has died and left him the other store in Verblen, goodness knows, he's in a position to support a wife. I don't see why Louise shouldn't get him, with half a chance."

"When she's always with her mother, though, she hasn't really got half a chance," I said.

This was perfectly true. As any girl who has ever had the least experience with men knows, there comes a time in every love affair where you've got to be alone in order to do your best work. And, as things were, I realized that Louise would practically never get a chance to be alone with Mr. Pawling.

"I THINK all of us girls ought to help Louise out on that," said Dulcie, turning my silver platter over and beginning to polish the back. "We'd have to do it awfully tactfully, of course, so as not to hurt Mrs. Curley's feelings. But I believe that if we really put our minds to it, we could do it."

"I think so too," I agreed.

And we polished a while in silence, thinking of ways and means. Matchmaking is the most fascinating sport in the world, and almost at once I had an idea. I was to entertain the Christian Endeavor, Saturday night, and the Curleys always went to that. So did Mr. Pawling.

"I'll ask Louise and Mr. Pawling to help serve," I said. "That will throw them together for quite a little while."

"That's a good idea," said Dulcie. "And I'll see that Mrs. Curley is kept entertained in the meantime."

Which we did. I got Mr. Pawling out in the kitchen first and then I called Louise. Mrs. Curley came right along too, saying, "Why, of course, Dotty, we'll be delighted to help you out."

She pinned a tea towel over the front of her dress for an apron, and asked me briskly which plates I was going to use for the sandwiches. I gave Dulcie a wild signal, and she came to the rescue.

She said, "Oh, Mrs. Curley, I've just been dying to ask you about that paper Mother said you read at the Woman's Club. It's—"

I didn't hear the rest, but Dulcie can be awfully flattering when she sets out to be, and the next thing I knew she had Mrs. Curley cornered in the living-room. I set Louise and Mr. Pawling to cutting cake and dishing ice cream and so on, and kept out of their way as much as I could.

REFRESHMENTS, however, can't take forever, and when they were over somebody asked Mr. Pawling to sing. That was unfortunate, because it brought Mrs. Curley right into the picture again, to play for him. Her mother being able to play so well, Louise had never learned.

Mr. Pawling has a very deep voice, which seems downright funny, he's such a mild, wiry-necked little man. He loves to sing, and puffs his chest out like a pigeon and just goes to it. He sang five or six songs before he stopped. Most of Mr. Pawling's songs seem to be tragedies of the sea.

He was booming away on "Davy Jones' Locker" when I happened to glance at Louise. She was sitting there listening, and suddenly—I don't know why—I remembered how we always used to drag Denis to the piano and get him to sing Irish ballads. Mrs. Curley had never had to play any accompaniments for Denis. He could listen to anything once, and sit down to the piano and play it by ear.

I looked at Mr. Pawling, standing up there, looking like a thin robin, booming away, and above his careful, middle-aged bass, I actually seemed to hear Denis's rich young baritone. How could Louise bear to listen to Mr. Pawling, the girl that Denis O'Shea had looked at when he sang,

"The pretty flowers are made for blooming,
The pretty stars are made to shine,
The pretty girls are made for the boys, dear—
And maybe you were made for mine!"

It was suddenly downright spooky, like a ghost in the room, the ghost of Denis O'Shea. Or not exactly the ghost of Denis, either, because he wasn't dead, just married. Goodness knows, I had never been crazy about Denis, so there was no reason why I should have been the one to see his ghost. But always when he had used to sing, it had the queerest effect on me, starting somewhere around the pit of my stomach, where all my great emotions seem to hit me first.

Denis's singing always made you think of spring and moonlight and the man you were in love with, and made it seem queer and glad and tearful and magic, the thought of being married to him, of being with him forever, of having a home, and maybe sometime babies that belonged to you both.

After Denis's ghost, it was considerable of a come-down to wake up and hear thin, bald-headed little Mr. Pawling singing his sad sea songs. Still, in a way, I thought I could understand how Louise was feeling. Feeling that she just couldn't bear to stand by, and see youth and love and life pass her by altogether.

SITTING there, while Mr. Pawling was puffing out his chest and rocking in the cradle of the deep, I took a deep and solemn oath with myself. If Louise wanted a home and babies of her own bad enough to take Mr. Pawling along with them, I, for one, was going to do all I could to see that she got the chance!

This wasn't going to be so awfully easy, I realized; but matchmaking always stimulates me to my very best. Besides, Dulcie and I had told the other girls, and we were all working together.

Evenings, we'd see the three of them together at the movies, just as we had used to see the Curleys with Denis.

Everybody goes over to the Oasis after the movies to get sundaes, and whichever of our crowd happened to be there would loiter around the movie door till the threesome came out. Then we'd maneuver to get up a bunch to go to the Oasis together, and by positively diabolical cleverness, arrange it so that Mrs. Curley would be dragged in at a table with some of the rest of us, and Louise and Mr. Pawling would have to sit by themselves.

Fortunately, the Curleys lived just beyond our house and Dulcie's, so that walking home it was possible for some one of us to walk along with Mrs. Curley, keeping her engaged in conversation, leaving Louise and Mr. Pawling to walk along alone together.

One thing that helped our scheme a lot was the fact that Mrs. Curley prided herself on Louise's young friends liking her just as well as they did Louise. When one or the other of us would ask her to do something alone, or would tell her some little secret or something like that, she would be so flattered that for the time being she'd forget all about Louise.

After all, though, these times were always pretty short. Louise might not have got far with just them. But I had a real inspiration. This was getting Mrs. Curley to play the accompaniments for the chorus of "Betty, Mind Your Step."

The Christian Endeavor was putting on an amateur musical show, and as Mr. Pawling was one of the principals he didn't have to rehearse with the chorus. And, of course, Mrs. Curley was to play for the chorus, so she had to be at all their rehearsals. That left Louise with a lot of free evenings, and though she and Mr. Pawling would always come around afterward to take Mrs. Curley home, they had had three or four hours alone together first.

Things were really working like a charm. Mr. Pawling was at the Curleys' most of his spare time. We were always running into him and Louise together at different places. He bought himself two new suits, and began combing the nine hairs he had left so that they'd cover as much of his baldness as possible. All of us girls were fairly hugging ourselves with pleasure at how well things seemed to be going.

And then—trust Girlie Whittaker to do the one wrong thing at a critical moment—everything changed. We were all walking home from the Oasis together, Louise and Mr. Pawling, a little ahead, I walking with Mrs. Curley. Girlie caught up with us and walked along with me and Mrs. Curley. We hadn't taken Girlie into the scheme, as she's so tactless we hadn't dared.

And to-night if she didn't look ahead at Louise and Mr. Pawling, and then laugh knowingly, and say to Mrs. Curley, "Well, it looks like a wedding in your family."

I must confess that at first I didn't realize what a terrible thing this was to have said. It had never occurred to us that Mrs. Curley would be against Louise's marrying a man as irreproachable as Mr. Pawling, who wouldn't even take her away from Montrose. Why, there wasn't a chance that he would mind having Mrs. Curley live right with them.

But when Girlie said this, we happened to be under a street light, and I saw Mrs. Curley's face. It was startled, amazed. We passed out from under that light and by the time that we reached the next one and I could see Mrs. Curley's face again, it had taken on a new look. Angry, outraged.

It was quite a little way between that light and the next one, and by the time we had walked that distance, and I got another look at her, Mrs. Curley's face had settled into an expression that fairly turned my heart cold. It was a look of hard, set determination.

In that look, I read the truth. It hadn't been Denis alone she had opposed that other time. She didn't mean to let Louise marry anybody, ever. Louise was her chum, and she was going to keep her always, just for herself.

IT WAS a perfect revelation to me. I had never dreamed of a mother being like that. Why, all the other mothers I had known had been like my own: Feeling terrible about losing their children, of course, but not really lifting a finger to hold them back.

I remembered my own mother when Kathie first told her that Elmer wanted her to marry him and go 'way off to Minneapolis to live. Of Dulcie's mother fixing Dulcie's wedding veil, crying over the orange blossoms, and yet insisting gamely all the time that Roger was a fine young man, and she wasn't losing a daughter, she was gaining a son.

Howard Merton's mother. She was a widow too, and Howard was her only son and had been supporting her. But when Howard and Rosie wanted to get married, didn't Mrs. Merton go out and get herself a job in the Minerva Book and Stationery Store, so that she wouldn't be standing in Howard's way!

It was the first time in my life that the idea had entered my head that all mothers—and especially those as nice as Mrs. Curley—weren't like that. Good sports, when it comes to the important things.

As I said, it just turned me cold. I suddenly saw the whole affair of Denis in a new light. Remembered everything Mrs. Curley had done, even her getting sick.

Baked to golden-brown crispness . . . baked to nut-like sweetness this is a food made famous by flavor!

GRAPE-NUTS—a tempting combination of wheat and malted barley—comes to you ready-to-serve. . . . Baked. And baked again . . . Long, slow bakings that bring out to perfection the unique Grape-Nuts flavor. A nut-like flavor, with just a delicate suggestion of malt-sugar. It's delicious! Millions of people eat Grape-Nuts first and foremost because it tastes so good.

Grape-Nuts' remarkable digestibility, too, comes from the long, slow baking. With a minimum of digestive effort, your body benefits by the varied nourishment contained in this food. Dextrins, maltose and other carbohydrates, for heat and energy; iron for the blood; phosphorus for teeth and bones; protein for muscle and body-building; and the essential vitamin-B, a builder of appetite—all these vital elements are supplied by Grape-Nuts. Eaten with whole milk or cream, it is an admirably balanced ration.

Try it for breakfast tomorrow. Two tablespoonfuls of the golden kernels are enough for a serving. Pour cream or whole milk in carefully at the side of the dish, so that the crispness of the food may be retained. Grape-Nuts tempts you to chew thoroughly. Unusual, in this day of soft foods! Your dentist will tell you that the health and beauty of teeth and gums cannot be protected without exercise. Almost all dentists make a point of advising their patients to eat some crisp food every day. Many dentists especially recommend Grape-Nuts.

He made it possible for everyone to be well read

"The best acquisition of a cultivated man is a liberal frame of mind or way of thinking; but there must be added to that possession acquaintance with the prodigious store of recorded discoveries, experiences, and reflections which humanity has acquired and laid up."

Charles W. Eliot

DR. CHARLES W. ELIOT, compiler of the famous Five-Foot Shelf of Books, made an interesting and significant remark.

"I have been surprised," he said "to see how often I myself turn to the Harvard Classics to enjoy pieces of permanent literature, in contrast with the mass of ephemeral reading matter which I am obliged to go through."

Everybody knows that good reading is an essential part of every complete human life.

But how can a busy man or woman know what is the best literature? How can you single out the books that will entertain and benefit you most, when the smallest public library contains enough volumes to keep you reading for fifty lifetimes?

It was this very question that prompted America's greatest scholar to assemble in one set the books that are "the essentials of a liberal education." Dr. Eliot, for forty years president of Harvard University, wonderfully solved your reading problem.

SPECIAL FEATURES of the FIVE-FOOT SHELF

In addition to these priceless writings themselves the Five-Foot Shelf contains special features of great importance. These are:

Lectures and Footnotes

When you turn to the set to read, you will find that every selection is preceded by a lecture in which your attention is called in a most illuminating way to the important facts about the author and his life, how he came to write that particular book, and why you should read it. This is really having university instruction at home, and more than that, by the greatest teacher of one of the greatest universities.

Every one of the 22,462 pages has been carefully edited, and wherever passages involve interesting sidelights, explanations appear at the bottom of the same page.

Easy Reading Courses

In the fiftieth volume Dr. Eliot, out of his wide experience as a teacher, prescribes eleven reading courses. In these he explains the purpose and plan of each course, and gives you an exact list of the titles, with the order in which you should read them, and just where you will find them in the set.

Index to 76,000 Subjects

Here is an absolutely unique feature, the Index Volume of the Five-Foot Shelf. It is the only volume of its kind in existence; over a year of expert work was spent on it. It gives instant access to the most worth-while things that have been written on practically any subject.

To the busy man or woman this index renders a service that cannot be computed in terms of dollars and cents. Long days of search would not bring to hand the wealth of material that can be obtained in a few minutes through this source.

DR. ELIOT'S Five-Foot Shelf of Books

(The Harvard Classics)

This great library contains 418 complete masterpieces of literature, the best thought of the past twenty centuries. And to-day thousands of cultured families in whose private libraries these fifty volumes have a place of honor, are ready to testify to the value of Dr. Eliot's expert guidance.

Every forward-thinking man and woman should know at least something about these famous "Harvard Classics." A handsome free book has been published that tells all about them. It explains how, from his lifetime of reading, study and teaching, Dr. Eliot chose the masterpieces of all time; and how he has so arranged them with Footnotes, Indexes and Reading Courses that anyone may get from them the broad knowledge, the cultural viewpoint that every university strives to give.

And best of all, by the famous Collier plan of paying while you enjoy them, these great books are within reach of all. There's no obligation. Just mail the coupon for your copy of the free book to-day.

Remembered how, though Louise and her mother had always spoken of pneumonia, Doctor Horne had said it had just been a very bad case of grip.

I remembered every detail—the sweet, patient way Louise had taken care of her, looking like a poor forlorn little ghost herself, her lips white, and her face all queer and drawn.

And how, as soon as Louise had torn her own heart out and given up Denis, Mrs. Curley had got better right away, seeming younger and gayer and more blooming every day, excitedly carrying Louise off for a shopping trip to Chicago, and pretending that everything was lovely and happy once more.

And now she was going to do the same thing right over again. I knew it. She'd keep Louise from marrying Mr. Pawling, just as she had kept her from marrying Denis. It was a terrible shock to me to realize that a woman could devote her life to a daughter, and still be a bad mother. But it was true.

I thought of it all that evening, and while I was bathing the babies the next morning. I've been trying to teach the twins to be polite, and when I was lifting Jill out of the tub, she put her fat, damp little arms around my neck, and said:

"I want to give a kith on Mother—pleathe!"

SOMEWAY, it made me think of Louise's always being the first one to come to see the new babies, of her mother's getting old, sometime, and dying and leaving Louise all alone. Without ever having had a home or a husband or her own baby's fat little arms around her neck.

What had been a jolly, social, matchmaking scheme seemed suddenly to me to be almost a holy trust. I felt that it was all up to me. I just couldn't let Louise's life be left so empty.

We girls would all have to get busy now and work quick. The alarm, so to speak, was out. I didn't know how far things had gone with Louise and Mr. Pawling, but I knew that they'd got to be speeded up now.

Someway, I had a feeling that Mrs. Curley would probably not be taken sick until after the musical show was over. She just loves to be in on anything like that. But time was frightfully short. It was only three days now till the show would be pulled off.

I spent the morning trying to think of some dignified, tactful way to hint to Louise that tempus was fugiting and she'd got to work fast. That is a rather delicate thing to get across tactfully to a girl who doesn't know what you are getting at. Besides, I knew her mother would maneuver now so that Louise would never have any time with Mr. Pawling alone.

She was to have this one afternoon though, I happened to know.

"Mr. Pawling's asked us to drive over to Verblen with him to see his store that his brother left him," Mrs. Curley had told us, before she had known what was afloat, Wednesday afternoon.

I had had to think quick.

"Oh, isn't that a shame!" I said. "The girls in the chorus wanted to rehearse their 'Shine On, Moon,' Wednesday afternoon."

The girls hadn't heard of it, of course, but I knew they'd stand by me.

"Oh dear!" Mrs. Curley exclaimed.

Not a before-and-after picture. To show you how loss of hair adds years, the artist has simply sketched a young man with and without his hair.

Your 120,000 hairs . . against Dandruff and Baldness —what chances?

THERE are about 120,000 hairs on your head, if you are dark; 140,000, if you are blond; only about 90,000, if a red-head. And each day you lose from 50 to 150 hairs. If no new hair grew in, in less than a thousand and one nights you'd be bald!

Normally, these lost hairs are replaced by new ones. Yet, dandruff often retards the growth of healthy, new hair; in many cases, almost prevents it.

If you have dandruff, your scalp needs special care with a special soap—such as Packer's Tar Soap—made for the hair and scalp.

The value of pine tar

Practically every well-known authority recommends pine tar soap for shampooing, in the treatment of common hair and scalp ills—especially dandruff.

For over 50 years, leading physicians have prescribed Packer's in the care of the hair, scalp and skin.

With the method below, your scalp enjoys the soothing, healing properties of the Packer pine tar lather. The gland openings are cleared—helped to perform all their normal duties. The scalp regains health and vigor.

The Packer Method

When you wash your hair, do this: Wet the hair with warm water, apply Packer's Tar Soap and pile up the rich, piney lather. With the finger-tips massage three minutes. Rinse. Lather again, repeat the massage, then rinse thoroughly.

In severe cases of dandruff, repeat this every other day for one or two weeks. (In milder cases, every third or fourth day may be sufficient.) Gradually decrease the frequency of the shampoos as your scalp clears. Then keep up the treatments regularly once a week to prevent the dandruff from coming back.

In most cases, this simple method will soon rid your scalp of dandruff and restore your hair's normal, healthy vitality.

Send 10c for Sample and Manual

For 10c (stamps or coin) we will send you a generous sample of Packer's Tar Soap and a copy of our new Manual, "The Care of the Hair." This profusely illustrated 28-page book has recently been re-edited to present the most scientific thought on the care of the hair. It contains dozens of authoritative suggestions for keeping your hair healthy and young-looking. Fill in the coupon, clip and mail today.

"Well, maybe Mr. Pawling can take us some other day."

But, as it happened, Mr. Pawling couldn't, and we girls had fixed it so that we couldn't possibly rehearse any other time. So Mrs. Curley was going to stay, reluctantly, to play for us—after we'd told her how her playing was all that was holding the chorus together at all—and Louise and Mr. Pawling were to drive over to Verblen alone.

I WAS walking home from rehearsal a little after five. Mrs. Curley was still back in the Sunday-school room, going over the "Darkling lie the shadows" with the altos.

I was walking slowly, it was such a heavenly spring day. It had been raining, but it had stopped, and the twilight was so sweet and fragrant it almost brought tears to your eyes. Little drops hung on the purple lilac bushes; the forsythia was out, gay and yellow, in every yard; there was that sweet spring smell of the earth—gardens that had been freshly plowed.

As I came in sight of the Curley house, I saw Louise coming down the porch steps alone, and all my anxiety was suddenly over. At the first glance I had of her face, I knew that our job was done. We wouldn't have to manage Mrs. Curley any longer; we needn't have anything more to do with the affair. As far as our part was concerned, the deed was done. Louise—there was no mistaking the look on her face—had taken affairs into her own hands.

In that one afternoon, something magic had happened to Louise Curley. She wasn't any longer the quiet, dull, almost elderly girl who had gone to Women's Club meetings and worn clothes just like her mother's.

Her cheeks were simply flaming, her eyes fairly shone out light. She was breathing in queer, half-gasping little breaths that kept her scarlet lips a little bit apart. Young—she was as young as the yellow forsythia. And lit up like a Christmas Tree.

At first, though she saw me, she didn't seem to be going to stop. Then she apparently thought better of it, and came toward me, half running.

She caught my hand tight, looking right into my eyes.

"Listen, Dotty, you girls all like Mama—be as sweet as you can to her, won't you?"

"Of course we will, Louise," I promised.

Then I noticed the suit case she had in her hand. It was big and it must have been heavy; but she carried it as lightly as though it were a flower or a flag.

"Louise," I gasped, scarcely daring to believe my eyes, "you're eloping!"

"Yes," she said; "I've got to. I can't help myself. I gave it up once, and I can't again. I've got to!"

Got to—why she was like a shining bit of steel being drawn to a magnet. Shining! I felt suddenly queer and shy about looking into her eyes. It was all there, the way the Irish love songs always make me feel.

"You'll all be sweet to Mother, won't you? I'm so sorry to be doing it to her." Her eyes filled with tears, but they were a queer sort of tears. It was as though fire were shining through them, like the sun on the dripping forsythias.

"I—I hope you'll be awfully happy, Louise," I said awkwardly.

There didn't seem to be anything you could say to anyone so unearthly radiant.

She leaned over and kissed me. Then, catching up her suit case, she ran away down the avenue. The heavy bag seemed fairly to float along beside her. It was as though she were flying.

I stood for some little time, just looking after her. We'd put it over. There was no doubt of that. But little had we known what we were putting over. I felt as though we had been thinking we were making bread pudding. And all the time we had been making angel food.

It was breathless, and so sweet it hurt, like the smell of spring in the twilight. I felt that, for a moment, I had been looking at a flaming miracle.

Love is certainly the strangest thing in the world. I finally pulled myself together and started on home, to put the cereal on for the twins.

"And just to think," I thought to myself, amazed and incredulous, "of feeling like that about a man who gargles!"

IT WAS nearly ten o'clock that night when Dulcie called me up. She was as excited as I had been.

"What do you think of Louise Curley?" she exclaimed breathlessly.

"Words simply fail me," I said.

Will snorted from the wing chair.

"'S the first time they ever have!" he said, trying to be funny.

"Mr. Pawling just didn't know what to make of it," Dulcie went on excitedly. "He stood around in Verblen waiting for her for nearly three hours."

Wasn't that just like Mr. Pawling, to let a girl come on home alone to get her suit case?

"And to think that she just ran into him in the street! And that he was leaving this very night!" Dulcie exclaimed. "And it all happened like a flash—he'd been visiting his married sister in Verblen, you know."

I didn't even know that Mr. Pawling had a married sister in Verblen.

"It certainly knocked the breath right out of me," said Dulcie. "I hadn't even heard that his wife had died, three years ago."

"His wife!" I exclaimed, now completely befuddled. "Why, Mr. Pawling has never been married!"

"Well, for heaven's sake!" Dulcie said. "Who's talking about Mr. Pawling?"

There was a moment's silence, while I tried desperately to make sense out of what I was hearing. Then—

"Oh," said Dulcie, "you haven't heard!"

"Yes, I have," I insisted, puzzled, but persistent. "I saw Louise just as she was leaving."

"Louise Curley," said Dulcie, in that excited, complacent tone of one who is the first to tell amazing news, "Louise Curley was married in Verblen at half past six—to Denis O'Shea!"

We haven't really got over it yet. It is the most exciting, romantic thing that has ever happened in Montrose. It is like a fairy tale. They caught the flyer for New York that night, and sailed on Monday for Buenos Ayres. Louise Curley, who had never been farther from home than Chicago and Grand Rapids! I shall never forget her flying down our prosy street as though she were on her way to heaven.

The real joke, though, is on all us girls.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

We expected to have to nurse Mrs. Curley along for months or years. In spite of how I felt about her as a mother, I was really awfully sorry for her, and we girls agreed to do all we could to keep her from being too unhappy.

And then, we didn't have to do a single thing!

Less than a month after Louise had left, Mrs. Curley married Mr. Pawling. I shall never know just what the truth is, but Mrs. Curley, at least, is perfectly sure that he had been coming to see her, all along. And for all I know, maybe he was. If he was, goodness knows, the way we pushed him off onto Louise furnished opposition enough to make any courtship a success.

"I could never have married, though, if Louise hadn't," she told Mother Horton. "It would have left Louise too terribly alone. You see, we've always been so close. Just like sisters!"

I swear that it's completely cured me of matchmaking, though Will says when I'm through with matchmaking I'll be through with breathing. That is as it may be—you never can foresee how you're going to be tempted.

But there's one thing I'm sure of, absolutely, cross-my-heart, hope-to-die sure. That is, that I shall never stand in the way of the twins' love affairs.

Even Jack can marry anybody he wants to. Though, of course, I can't help hoping earnestly that, for all her money, it won't be that Scoggins baby with the adenoids!

How Do You Get That Way?

hands, and become extraordinarily proficient in the use of their toes.

Can you make an arrow head? Can you make fire with two sticks? Can you shin up a tree? Can you walk a tight-rope? Can you skate? Can you dance the Charleston? Can you conjure rabbits from a plug hat? Can you juggle seven kinds of things at one time?

To one question you say, "Yes," to another, "No." Why "Yes" to this and "No" to that? "I learned this. I didn't learn that. I never tried to make an arrow head, or fire with two sticks, or juggle, or walk a tight-rope. I never learned to skate on ice, because I grew up in Florida. I can't dance the Charleston—or any other kind of dance; my parents wouldn't let me learn."

You learned thousands of complicated bodily movements. You trained your motor mechanism to fit you for your walk in life. But your "walk" in life was not predetermined the day you were born. Let us say you are a carpenter. You were not destined to be a carpenter when you were born, and you don't have to remain one if you don't wish to.

While you were growing up, your motor mechanism could have learned anything anyone has ever done with a normal body. The specific ways into which you organized your manual behavior depended upon the specific patterns set for you by the home, school, and society in which you were trained.

That well-groomed look of cleanliness which successful men must have

YOU may think that your face is clean. You may wash and scrub it often—but remember this! You live in an atmosphere permeated with dust and dirt. You can see it in any sunbeam. Every motor car that passes pours out a trail of unseen grimy vapor. Every breeze stirs up dust. The U. S. Weather Bureau estimates that there are 117,000 dust and grime particles in every cubic inch of city air.

Some of that grime alights upon your face. It clings. It sticks. It becomes imbedded in the skin. You can't wash it off. You can't scrub it off. It stays there and gives you that leathery, half-clean look of the man "who looks his age."

Yet you can keep clean. You can bring back that glowing, ruddy, healthy look of the successful man. It is easy. It takes just a minute or two, right in your own home. After shaving, use Pompeian Massage Cream, instead of ineffectually dousing your face. You can actually see imbedded dirt roll out. You will be surprised to find how soon that glowing, healthy look of cleanliness comes back to your face.

You will have that heart-warming, glorious, feeling that—by gosh! you really are clean.

Make this convincing hand test free!

Wash your hands thoroughly. Dry them. Rub a little Pompeian Massage Cream into the back of your hand until the cream first disappears, then comes out again. Notice this—the cream goes in pink and comes out black! The black is dirt that you could not remove by washing. Now use this pleasant massage cream every day to give your face that clean and healthy look of the successful man. 60c at all drug stores.

The time and the money you save by stropping your blades will surprise you

A NEW blade stropped on a Twinplex is much sharper than just a new blade. It will shave you much more quickly.

Strop it each time before you use it and it will last for shave after shave. The saving in blade money will total dollars before the year is over.

Consider this—

"Have been an enthusiastic user of the Twinplex since I was first introduced to one during the 'Big Fracas.' We had one in our squad while over there and, believe me, it was a life saver. As soon as I came home I bought my Twinplex and since then I have used but one package of blades. Have the last blade in the stropper now and expect to use it for some time to come. I shave every morning and the old 'bristles' are as tough as any of 'em." (Signed)

F. J. Sheehan, Chicago, Illinois.

You can imagine how much his saving in blades has amounted to. As for the improvement in the shave, here's your chance to see for yourself.

Stropped NEW Blade Free

Name your razor and we'll send you, free, a NEW blade stropped on a Twinplex. We would like to show you what real shaving is.

All dealers are authorized to sell you a Twinplex on 30 days trial. If after four weeks of marvelous shaving you are willing to forego the comfort and economy you have enjoyed, give up your Twinplex and get back your money. If you can't find the model you want, write us.

Twinplex Stroppers

These may not be the ways you now desire; but, lacking understanding by your parents, or without any definite goal of your own to determine your course of action, you took the path of least resistance and responded to your environment. But you don't have to remain what you are to-day just because you've been trained that way.

At the same time that you were learning to use your motor mechanism for specific purposes and in specific ways, you were also learning to use your voice mechanism. You learned to talk. What language? English, the language of your parents, of the human beings who brought you up. You could just as easily have learned Chinese, or Choctaw; all languages sound alike to the newborn.

By the time you left school you had not only learned to speak English but to think in English. You knew several thousand words. You knew their meanings and you had acquired ways or habits of using them. You learned to respond to words and to situations with words. By the age of ten, you could cross Asia with Marco Polo, the seas with Magellan, the Alps with Napoleon—with words. You could explore the world, conquer the world—with words.

You did not always speak the words: you learned to speak them to yourself, to think them and see them. If you got in the habit of doing great things only with words and doing little things with your motor mechanism, you became a day-dreamer and built your castles in the air. It will not be easy for you to abandon these "thinking habits" for "doing habits," and convert your longings into realities. You may think the most glorious story ever conceived—it is what gets into the film, or on to the printed page, or into action that counts. The ways you have organized your verbalized behavior form part of your personality.

MEANWHILE, you were also learning specific emotional habits—to fear, to hate and to love—and you were organizing them into emotional behavior.

Now, it is important that hunger, pain, fear, anger, love, should move you. They are enormously useful emotions. Without hunger you would not eat, and without food you die. Without love you would not mate, and your strain would die with you. And unless you can be moved by fear or anger you cannot flee or fight for your life. These emotions move you; that is why they are called emotions.

And the collar-buttonish things that can send you into a towering rage, or scare you out of your boots! A clock enrages you because it will not stop cuckooing; you throw a shoe at it. A mirror enrages you because it reflects a distorted countenance; you are afraid to smash it!

Afraid! What or whom were you afraid of at birth? You had an inherited fear response to just two situations: a loud noise; falling or being dropped. A flash of lightning did not scare you; a clap of thunder did. By and by the mere flash scared you and made you jump, even though you could not hear the thunder. The banging of a door scared you. Your fears became specific; conditioned fears, they are called.

Who or what made you mad when you were a babe? But why should a babe be angry at anybody or anything—it has loving parents to care for it until it can learn to distinguish friend from foe? But suppose its parents were not loving, suppose they resented another mouth to feed. Well, you certainly knew nothing about this at birth; you could not distinguish your father from the physician, or your mother from your nurse. If your nurse fondled you and your mother pinched you, you learned to love your nurse and hate your mother.

You squirmed with anger when your limbs were pinioned and your movements restrained. And why not?

Your inborn capacity to rage at restraint, to fear noises and falls and to love the hand that fed and fondled you, developed into an individual repertoire of specific likes and dislikes, fears and hates, disgusts and aversions. You learned them—as a child almost unconsciously. They became your emotional habits, and formed your attitudes and conditioned you for or against thousands of persons, things, situations, words, phrases, nations, times—yes, and life and death.

YOU probably started to school when you were six years old. What had you been doing up to that sixth year? Unless you understand the significance of those pre-school years, you fail to get the big idea of this article. Our forbears knew the idea, and expressed it cleverly in the adage: "As the twig is bent the tree is inclined." What they did not know was just how true that adage is, and all the misery and misunderstanding that follow from it. They went on bending twigs "in the way they ought to grow;" that is, like themselves.

The world into which children were born kept changing; but children were still bent in the same old way. By the time the child was ready for "school" it already had the habit of being afraid of a thousand and one specific persons, things, and situations not necessarily fearsome at all. The child had likewise formed innumerable dislike habits. It was all right for our early ancestors in their arboreal tenements to be afraid of the crash of a falling tree or the thunderbolt. But the child who hides under the bed during a storm will never become a young Ben Franklin, on speaking terms with lightning.

Well, you might say, it isn't my fault I am as I am to-day. I'm the product of my parents and my environment. That's true enough. It is up to parents to give their children a good set of habits; but if your parents have been remiss you don't have to remain a bad-tempered person, a coward, or a shrinking, sensitive soul. You can force yourself to change; you can break the mold that imprisons you and form a new set of habits.

Stop a minute and make a list of the things, people, and situations you are afraid of. Ditto for hate and dislike. Then ask yourself whether these specific things, people, and situations are really fearsome or really hateful? For each item on the list put this question to yourself: Why do I like this thing? Why do I hate that person? Why am I afraid of this situation? You dislike many ideas—and have no real reason for such dislikes. Pressed for an answer, you probably reply, "Well, I just don't like them!"

And so I say again, you were not born with a list of specific likes and dislikes written into your very nature, nor with bents or inclinations to talk a particular language, or play this or that set of games, nor with a capacity to engage successfully in any given trade or calling. You were born with a capacity to learn anything, and do anything. The society, the community, and the family into which you were born demanded in varying tones, and with varying rewards and punishments, that you grow up the way they thought you should grow.

UNLESS you understand the difference between your inborn capacity to learn and the things you actually learned, you will never become a first-class psycho-analyst of yourself. Understand this difference, and you can remold yourself to your heart's desire.

If you were "all there" at birth, you had all the equipment for learning and all the capacity to become intelligent that any human being ever had. You required no habits, no instincts, no innate tendencies for any special job, pursuit, or profession, and had none. But you could learn. What you learned in Hebron, Ohio, in 1927, A. D., was not what you would have learned in Hebron, Palestine, in 1927, B. C. Human nature does not change; human society does change. If you could not have formed habits as an infant, you could never have become a child. The congenital idiot never learns to behave like a human being; it remains an idiot, because specific parts of its habit-forming machinery were left behind.

Anything well learned is easily done and long remembered; it becomes a habit. You learned how to dress yourself; you learned it so well that you never forgot it. You do not recall the countless movements you went through this morning in the act of dressing; and yet they were infinitely complex and difficult.

From the day you were born you began to learn the specific lessons taught you by the hands that rocked your cradle and the hands that fed you. You were a clean slate on which these nurturing hands could write. Most of what was written on that slate during your early years cannot be easily wiped out—your basic habits were formed. But you can still do an infinite amount of changing and molding.

When you became a "personality" you acquired "character." You organized your innate capacity for human behavior along the specific lines of behavior of certain human beings. And having formed certain habits, you had time to learn new things. The fundamental difference between you and an ant is that an ant is born wise, and has nothing to learn; you were born ignorant and could learn anything.

A practical question often arises: A childless couple wish to adopt some orphan of unknown and possibly worthless parentage. Dare they take the chance? Will not the child of worthless parents inherit immoral tendencies?

The answer to this question is "No." A normal, healthy child inherits nothing save its physical characteristics, a certain glandular mechanism, and a capacity to learn. You were not born with habits of cleanliness, decency, modesty, thrift,

Here comes the GROOM!

PAINTS & VARNISHES

stinginess, niggardliness, avarice, selfishness, politeness—none of these habits came with you or any other human being at birth. You were born naked and unashamed; you may be two, five, or ten years in learning to be ashamed of your nakedness. Brought up in one of the Solomon Islands, you will never learn to be ashamed of your own or any other human body; but you would learn to feel undressed if you did not have your nose pin on.

To the infant, nothing matters but food, freedom from noxious stimuli, and freedom from restraint. Its growing body is a tremendous transformer of energy—it demands action and more action. The tirelessness of children! It is inexhaustible. The insatiable curiosity of children—about everything they can get their hands or eyes on! But mothers want rest and fathers want peace. "Don't!" they say. "Stop! Drop it! Put it back! Let it alone!"

Parents and aunts and uncles, and grandparents and brothers and sisters, are all bent on forcing the child this way and that way—"So that folks will not be ashamed of you," or, "Will be proud of you." The child learns to meet these demands, to adapt itself to circumstances: by honesty or by lies, by smiles or by screams. And rest assured that it is just as easy to teach any child to be self-reliant, honest, unselfish, polite, and fearless, as it is to teach it to be a sniveling coward or a selfish little beast.

Why? Because every child can be infuriated, scared, punished, starved. It can also be fondled, bribed, coaxed, and soothed. To put it another way: It has various specific mechanisms which can be shocked into action of various kinds. After being shocked a few times a spark suffices to set them off.

These childish habits can make or mar for life. Hence their importance. Many an adult never gets far on any road because he learned to carry all his troubles to his mother. She encouraged him. He never learned self-reliance. Many an adult fails because as a child he never formed the habit of getting along with playmates. He never learned to be a good sport, to play fifty-fifty, to take a joke, to play the game through.

I DO know that the forces which make or mar us are infinitely numerous, and that we are infinitely complex. Every human being, young or old, is meaningless except as viewed against the background of these forces. And these "forces," I admit, include glandular mechanism, which is inherited and always varies in infinitesimal amounts, and which may at any moment of a human's life so change as to change outlooks, bents, likes, and dislikes. But these are the forces which can and must be studied and recognized, and vested with power to mold personalities.

To say you are what you are because your ancestors were what they were is to deny the evidence of our eyes, and is without any ground of biologic support. Your ancestors have been talking for I do not know how many thousand years; give me a newborn child, and in ten short years I can have him so scared he'll never dare lift his voice above a whisper, or so brave that he'll fear nothing.

The hypothesis that you get that way use that way was predetermined for at birth is an untenable hypothesis; hypothesis that you can learn any way nable, is biologically sound, and can nade to work.

rests on a firm foundation of experi- t and observation which can be stated gorically, thus: No form of behavior, rait of character, no tendency toward ific ability to learn or acquire any ific way, form, kind, or degree of an behavior, has ever been definitely ed to be innately related to any color kin, shape of head, convolution of n, size of brain, form of face, or any r inborn physical trait of any normal an being.

Only with learning do marbles, , tops, drums, and so on, and so on, e to have value in the child's eyes; t can it get out of them, what can it with them? And it is up to the parents ee that the child gets the proper pective.

one household, the reading of books the child parental smiles; in another, on the banjo or at the piano, or in the en, woodshed, or garden.

ong before the child can talk it has ned various specific ways of getting ts. With speech come additional s. And when to action in motor and ch mechanism there is added a reper- of emotional reactions, the child has far in acquiring an assortment of oons which will keep the family on the o. Later in life, tantrums and con- ion fits may be of no avail. And even e adult gives no overt sign of inward , tantrums, or tears, these emotional tions will consume energy better spent a sober tongue or calculated action hands and feet.

mistakes and taking chances, and finally become a good player. That means that you have trained your hands and voice to play the game, and your emotions to keep quiet while you are playing, so that you can give all your attention to the game. Bridge becomes a habit—bad, if you play it when, for any one of a hundred reasons, you should be doing something else that is essential or important.

How many bad habits have you? Do not resent this question: a candid answer to it will do more than anything I know to help you get new and better ones. Probably the commonest of all bad habits is sheer inability to live at peace with one's self and one's family. Have you ever lost a job because you could not measure up to it with your hands or your voice or your head? Rather is it not because you could not get along with somebody? Too much mustard or vinegar?

You are, say, a "shark" at detecting fraudulent checks and counterfeit money; you have all the ways of an ideal bank teller. All but one: You cannot be civil to the president or polite to customers. And are promptly and properly fired.

Being fired may be the very incentive you needed. Having given hostages to fate in the form of a wife and baby, you are driven to look the situation over—in words. That is what words are for, to manipulate the universe from a chair, or a bed, or while fishing. You play and resolve—with words. You arrive at a decision. But what is of more consequence is the way you go about getting results out of that decision, so that you and your wife and your baby can eat the results. Many a man to-day is president of this or that concern because of some particular time he was fired, or fell in love, or was presented with an heir.

SPECIFICALLY, then, you can change your ways when—and only when—you have defined your problem and got the drive behind it; that is, when you have decided just what way you want to be and where you want to go. You must do your own psycho-analyzing. It is literally true that there is no help like self-help, and the first step in self-help is to know yourself. Take stock of yourself. And remember that you are in your own hands now; you are your own trainer. But you cannot train yourself to do new tricks if you cannot make yourself try the trick once. It is the first lesson that is the hardest. After a few lessons it becomes as easy as pie: it is a habit; and a bad habit, if it enslaves you.

You are an actor on a specific stage. Can you get more out of your part, can you qualify for a bigger part?

You play a speaking or a manual labor part, or, more likely, a part which combines action in both voice and motor mechanisms. The school-teacher's part is largely verbal; the farmer's, manual; the stenographer's, about equal parts of verbal and manual. You require no expert to tell you whether you are fitted to play a verbal or manual rôle, or one which combines both.

How skillfully do you play your part? How well do you know your world of words or your world of objects, and how well can you manipulate it? Can you play the piano or the typewriter or tennis or golf, or drive a car, or wash dishes, or tread the maze of crowded streets, or manage a home or an office or a desk, easily, efficiently, without sweat and fret and emotional strain? In brief, like a habit?

Can you use words as tools, as building blocks, as structural plans? Can you build serviceable structures with them, structures which get results, which sell your wares, which carry your ideas to your listeners or to your readers, which manipulate the past and present, and design a future which can be translated into reality?

If not, why not? If your manual or verbal ways are not getting you where you want to go, what is the trouble? Lack of skill? If so, can you by practice become more perfect? Or are you on the wrong track?

As a rule, you have to convince yourself before you can convince anyone else. You must put your heart into your part. If you do not love your rôle, or love somebody or something so well that love drives you, you cannot put into your part half as much energy as you might. Fear may enable you to beat a bull to a fence, and hatred to build a spite fence, but love—of home, of wife, of children, of fellow men, of fair play, of decency, of honor, of adventure, of victory, of country, of immortality—leads to real achievement.

You have become so complexly organized that you will often find yourself pushed to determine the driving force behind your actions, or even behind any specific act. Your "reasons" are likely to be "I like," or, "I don't like." The real reason will be that your actions or specific acts are driven by your visceral and emotional habits.

You may so love your wife that a hateful rôle seems good because of the contents of the envelope on Saturday night. But hating a rôle and playing it well is about as difficult as eating a pie and keeping it—and very few people can do it. The microbe hunters who have everlastingly obligated the world to them so loved their work that they forgot to fear poverty and death.

Apart from the technique or skill that you put into your rôle in the play of life, the only important factor is how well you have organized your "drive." If fear has become the dominant factor in your life, your way is indeed narrow and your horizon shut in. Some people are so dominated by fear that they cannot speak above a whisper or take a deep breath. Their birthright of curiosity to know everything and impulse to do everything stagnates in the bottom of a deep well.

Love and fear are incompatible bedfellows and the union is never happy for anyone, or fertile in socially useful action. Less abject and despicable than fear is hatred, but fatal to more people. They are true twins, spawn of ignorance and brutality. They do more to wreck homes and despoil the earth than famines and plagues.

If your way seems to lead nowhere, try to find out what holds you back. If the rôle you play gets no hand, try to discover wherein your performance has failed. Get a bigger drive into it, or, if you cannot put your soul into it because you hate it or fear it and cannot master your hate or fear, change to another rôle, one you can put your soul into. But into it you must put some drive. Without love, the stage of human affairs loses its main drive and its only creative force.

Love does rule the world, or will when it has fewer fears, jealousies, and hatreds to compete with. You will probably find it impossible to love your enemies; but you can help make it possible that the coming generation hates fewer enemies.

You can do that as you grow old. Your joints may stiffen and your manual habits—of whittling, of golfing, of driving a car—will drop out one by one. But you will be able to talk. And talk is cheap—it requires but little energy. And even less to talk to yourself—thinking is cheaper than talking. As long as you can think without fear and without hatred you can think new thoughts, and keep on remolding the world to your heart's desire. But if you cannot think without your childish hates and fears you may know that you are old and set.

YOU are what you are to-day because you were what you were yesterday—and all the preceding yesterdays back to the day you were born. You can become something different to-morrow by forcing yourself to be something different to-day. It is the here and now that counts to-day. There are fearsome things in this world: disease, ignorance, stupidity, intolerance; they should not be run from, nor should they cause the cheek to blanch; they should be faced boldly, as hateful things to be removed from the earth. Fear to face the facts of life and resentment against those brave enough to face them have led individuals and nations to physical indigestion and moral stagnation.

The brave have often paid for their courage with their lives. That was a great price; but because they dared—and paid—you face a more open world, not as free as it should be, but never before so free to applaud the record-breaker, enrich the inventor, and welcome home the explorer from his conquests over the unknown; above all, never before so free to say to any and all: "Your way is not my way; but if it satisfies you, if it gives you joy and health and happiness, be on your way, and God be with you."

Which is the better way? One must be brash indeed to say. But I think we can agree that any way is good that is open and marked by sign posts which will keep bugbears and gray wolves and hell fires out of the way of children. I say again that the hypothesis that you can learn any way is tenable and biologically sound; it represents possibly the greatest law of nature yet discovered by science; its application can revolutionize human behavior and give the coming generation a chance to get better returns on their capital than we who are set in our ways can ever hope to get.

A QUESTION which never grows stale is, "Shall a woman forsake her job or profession when she becomes her husband's wife?" Next month, in "I Gave Up My Law Books for a Cook Book," Lucy R. Tunis tackles the affirmative side of this question in an extremely diverting fashion. This is not only an article of vital interest to women; it will be a revelation to men.

"Boys Will Be Scouts"

Then came an experience that would have embittered most people for life. A severe, intermittent pain would suddenly catch him in the knee. Perhaps, because of added strain or nervousness, it came most frequently when the children were to start work at their daily tasks. The teachers and employees of the institution thought he was shamming.

A Mrs. Harrison Dingman had promised Mrs. West during her final sickness that she would try to keep an eye on Jimmy. Occasionally she visited him at the orphanage. On one of these visits she found him suffering intensely. Three times that day he had been whipped for his "pretended" pain. Mrs. Dingman was horrified. Before she left, she made the orphanage authorities promise that there would be an immediate examination.

The doctors hurried Jimmy to a hospital at once. They found that he had a tubercular trouble, known as "white swelling," that caused intense pain in his hip and knee. For the next year and a half he remained at the hospital, most of the time strapped flat on his back. But the disease was too far along to effect a cure. His was a "hopeless case."

Hard years followed at the orphanage. Jimmy felt that no one wanted him. That was even harder to bear than the physical pain. The final drop of bitterness was added when he was put in with the girls to learn to sew.

But in learning how to use a needle he stumbled onto one of the first steps in the long ascent that lay before him: Activity. Work. Jimmy West's needlework gave him something to do. It kept him from brooding.

"Eventually," he told me, "I began to acquire faith in myself. In time, I said, 'I might be able to work my way up with my hands.'"

ANOTHER broadening influence came into his life when Mrs. Ellis Spear, wife of the United States Patent Commissioner, fulfilled a promise made long before to his mother and, like Mrs. Dingman, came to see him. She brought him a toy ox-cart that her own children had played with. A gift! Affectionate interest! The very loneliness of the little cripple's heart made him feel all the more deeply this first contact with loving kindness.

Through books that Mrs. Spear lent him came a new realization. It would not be enough to develop only manual dexterity. To the development of his muscles he must add the development of his mind. There was a small library, long unused, at the orphanage. He got the matron to open it, and let him read. Best of all, he secured permission to go to school! Not the limited orphanage school, which gave only a rudimentary knowledge of reading and writing, but public school, where he could associate with boys and girls from real homes with real fathers and mothers! That was when he was twelve. He started in the fifth grade.

By the time he was fourteen, Jimmy

What has dandruff to do with blood-poisoning?

ONLY this. Blood-poisoning is a germ-disease. And dandruff is a germ-disease. At least, that is what many authorities now state. And with the rapid progress of medical science in the study of bacteria, more and more germs are constantly being identified. Some are associated with deadly typhoid, diphtheria and lockjaw. Others simply annoy, such as dandruff and noxious body odors.

By this finding a single cause for so many ailments, science opened the way for the next step—finding a single means of prevention. And science itself has now taken this step and produced Zonite, the great germicide-antiseptic. Never before has there been an antiseptic of so wide a range—an antiseptic so powerful that it actually stamps out disease-germs, yet so harmless to human beings that it can be held in the mouth. And yet it is the boast of Zonite that it does just one thing. It kills germs.

First coming into public notice as the Great War Antiseptic, it was natural that Zonite should be thought of as a preventive against blood-poisoning in cases of cuts and wounds. In the Allied hospitals in France infection of wounds was reduced over 70 percent by the use of this new and wonderful kind of germicide. But the uses of Zonite have now spread far beyond the dreams of the days behind the Allied front. Mouthwash, gargle, blisters, baby rash, bad breath, manicure, insect bites, enema, shampoo, feminine hygiene, corns, poison ivy, artificial teeth, purifying drinking water—these suggest a few of its services to the family.

Powerful, yet safe

Previous to the discovery of Zonite there were two classes of antiseptics—some poisonous and caustic like carbolic acid, and others weak and ineffective like peroxide of hydrogen. Zonite can be used for the throat and nose like peroxide and yet it is actually far more powerful than any dilution of carbolic acid that can be used on the body.

Hence, Zonite represents an entirely new idea in all-around antisepsis. Harmless to human beings; fatal to germs.

"Loyalty is one of the finest characteristics,"

Theodore Roosevelt

THERE is no stronger, or truer, form of loyalty than that of a son to his father.

Of course, you will remember your father on the day set apart to show respect to fathers.

SUNDAY, JUNE 19
IS FATHER'S DAY

Good shops everywhere are showing a pleasing assortment of Father's Day Cards, expressing the very thoughts of love and respect you want to convey.

The year is full of occasions in the lives of those we love when the sending of a message of remembrance, congratulation, praise, encouragement or sympathy is the proper thing to do. There is a suitable Greeting Card for every occasion.

Scatter Sunshine with Greeting Cards

West was more or less of a leader at the orphanage. He had long outgrown the sewing-room. Other children, healthier and stronger, were "bound out," so it fell to the crippled boy to take charge of his younger companions. For a time he had sixty boys in his care. Besides looking out for the children and carrying on his own school work, he did the laundry work for the whole institution.

It sounds almost unbelievable. But it is fact. And when, at sixteen, this slim cripple finally was graduated from the eighth grade, he asked permission to tackle high school.

The matron of the orphanage laughed at him.

"What good will it do you?" she asked. "Besides, you couldn't go to high school without slighting your work here."

But Jimmy West wouldn't give up. He went around to the high school and asked to be allowed to come in for part time, so that he could keep on with his laundry work at the orphanage. The school authorities shook their heads: it would be too irregular.

STILL the boy on crutches was not discouraged. After all, there was nothing in mere refusal that hurt as much as physical pain, or hopelessness—and he had endured both. He went to Allen Davis, principal of the business high school. Mr. Davis saw something of the ambition, the energy, the determination to rise above his orphanage surroundings that marked Jimmy West as a boy that was not to be denied.

"Of course you can come," he said. "We'll fix it some way so that you'll be able to carry on your work at the Home."

Jimmy obtained permission from the matron to go to high school for one month. If, in that month, he could show her that his laundry work and other duties at the orphanage would not suffer, he could continue.

He made a "go" of it. Four days a week he went to school. He continued to do the laundry work for the whole institution. Part of the time, in addition, he acted as night watchman. Frequently he would get all of his studying done at night, ring the rising bell in the morning, get in a little sleep before breakfast, and make up the rest when he could, perhaps during part of the afternoon, and again in the evening. Two years of it, and he had finished the commercial course. Also, he had become the editor of the school paper, a substitute teacher in arithmetic, and business manager of the school football team! A ninety-pound orphan on crutches managing the football team!

By the time he was graduated from high school, he was the big brother of all the youngsters in the orphanage. The institution gave him a regular job, paying him a small salary in addition to his board and lodging.

The buildings were unclean. Enlisting the children's help, he whitewashed and painted the whole place.

"The conditions in that institution were bad," he said. "There was waste and incompetence; aside from the bread and milk bills, it cost more to feed the fourteen employees of the institution than it did all the hundred and eighty-odd children. I decided it was up to me to tell the board of directors how matters really stood. So I went before them, and put the cards on the table. What I told them opened their eyes. But, of course, I had to hunt for another job."

He applied for work at a bicycle shop. But the proprietor of the place shook his head at the thought of hiring a cripple.

"If I learn to ride a bicycle," asked Jimmy West, "can I have the job?"

The proprietor smiled at the absurdity of the idea.

"If you can ride a bicycle," he answered, "I'd be willing to try it."

So West went around to one of the bicycle rinks that were not uncommon in those days. By evening his body was a mass of black and blue spots—but he had learned to ride. Then he threw away his crutches. He decided he had reached the point where he must learn to get along without them.

The proprietor of the bicycle shop, amazed at what the boy had accomplished, gave him the job. He held it until he was ready for his next step ahead.

That came when he decided he must learn to do more than keep books in a bicycle store. He got a chance to read law with an attorney. He worked with him during office hours, and helped him at home morning and evening. He was paid seven dollars a week, with room and board. He even managed to find time for Y. M. C. A. work, and became well acquainted at that institution. Then he strove to secure a law school scholarship that would let him take up more definite legal study without having to meet a high charge for tuition.

It was the high-school experience over again. At the first place he applied, the law school, then known as Columbian University, his application was curtly refused. So he tried a private school. The head listened to him attentively.

"The law needs chaps like you, West," he said. "I haven't a doubt you'll make good. Start in here whenever you're ready, and don't let the tuition bother you. You can pay it off later."

To support himself, young West got a position at the Y. M. C. A. as assistant to the secretary. A little later he secured stenographic work in the offices of the War Department.

MEANWHILE, conditions at the orphanage had slumped back into a state hardly better than they were before he had made his disclosures to the board. So, to do his part in getting better conditions for the children, he took one of the boys himself. A young ward to the lawyer with whom he had worked also came to him, after having West appointed guardian in the older man's stead. So Jimmy West, at twenty, besides earning a living for himself and carrying on his law school work at the same time, had two boys to support! He did it by renting a house and running it as a boarding club.

The law work was interrupted for one year when, during the Spanish-American War, the secretary of the Washington Y. M. C. A. went to the front, and West took his place as acting secretary. One incident that occurred during that year is characteristic:

A fire burned out a wing of the Y. M. C. A. building in which night school classes with an enrollment of more than a hundred were held. The night school

THE beautiful silvered figure of Atalanta is poised on the radiator of The Commander, Studebaker's Big Six Brougham, to symbolize its beauty of line, speed and power.

You are captain of the boulevard and master of the open road when you sit at the wheel of this Big Six Brougham — commander of thrilling power that only seven American cars can equal, and they cost from two to five times more.

The Commander will idle smoothly or take the throttle for acceleration at 3 miles per hour. It will sweep from 5 to 40 miles per hour in 18.4 seconds. It will deliver 70 miles an hour easily, smoothly!

Put The Commander against any test you want. Charge it against the steepest hill. Let it out down the free stretches. Then you'll know why the Studebaker Big Six outsells every other car of equal or greater rated horsepower.

At its new low price of $1585—this Custom Brougham is the latest triumph of Studebaker's One-Profit manufacture.

Equipment Nickel-plated bumpers front and rear; snubbers; no-draft ventilating windshield (exclusively Studebaker); full-size balloon tires; disc wheels and positive acting four-wheel mechanical brakes; engine thermometer and hydrostatic gasoline gauge on dash; two-beam acorn headlights controlled from steering wheel; cowl lights and interior dome light; rear traffic signal light; automatic windshield cleaner and rear-vision mirror; oil filter; Alemite chassis lubrication; silken curtains; Butler finish hardware.

Armstrong's Brown Jaspé Linoleum No. 17

Jaspé in blends of brown

A fresh, modern floor beauty approved by critical decorators for every type of interior

Many women like the floors in their homes to be of one color tone throughout. They want something modern, something truly decorative. And they seek floors that will look equally effective in dining-room, living-room, and bedroom. A difficult task . . . unless they have seen a floor like that in the living-room above.

Brown Jaspé, it is called. To both the eye and the touch, this modern floor of Armstrong's Linoleum is unlike any of the old-type floors. It is as smooth as a table-top, to begin with. The eye detects no cracks, no gaping seams. Yet this one-piece floor of Jaspé actually has the appearance of a rich, softly textured surface.

To this unusual "jasper" effect has been added a mellow blend of heather browns. The result is a floor beauty that harmonizes in good taste with almost every type of room decoration.

Green Jaspé No. 19

Arabesq Tile No. 9012

"But will this beauty last?" you ask. "Are Armstrong's Jaspé Floors easy to clean?" Have them cemented in place and their beauty will last a lifetime. A waxing and polishing, a dry-dusting, is all the cleaning care they ever need.

You wonder, "What does all this up-to-date floor beauty, comfort, and cleaning ease cost?" Surprisingly little when your Armstrong Floor is installed; nothing at all as the years roll by.

Your local department, furniture, or linoleum store merchant will show you Armstrong's Jaspé Linoleum in two tones of brown. There you will also see Jaspé effects in green, blue, gray, and taupe, as well as scores of other new floor designs in Armstrong's Linoleum.

Hazel Dell Brown will help you

Our decorator, Hazel Dell Brown, has written "The Attractive Home—How to Plan Its Decoration." This new illustrated book contains a special "Decorator's Data Sheet" and an offer of Mrs. Brown's free, personal service. Sent to anyone for 10 cents. (In Canada, 20c.) had to be discontinued. West went to the president of the institution to see what could be done about reopening it. The president promised to do what he could; a meeting of the directors was to be held that evening.

West knew what those night school classes meant. He had taken some of the work himself. While the directors were discussing ways and means, he hung around outside, waiting for the meeting to break up. When the president came out, Jimmy met him on the sidewalk.

"I'm sorry, West," he said, "but I couldn't manage it. It would cost a lot to put the building in shape again. We haven't the money. We must wait a while."

"Look here," West answered, as soon as the shock of disappointment had passed off; "if I agree to open that night school again without its costing the Y. M. C. A. one cent, will you let me do it?"

And finally, still standing on the deserted sidewalk, the president promised. "But only," he reiterated, "if you do it without any expense to the Association. We haven't the money to spend."

In telling me about it, Mr. West smiled.

"When I want to put something across," he said, "I don't ask for money, I ask for permission to go ahead. It isn't money that set the wheels revolving. It's energy, and intelligence, and initiative, and determination—those are the things that count. Money comes afterward."

"But how?" I asked. "How did you tackle the reorganization of that night school, for instance?"

"Well, first I went to the instructors. I got each one of them to promise he'd give his services until the school could be put on a paying basis again.

"Then I went around to various contractors to see about getting the building repaired. I explained the fix we were in. I told them that the teachers had offered to donate their services, and asked them if they couldn't contribute some of the work of restoring the wing. You'd be surprised at the way they responded. We reopened the school with an enrollment of two hundred, instead of the one hundred and thirty-six we had before. Instead of having to work for nothing, the instructors were paid more than they received before the fire."

WHEN West finally was graduated from law school, he decided he would like to be appointed a member of the Board of Pension Appeals, a semi-judicial position with the Department of the Interior.

"Get one of those pension attorney jobs? You—just out of law school? Why, you might just as well try to get to the top of the Washington Monument without going inside!"

That was the answer he got; an answer that would have stopped most men. But West had learned that there always is a way around a refusal. In less than six months he secured his appointment, and carried on that work for more than six years.

But with it he kept up his other activities. Retaining his interest in the Y. M. C. A., he branched out into settlement work. That led, in turn, to the securing of better playgrounds for Washington children. It was in this connection that he bought one of those first little two-seater automobiles, to enable him to get around more readily to his settlement work and playground activities. Once the Washington Playground Association voted him one thousand dollars to cover his expenses in playground work. Otherwise, there was no remuneration whatever.

The playground work brought him in touch with President Roosevelt. He wanted to secure the use of the big oval at the rear of the White House grounds for ball games. Roosevelt gave his consent, and the oval has been used for ball games ever since.

WHEN the episode related at the beginning of this article showed West the need for a Juvenile court, he worked with members of Congress until the success of the project was assured. But he did not receive the appointment of judge. Roosevelt had made other promises that took precedence over his assurance that West could have the place.

"Sorry," he explained. "I wanted to put you in; but I couldn't. It was my own mistake in promising something that I was already committed on, indirectly. But whenever the chance comes I'll make it up to you. You can count on that."

James West did count on that assurance. But, characteristically enough, not for himself.

He had married. With his wife, he had taken on some editorial work in the shape of a campaign for dependent children that was being carried on in the pages of a New York magazine. He suggested to the editors that it would be a fine thing to get the President of the United States to call a conference on the subject, after the order of the conservation congress of state governors. The editors agreed it would be fine; but doubted its feasibility. "It's not likely you can get President Roosevelt to take on anything like that," they said.

West reminded Roosevelt of his promise and the President made good. The banquet held in connection with the National Conference that T. R. sponsored, attended by the President himself, was the biggest banquet, in point of numbers, ever given in Washington up to that time.

In 1910 those in charge of the proposed Boy Scouts organization in America asked West, whose work with children had already made him one of the outstanding national figures in that field, to accept the job of chief executive of the organization. At first he declined; then, realizing the possibilities of a nation-wide movement that would enlist the enthusiasm of growing boys, he decided to accept, and took office shortly after the "Boy Scouts of America" was definitely incorporated. In 1916 the scope and usefulness of the Boy Scouts movement had grown to such proportions that it received the distinction of a congressional charter, being to-day one of the four organizations that have ever received that high honor—the others being the Near East Relief, the American Red Cross, and the American Legion. By 1920, the Scouts organization had 16,826 troops, with 475,000 scouts and scout officials. By 1926 there were 24,352 troops, with a total of 808,683 scouts and scout officials.

James E. West knows boys. All his life he has worked with, and for, children. Moreover, he understands what they mean to America, as few Americans do.

At noon—each day

JAPAN TEA

For better afternoons

About the middle of the afternoon, ambition fails you.

You yawn. You dawdle. And you're anything but pleased with yourself when the afternoon is gone and you've so little done to show for it.

Well, then, try this. At noon, prepare for four o'clock fatigue.

Relax, after luncheon, over a cup or two of refreshing Japan Green Tea.

Drink it slowly. Linger over it.

Repeat daily. And—no more listless afternoons. You're fresh and wide awake all through the day.

Japan Tea is tea at its best—tea in its natural state, uncolored and unfermented, with all the flavor-laden juices of the fresh leaves preserved by immediate sterilization.

Specify Japan Green Tea when you buy. Put up for the home in packages under various brands. Several grades and prices. The best will cost you only a fraction of a cent a cup

"Of all the assets this great country has," he says, "none can be placed higher than Youth. What America will be in years to come depends on what happens to our boys and girls to-day. And yet, Youth is the one thing about which we know least, from the standpoint of intelligent understanding. The Bureau of Animal Industry at Washington spent last year $3,000,000 in order that we might know how to raise more and better cattle.

"In the same period, the Children's Bureau, which it was my pleasure to help inaugurate some eighteen years ago with the aid of Theodore Roosevelt, had at its disposal $350,000. The Board of Education had at its disposal $160,000. Approximately, half a million dollars in all!

"Granting the importance of boys and girls," continued Mr. West, "the problem was how to inaugurate a movement that would grip their interest, and make them better men and women.

"The first essential was to have a set of ideals to strive for. In large part we found this in the nine Scout laws that had already been formulated in England. We elaborated and interpreted them to meet our needs. The tenth, eleventh and twelfth laws, calling for bravery, cleanliness, and reverence, we added as being particularly valuable in this American age when we are likely to lose sight of serious things.

"OUR next problem was to secure the interest of boys. You mustn't preach to a boy. He won't stand for it. If you want to secure his coöperation, arouse his interest. Make him want to do the thing you wish him to do. That's easier said than done. But we have succeeded in arousing in boys an intense desire to become Scouts.

"We secured this result in part by our system of organization into troops, and by selecting well-qualified leaders who understand boys and their ways. We have capitalized boys' interest in outdoors—in tramping, in camping, and in woodcraft. Take a lad outdoors and show him how to do things that he already wants to do, how to handle a knife, how to swim faster, how to chop down a tree, how to build a fire, and the first you know you have a companion—an apprentice, as it were—who'll follow you through thick and thin.

"We have utilized ambition. The boy first becomes a tenderfoot, then a second-class, then a first-class Scout, and then, according to his interest and according to his leadership, he is permitted to acquire merit badges of proficiency in some seventy subjects. Last year we awarded through our Court of Honor and local councils almost one hundred and fifty thousand merit badges. Twenty-one merit badges give the boy a right to the highest rank in scouting—Eagle Scout. Over three thousand boys earned this right last year.

"Boys are naturally competitive. They want to try their skill to see whether or not they can outdo the other fellow. The merit badge system encourages healthy competition.

"Pride is another quality that every boy will respond to, as soon as you point out to him something that he has reason to be proud of. The right sort of pride is akin to self-respect. Once you get a boy to the point of being proud of being fair, proud of being clean, proud of being helpful, you have taken a big step toward making him a real citizen.

"Boys learn by doing. Our motto is 'Be prepared.' We require a daily good turn of every Scout. If we merely said those things, boys would listen, and go away unimpressed. But we don't stop with saying them. In our activities we make sure that boys are taught those things which enable them to put their mottoes into effect. We emphasize first aid, and similar activities that appeal vividly to boys in their teens.

"WE TRY to fit all boys for useful, successful life and citizenship in five ways:

"First on the list we put physical fitness. How well I know from my own personal experience that health is within the power of nearly every man! We try to give to each boy a consciousness of his own individual responsibility to make and keep himself physically fit.

"Our second point is general education. In spite of our splendid public schools, three quarters of the boys and girls in America to-day leave school at the age of fourteen, without having passed beyond the seventh grade. We make a point of encouraging boys to continue their schooling.

"Third comes vocational guidance. A survey made in the city of New York showed that one hundred thousand boys between the ages of sixteen and eighteen average three jobs each year. We found one boy who held thirty-four different positions in two years! The underlying reason, we discovered, was that our educational system doesn't help boys definitely to find the things they can do best.

"Our merit-badge system gives, in a measure, vocational training. Of course we don't make a finished product. But these badge subjects cover practical activities, such as plumbing, carpentry, gardening, and a wide range of the sciences and arts—astronomy, botany, sculpture, and music.

"Again the emphasis is on doing. But to supplement the boys' activities, we have had little pamphlets prepared on each subject, which are available at a nominal cost. We give the boy a vision of the possibilities of a career in the work he does while qualifying for merit-badge honors. In winning these badges thousands of boys are discovering the thing they can do best.

"Fourth on our list we place the right attitude of mind toward organized government and the community. Do you know that only half the citizens of this country felt enough interest in the last two Presidential elections to go to the polls and vote? In scouting, we try to train boys for their responsibilities as citizens by giving them opportunities to participate in civic activities. They coöperate with the municipal police and fire departments, the United States Bureau of Forestry, and similar departments. Thus they get a vision of their relationship to organized society, and they measure up to that responsibility in a mighty encouraging way.

"Last and most important on the list we put character development.

"Personally, I believe that conditions to-day are better than they ever were, although I do not discount the harmful effects that automobiles, dance halls, jazz, and liquor play in the lives of our young folks. I see many of them being drawn into the whirlpool. Why? Because they lack the moral fiber that can come only through careful guidance, preferably in the home. The boys and girls of America need to have the benefit of two great influences which make for character building. We don't fool ourselves, in the Scout movement, into assuming that we are going to take the place of either of them.

"The first of these is the home. The second is the church. The boys and girls of America cannot grow into manhood and womanhood of the kind that gives them moral character without the help and power of God! So we are trying to strengthen the influence of the church in the lives of the boys of America, and we have been able to do it without regard to denominational differences. We adopted and emphasized that twelfth Scout law to fit conditions in America. Let me repeat it to you:

"'A Scout is reverent. He is reverent toward God. He is faithful in his religious duties. He respects the convictions of others in matters of custom and religion.'"

That twelfth law was built out of James E. West's own experience while, alone and practically unaided, he was changing himself from a weakling on crutches to a strong, healthy man; from an ignorant little orphan to a leader of educated opinion; from a lonely and almost helpless object of charity to the head of one of the greatest organizations in America. He never lost his faith in God or his fellow man.

during the long periods of exposure.

"The National Academy of Sciences has a special fund, the J. Lawrence Smith Fund, for the encouragement of research in meteors," said Doctor Shapley. "Assisted by a grant from this fund we began our special work here in October, 1924, with Doctor Willard J. Fisher in charge. Thus far, Doctor Fisher and his assistants have searched 53,489 plates, and have found 276 meteor trails. In one instance, four closely parallel trails were in the same photograph. Examples of rotating meteors, double meteors, meteoric spectra, and meteors that travel curved paths have also been found. All of this photographic data is being analyzed and catalogued by Doctor Fisher, and out of it we expect to get better acquainted with meteors."

I called on Doctor Fisher and he showed me some of these curious photographs, and discussed at length the many different appearances which meteors assume when they dart from the invisibility of outer space into the field of the earth's influence.

"If there is anyone who has never seen a meteor, and wants to, he can soon satisfy that desire," said Doctor Fisher. "Select a clear moonless night, go out beyond the city limits, and watch the sky for an hour or two. Meteors may be seen at any time of the night—large ones have been seen in daylight—but they are generally more numerous in the two or three hours before dawn.

"Some of them are so instantaneous that if you chance not to be looking in their direction, you will miss them. Others flare up into long streaks of fireworks as they course through the sky, and these are the kind most frequently seen. A shooting star is rarely visible longer than two or three seconds; but sometimes it leaves a train like a faint streak of cloud, which may remain luminous many minutes.

"There are times when shooting stars rain down in showers. Von Humboldt tells, in the account of his travels in 1799, how he was awakened in the early morning of November 12th to see the falling stars. For four hours he watched meteors darting across the eastern sky from north to south, some as big as the moon, some the size of Jupiter, all with long fiery trains, some showering sparks, and many bursting.

"On the corresponding night in 1833 there was another shower, just as wonderful, seen all over the United States. This time two American scientists, Denison Olmsted, of Yale, and A. C. Twining, of West Point, discovered an interesting fact which Von Humboldt had not mentioned: They found that the tracks of the shooting stars all seemed to come away from a point in the constellation Leo.

"Scientific men in this country were deeply stirred. Astronomers began to search historical records for references to past meteoric displays. Prof. H. A. Newton, of Yale, worked out a table dated back to the year 902, in which he traced the showers from Leo as occurring every thirty-three years. He predicted that there would be another brilliant display on the night of November 13th, 1866.

"Astronomers were thus forewarned, and the appointed night found them all primed for the exhibit. Thousands of people in many parts of the world sat up that night to see the shooting stars—and they were not disappointed. There was a brilliant display.

"PROFESSOR NEWTON'S prediction established two facts: First, that there is apparently a vast belt of meteors circling around the sun in an orbit such that the earth's position in November brings it in proximity to it. Second, the curve of the meteors' orbit is such that once in every thirty-three years the orbit of the earth crosses that of the meteors, and we pass through the very thick of the swarm.

"Thus, every November we may see some Leonids—those on the fringe of the swarm which get into the earth's gravitational field and plunge into our atmosphere. And every thirty-three years we should see a great display, because then we pass through the swarm of meteors like an airplane passing through a cloud.

"On this schedule another meteoric shower was expected in 1899. I am one of the many persons who sat up that night to see the rain of meteors; and it was a big disappointment, for the shower failed to appear. There were a few sporadic shooting stars, but nothing extraordinary. It is believed that the cloud of meteors was pulled aside by the gravitation of the outer planets. The next great shower from Leo is scheduled for 1932.

"It is a proved fact that the nights of November 14th and 15th are favorable times to look for meteors, because every year some Leonids put in an appearance.

"Another swarm of meteors is close to the earth on November 20th or earlier, and meteors are generally to be seen until the 23d. They are called Andromedes, because they seem to come from the direction of the constellation Andromeda. They are also called Bielids, because they are believed to be fragments of Biela's Comet which traveled the same path as this meteor swarm.

"Another favorable season for observing shooting stars is August, especially around the 10th, 11th, and 12th. These August meteors come from the direction of the constellation Perseus, and are Perseids."

It is believed by some authorities that the Aquarids, which may be seen to best advantage on May 5th, are particles from Halley's Comet. This most famous of all comets was last seen in 1910, and is not scheduled to visit our part of the universe again until 1985.

"METEOR showers are caused by small particles, for the most part, which burn up almost instantly when they come into contact with the upper atmosphere of the earth. Larger meteors occasionally plunge long distances, glowing like miniature suns. These are 'fireballs.' A large fire-ball flamed in the New England sky in broad daylight on November 15th, 1925, and was seen by observers in Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire, and Maine.

"About six weeks later, on the night of December 29th, bright fireballs were reported from points in Quebec, Ontario, the New England states, New York, and Pennsylvania. The most widely observed was a fireball which flashed over the town of Hornell, New York, though not a single report of the meteor was received from that town. This is not surprising, however, as observers rarely see what is straight above them.

"The Hornell fireball was variously described. A man in Sharon, Pennsylvania, saw it "half the diameter of the full moon, pale yellow," while to an observer in Brooklyn, New York, it appeared "brilliant greenish white," and to another in West End, New Jersey, it was "a ball of fire, turning red, and like a searchlight shining through a dark sky."

"How do you know it was the same meteor?" I asked.

"I plotted the directions of sight that were given by the observers, and they converged at a point near Hornell. It is no discredit to a report that it differs in details from other reports of the same object. To an observer from the south or east a meteor may look very different from its appearance to an observer from the north or west. Then, too, a burning meteor is rapidly disintegrating as it speeds through the air, and its appearance at one moment may be quite different from its appearance a second or two later.

"The Hornell meteor was 64 miles above the earth when first visible, and it exploded at a height of 41 miles. Its velocity was close to 27 miles a second."

"Fireballs that explode are called 'bolides,'" continued Doctor Fisher. "The Hornell meteor is an example, though it does not seem to have made any noise. In July, 1894, a large meteor appeared in California within a few miles of the Lick Observatory. Perhaps no meteor ever had such a distinguished gallery, for it was plainly seen by several famous astronomers. It fell nearly vertically, and at a height of twenty-eight miles exploded with a loud detonation.

"More recently, in the early morning of July 18th, 1926, a fireball exploded over Maine. The flash was seen and the report heard in such widely-separated places as Portland, Bangor, and East Boothbay."

But for beauty and magnificence, no meteoric procession on record, said Doctor Fisher, can compare with the celestial display which was first sighted in the Canadian snowfields on that Sunday evening of February 9th, 1913. In the opening of this article I have tried to convey the impression of the flight as seen by one observer in Ontario; but the meteors were first observed a thousand miles farther west, in Saskatchewan, as a fleet of red fireballs.

The whole formation was from 1,000 to 1,500 miles in length and was seen over a stretch of 5,000 miles of the earth's surface. One hundred and forty-one of the observers were so impressed that they sent reports of what they saw to Doctor C. A. Chant, astronomer at the University of Toronto. Doctor Chant published an account of the phenomena in the Journal of the Royal Astronomical Society of Canada, quoting the original data, and it is from his paper that the details reported here are gleaned. From this data Doctor Chant was enabled to compute the velocity of the meteoric procession as six miles a second.

That is a speed of 21,600 miles an hour. And yet, everyone who reported was impressed by the slow, stately movement of the meteors. They appeared to move slowly because of their height above the earth. When first sighted in Saskatchewan they were approximately 50 miles high. By the time they reached Ontario they were 34 miles high. When last seen by the officer of the "Newlands" they were approximately 14 miles high. In spite of their speed, the force of gravitation was steadily pulling them down, and it has been computed that they plunged into the sea about 700 miles beyond the "Newlands."

"WHY is it that so few meteors fall to the earth?" I asked Doctor Fisher.

"Most of them are minute bodies, and they simply burn up," answered the astronomer. "By measurement of the light of a typical shooting star, Opik found that it has a temperature of 6,000 to 7,000 degrees. And Lindeman and Dobson have calculated that it gives off energy at the rate of 4,400 horse-power.

"However, a great many meteors do not burn up, even at such temperatures," continued Doctor Fisher. "Many explode in the air and drop their fragments. Some manage to keep whole, and reach the earth as great chunks of matter glazed over with a thin crust like varnish. This coating seems to indicate that the surface melted so suddenly that the heat did not penetrate very far into the body. Fallen meteors are called "meteorites," and less than 900 falls have been discovered. Of

An Hour of a Woman's Life

THE lives of our mothers and our wives are not all pleasure. They are dotted with many a dreary hour of drudgery. The darning hour—that's not a very joyful hour. The woman who loves you wants to see you wearing smart silk socks, and yet—she surely pays when the darning hour comes 'round.

Show her that it hurts to see her tired fingers toiling for you at a darning basket needlessly. Show her that her comfort and her happiness are treasures dear to you. Order for yourself the kind of hose that wears—and wears—and wears. Iron Clads!

Iron Clad

Iron Clad No. 499 is for men who like the luxury of silk—but who have pity for a wife or mother who dreads darning. It is fortified with double sole and four-ply heel and toe—pure silk and rayon with powerfully reinforced mercerized top. If your dealer can't supply you, send us your remittance, and we'll send your socks direct. State size (9 to 12, 50¢ a pair). Colors: (black, white, grey, African brown, navy, French tan, champagne, Russian tan). We'll pay the postage!

these, 324 were found in North America."

Meteorites have been picked up in every state of the Union except Delaware, the District of Columbia, Illinois, Louisiana, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Washington. But this does not mean that meteorites may not be found in these states—for there is scarcely a doubt that many more meteorites have fallen than have been found. Many have accidentally been turned up in plowing, in prospecting for ore, and in digging for foundations. The greatest number of finds in the United States has been in Texas, twenty-four; but North Carolina, in spite of its smaller area, is a close second with twenty-two. It is reported that a farmer in Kansas paid off the mortgages on his farm by selling to museums and other collectors the pieces of meteorite which he found in his fields.

"Since the greater part of the earth's surface is sea, it is reasonable to suppose that more drop into the water than on land," said Doctor Fisher. "Uncounted millions of metorites undoubtedly lie buried in the ocean bottoms, in the jungles of Africa and the Tropics, and in the vast polar wastes."

One of the largest meteoric finds was in the Arctic. In 1894 Commander R. E. Peary was led by an Eskimo guide to Cape York, north of Melville Bay, Greenland, to see the "great irons." Peary found them to be three large meteorites. There was no record of when they fell, but Eskimo tradition knew them for at least a hundred years. The meteorites were called by the natives the "Dog," the "Woman," and the "Tent," because of their shapes.

PEARY returned to Greenland the next year to remove the meteorites. He had no trouble transferring the "Dog" to his ship. It weighed a paltry eleven hundred pounds. The "Woman" weighed three tons and was more difficult. After she was brought to the water front, a cake of ice served as a barge to ferry the meteorite from the shore to the ship. All went well until the load was alongside the vessel, and the tackle was being secured. Suddenly the ice cake broke into pieces, and it seemed as though the prize were lost. Luckily, the tackle tightened and held after it had dropped a few feet into the sea. Finally, after much sweating, anxiety, and excitement, the "Woman" was lodged in the hold of Peary's ship.

The "Tent" had been left till the last, because it was four miles away on an island. Peary found its weight to be many times that of the other meteorites, and it was impossible to budge it with such equipment as he had. Reluctantly he was compelled to abandon it, and came on home with the "Dog" and the "Woman."

Eleven years later, the explorer made a special trip to Greenland for the "Tent," but again its immense weight proved unmanageable. The next year, in 1907, he tried again, and luck was with him. The "Tent" was found to weigh thirty-six and one-half tons, and remains the largest meteorite in captivity. These three remarkable meteorites from Greenland may be seen at the American Museum of Natural History in New York.

Perhaps the most remarkable meteoric find in the United States is the great crater near Canyon Diablo, in Arizona, generally known as Coon Butte. The crater is an immense hole in the rocky ground, nearly 4,000 feet in diameter, about 600 feet deep, and with walls rising 120 to 160 feet above the surrounding plateau. Thousands of pieces of meteoric iron have been found in and around this crater. A large specimen may be seen in the collection of meteorites at the Field Museum, in Chicago. Scientists believe that this scar in the rock-ribbed plateau of Arizona was caused by the fall of a gigantic meteor.

I asked Doctor Fisher if meteors have been known to strike people or destroy property.

"Some of the annals of the Middle Ages refer to falls of stone from the sky which killed and dstroyed human life. Chinese history tells of a palace being struck in ancient times.

"Humboldt's 'Cosmos' mentions the reputed death of a monk in Milan, Italy, in 1660, from this cause. But Doctor G. P. Merrill, lecturing at Cambridge, expressed doubt of all reports of such accidents. We have no record in modern times of any serious results from meteoric falls. Of course the impact of a meteorite large enough to make that crater at Coon Butte would do an immense lot of damage if the fall hit in a thickly populated region. Apparently the Mazapil meteorite missed the ranchman only a few yards. Fortunately, these misses seem to be the rule rather than the exception, and I don't think anyone need worry over the possibility of a meteor striking him."

"Are not these meteorites increasing the size and weight of the earth?" I asked.

"Yes, certainly," Doctor Fisher replied; "but the increase is so infinitesimal, in proportion to the earth's mass, that it is hardly appreciable.

"Theoretically, the earth's continual encounter with meteors slows down its revolution, increases its size, increases its attraction for the sun, shortens its orbit, and shortens our year. But Professor Young calculated that in a million years the shortening would amount to only one one-thousandth of a second."

AMATEURS who are interested in astronomy, and wonder where they can make a start, are invited to turn their attention to meteors. Some of the real advances in meteoric knowledge have been made by persons who were not professional scientists at all, but lay people who watched the skies as a hobby. Denning, the great English authority on meteors, is a business man, and studies meteors for relaxation as other men play golf.

There is an organization of meteor observers, the American Meteor Society, which is glad to enlist recruits and guide them to an intelligent acquaintance with shooting stars. Dr. C. P. Oliver, of the University of Virginia, is its president.

Doctor Fisher says that any photographers who own fast lenses will find the photographing of meteors an interesting test both of skill and of luck.

"The test can best be made on the night of an expected meteor shower," said Doctor Fisher, "with the Lyrids, Perseids, Leonids, Andromedes, or Geminides as the subject. Point the camera a little below the constellation from which the shower is expected, open the shutter at its widest aperture, and expose for one hour. The

5. Growth of the town through attraction of new industries.

When the Roman Legion "followed the Eagles" into remote territories — waterworks followed the Legion.

Yet, in the 20th Century, there are still many towns without waterworks.

The little book shown above will help you bring waterworks to your town. Not in the way that the Legions brought them, but in the American way, through the ballot-box.

This book is free to any woman who is weary of carrying water from wells, to any man who is paying high insurance rates due to lack of fire protection; in short, to any citizen.

Waterworks have come to many towns no bigger and no richer than your own because someone answered an advertisement like this one. Will you appoint yourself a committee of one to send for the booklet, "Waterworks for Every Town."

brighter stars will make paths on the negative, and some passing meteor may be caught during the hour. At the close of this exposure, change to a new plate or film, and make another hour's exposure. The best results are obtained after midnight. We should be glad to search such negatives at the Harvard College Observatory. In sending negatives to the observatory indicate the time of opening and closing the shutter, and name the town or place where the exposure was made."

One of the amateurs who observed the Hornell meteor took a photograph of the luminous train which it left after its explosion, and sent it to the Harvard College Observatory. Doctor Fisher says that to his knowledge it is one of the four photographs of meteor trains in existence. Two luminous trains were photographed in South Africa some years ago, another one in India, and, lastly, in 1925, this one in America by a quick-witted amateur observer, D. O. Woodbury, of Schenectady, New York.

EQUALLY fascinating to astronomical amateurs is the game of comet seeking. While comets are not so numerous as meteors, they are more lasting and, when one is found, it may be watched night after night for weeks, sometimes for months. The observer may witness the spectacular phases of its evolution. When sighted, a distant comet is usually tailless, but as it approaches the sun the pressure of the solar light beating against the comet's head drives off a flare of luminous vapor which may stretch for millions of miles into space.

Sometimes several tails develop at different angles. Sometimes, as was seen in Halley's Comet on its last visit, sections of the tail stream off at rapid velocity. Occasionally, as in 1910, a comet is of such brilliance as to be visible in daylight; but this is rare. Most comets must be looked for at night to be seen at all, and the majority of them are telescopic objects.

The present year, 1927, promises to be of special interest to comet observers, because, in addition to minor comets, it will bring back to the neighborhood of the earth two well-known visitors: the Pons-Winnecke Comet and the Encke Comet.

The Pons-Winnecke Comet was discovered in 1819 by Jean Louis Pons, a doorkeeper at the observatory in Marseilles, France, who became one of the most celebrated cometary astronomers. In 1858 the comet was rediscovered by F. A. T. Winnecke at Bonn. On its last visit, in 1921, it was first sighted and photographed by E. E. Barnard, the indefatigable comet seeker of the Yerkes Observatory.

This comet has a period of about six years in which it makes its elliptical journey around the sun. Since the earth is also continually traveling, it happens that only occasionally do their motions bring earth and comet close together. This year is one of those times of near approach, and on June 26th the Pons-Winnecke Comet will be only 3,500,000 miles from the earth. The sun is 93,000,000 miles distant, and our nearest planetary neighbor, Venus, is 26,000,000 miles, so, by comparison, the comet will be just over our back fence. It will be in the constellation Pegasus, rising in the eastern sky about eleven o'clock P. M. on June 26th and for a few days before and after that date. It may best be seen at midnight or shortly thereafter. The comet should show a good tail.

Encke's Comet also was discovered by Pons (in 1818), but its orbit was calculated by Encke, the Gotha astronomer, and because of this contribution the Comet bears his name. Encke's Comet has a period of three and one-third years, and because of its small orbit has been considerably disturbed in its motion by the larger planets. Encke's Comet will be nearest the earth on November 7th, when it will be within 100,000,000 miles. It also will be in the constellation Pegasus, and can best be observed around eight o'clock P. M., when it will be in the west.

Amateurs who are ambitious to discover comets must use a telescope, for by far the greater number of comets are invisible to the naked eye. A large telescope is unwieldy, and the most successful results have been obtained by the use of a small glass of from two to six inches aperture and of short focus. Seated at his telescope, the searcher slowly moves it across a section of the sky, his eye on the alert for any unaccustomed patch of light.

Distant comets are usually tailless, and the watcher may easily mistake bright nebulæ for comets unless he knows the sky intimately. But comets move and nebula are fixed; so, by watching the suspected patch of light night after night, he can tell by its movement among the stars whether or not it is a comet.

There is keen competition among comet seekers, for the first to report a discovery is honored by having his name bestowed upon the comet. Some years ago, there was an American who was awarding a cash prize of two hundred dollars for each new comet discovered. Professor E. E. Barnard, who has nineteen comets to his credit, called his home "the house that comets built," because it was entirely paid for with the prize money that he won by his cometary discoveries.

BARNARD'S record was even exceeded by that of another American, W. R. Brooks, of Geneva, New York, who discovered twenty comets in some twenty years of observing. Even the professional regards one new comet a year a satisfactory find, but the Rev. Joel H. Metcalfe, of Portland, Maine, has the unique record of discovering three comets within forty-eight hours.

Perhaps it should be emphasized, lest ambitions be unduly stimulated, that the two-hundred-dollar prize is no longer offered. But, through the endowment of another wealthy American patron of astronomy, a bronze medal is presented to the discoverer of every new comet. This award is under the control of the Astronomical Society of the Pacific. Discoveries of comets and other celestial objects should be reported, if made in the Western Hemisphere, to the Harvard Observatory in Cambridge, Massachusetts; if made in the eastern Hemisphere, to the Observatory in Copenhagen. By agreement, these are the two world centers from which astronomical news is disseminated to the various observatories, societies, and publications throughout the world.

Getting Away From the Grind

friendships grow out of our chance vacation acquaintances.

Now, the obvious purpose of vacations is to recuperate mind and body by means of rest and change; but this purpose is so frequently nullified by the manner in which it is carried out that the condition of the tired vacationist on returning home has become almost a stock joke.

When you plan a vacation, remember that the most important thing is to arrange for a complete change of environment. If you live in the city you should go to the country for your vacation, and if you live in the country you should plan to go to the city, or at least go to a different sort of locality from that in which you live the year around. If you live in a flat country, hike for the mountains. If you live in the mountains, get right out of them and make for the plains or the sea coast.

If you are engaged in tasks in which your eyes are employed with work near at hand, then journey to the place where you can exercise your long-distance vision.

If you are a traveling man, habitually on the move, then go to a place where you can stay put for a while. If you are a housewife who has been tied right down for one year to home duties and child-care, get away from home if possible, gad about, travel, keep on the go during most of your vacation. See new things, and many of them.

If your work is monotonous, then plan for a vacation that will have variety in it, and, if possible, travel. Some vacations should be spent in half a dozen places.

NOT long ago I heard of a middle-aged professional woman who just wanted to go to some place and sit. The rest of the family didn't take kindly to this idea of a vacation, so they planned on a trip in which Mother was to be left in a comfortable hotel with a big porch and easy chairs, while the other members of the family played golf and ran about the country on motor trips. This went well for three days, and that was enough for Mother. She wanted to get into the real vacation with the rest of the family.

From year to year, change the vacations. If you have been taking motor trips each year, plan for a boat trip or take a railroad journey.

Let me emphasize the value of water trips, boat trips, or canoe cruises. There is something decidedly restful about the water, especially for those who live on land, and do not have an opportunity to paddle around on a lake any time they choose.

If you go off on a motor trip, don't forget to walk. The automobile is a great institution for getting you off to the vacation grounds, and for getting you around when you are there. But after you establish your headquarters for a day or for a week, lock up the automobile, and do a little walking. But let me warn you against overdoing this hiking business on a vacation. I frequently see people come home from a vacation on which they have really attempted too much physical exercise. They have walked too far, and it takes them about two weeks to get over the vacation physically.

A word about camping. This camping is great stuff for young people, and it is all right even for young married folks where everybody will pitch in and do the work. But I can't see the advantage of camping parties where a woman has to do all the work, and the man has all the play, aside from a little assistance in striking and breaking camp. For adults over forty years, except for those who are camping enthusiasts, I think the vacation by motor will yield much more health and recuperation if the camping idea is abandoned.

In the case of motor-camping family vacations, plan to change about as far as possible. Let the man do most of the cooking and the woman do the unusual things about the camp. It is real sport for a man to get a frying pan in his hands now and then. He doesn't have a chance to do it through the year. But how much of an inspiration to the housewife is the view of a frying pan?

In this connection, every woman off on one of these trips should learn to drive the automobile. Particularly should she do this if she does not drive much at home. Remember, first, last, and always, on a vacation try to do the unusual things, get away from your routine life, and engage in new activities.

UNFORTUNATELY, most of us have to plan our vacations in accordance with the budget. We have just so much money to be spent, whether it be an individual outing or a family holiday. A part of the good after-effects of a vacation is spoiled if you come home having spent twice as much money as you could afford, and if for six months the exchequer groans under the task of trying to cover the vacation deficit. Most of us, after we have taken a few vacations, learn how to plan for the expense. If you are careless in this matter, your vacation will cost you about twice what you thought it would; but if you will sit down and figure it out, or if, as a family, you sit down and talk it over, you will be able to make a good workable estimate.

I know a family of five in Chicago who, up to the month of March, had not been able to give a thought to their annual vacation. They had had unusual expenses during the year, and it seemed that they simply couldn't afford to take a vacation. But they had the good sense to know that a vacation was just as important a part of their life as anything else. They finally managed to provide thirty-five dollars for a vacation in July.

Now, what can five people do on thirty-five dollars? They, of course, had to abandon the idea of a vacation of the type they had been taking. It finally occurred to them that the Forest Preserves district about Chicago afforded an opportunity for camping out. Fortunately, they were able to borrow a tent from a relative, and this they pitched for two weeks near the river in the Forest Preserves. The thirty-five dollars saw them through the entire vacation, with canoe trips, motoring forays, including one trip into the city, on which they treated themselves to a table d'hôte meal. How much better that this family should have made the effort to have a real vacation, even though they had only thirty-five dollars to spare for it.

If you cannot get far away from home to have a vacation, then take one near home. If you can't afford to stop work for two weeks, then get a change of work. For example, if you are working in a city office, get off for two weeks and work on a farm. What I want to emphasize is that you should get away from your job once a year. It is not necessary that you spend an enormous amount of money in order to derive real benefit from a vacation. It is the change that does the good, and if you can't have a real holiday, then radically change your activities for a while.

In the case of the family who spent their vacation in the Forest Preserve, there was little opportunity to use money. There were no moving picture shows. There were no amusement park attractions. They just camped out under the trees and enjoyed nature.

On the other hand, whenever possible, I think it is a good plan to allow yourself some reasonable luxury on a vacation. The psychology of this attitude is good. You have been economical for a year. You have pinched the coins. You have had to scrimp and save. Now, within reasonable limits, enjoy spending.

Don't forget that money spent on a vacation is a profitable investment. Every dollar that is saved by neglecting the annual vacation stands a good chance of eventually falling into the hands of doctors, druggists, and hospitals. Money spent on healthful recreation and recuperation is not wasted. I have a patient now who thought he could not afford to take a vacation, so he is spending his money on the luxury of a nervous breakdown.

It is a lot of fun for an individual, or two chums, or a whole family, to sit down, plan a vacation, and work out a budget for it. You know how much you can spend. Now, make it go as far as you can. And remember that the main idea is to get away from the things you have been doing the rest of the year.

It does us all good to get out of doors as much as possible during the summer season, and we therefore derive extraordinary benefit from a period of two or three weeks in which we virtually eat, play, and sleep out of doors. There is something about outdoor sleeping that is beneficial, aside from the fact of just fresh air. I think it may be that the blowing of the breeze on the face has some highly beneficial nervous effect upon the circulation of the blood and the movement of the nerve currents.

THE actinic ray of the sunlight in moderate dosage throughout the day is highly beneficial to the health of the body. But I cannot too strongly warn the reader against over-exposure to sunlight during the summer season. This tendency to become unduly sunburned or tanned probably more than destroys the good effect of the sunlight that would otherwise be gained by moderate exposure or by out-of-door living with proper clothing.

And in this connection, we should remember that light-colored clothing permits us to receive a large amount of these health-giving rays right through our wearing apparel; whereas, dark-colored fabrics throw these health rays off.

DEPT. 38 • PITTSBURGH, PA.

If you enjoy some particular outdoor sport, try to indulge in it during your vacation, but remember that if you overdo you will be sore of muscle and lame of back for a few days following.

I have a friend who, I think, is very wise. Two weeks before he goes on his vacation he begins to exercise—to walk, and take setting-up exercises—to get ready for his vacation. He is then somewhat hardened for physical exercise and the outdoor exploits of his vacation before he enters upon it, and he does not go around with a lame back, sore and exhausted muscles for the first week after he indulges in a little unusual out-of-door exercise.

While outdoor bathing is a most healthful and hygienic practice, it is much overdone, especially by frail, delicate individuals. Sea water, because of its low temperature as well as its salt, is very beneficial to the skin and general health. But too long bathing in the sea overtaxes the reactionary powers of the nervous system and results in the loss of too much heat on the part of the body. As a result, the individual is debilitated, and this experience is followed by headache, lassitude, and depression. Otherwise, outdoor bathing and swimming are to be recommended as wholesome and healthful.

A sudden plunge into cold water on a very hot day is attended with grave danger. On the part of the young and robust, there is danger of cramp, and consequent drowning. With middle-aged and elderly persons, there is great danger of sunstroke and apoplexy, especially the latter.

THERE is no question that a great many doctor's bills and much semi-invalidism would be saved if certain people who are not robust of health, and can afford it financially, would take two weeks' vacation in mid-winter as well as in mid-summer. I know this is not a practical idea, for most of us who have to stay on the job and earn our living by the sweat of our face or the sweat of our brains. Nevertheless, there is tremendous zest, not to mention real sport, to be had in mid-winter. The winter sports are just as diverting, fascinating, and health-giving as the summer activities, and I am not sure but that we are missing a great deal in not being able to get outdoors more in the winter to enjoy the cold weather; or, in the mid-winter season, after having been shut up in the house, to get away to a more salubrious climate for the outdoor living.

However, notwithstanding all that can be said in favor of vacations in the winter, those of us who can afford only one a year—and that certainly includes about ninety per cent of us—get more out of a summer vacation; and the summer vacation is about the only time that is suitable and convenient for the average family to have an outing together.

There is great danger on the part of some people of becoming over-heated when over-exposed to the sun; but, as a rule, this is due to wrong habits of diet, to over-indulgence in alcohol, tobacco, tea, or coffee, or it may be the result of obesity and embarrassed heart action. Then, too, we have a group of people who do not sweat easily during hot weather. They must be careful. They are in danger of is cooking—if you have a Kampkook. It is so easy to set up and to operate; so responsive to every demand; so reliable in every way. Kampkook can give you more heat than your gas stove at home, and greater satisfaction than any other method of camp cooking.

AMERICAN
KAMPKOOK
AMERICA'S FAVORITE CAMP STOVE

When you have the kiddies along, it is nice to know that they are perfectly safe with Kampkook—it is foolproof. Then, too, Kampkook will heat your tent when days are cool or damp.

"Kampkookery," a valuable hand book on motor camping, sent on request.

Kampkook burns ordinary motor gasoline and is perfectly safe in every way, in fact its use is permitted and recommended where open camp fires are prohibited. The tank cannot be filled while the stove is burning, but is instantly detachable and easily filled through its built-in funnel.

Kampkook has a built-in oven and bakes like your kitchen range. Its burners will not clog or burn out, and it makes no soot, smoke nor odor. You will appreciate its compactness; it folds like a suitcase, with everything inside; and when you need it again, it is opened and set up in a jiffy.

All leading camp equipment dealers sell Kampkook, and they have been selling more of them than of all other camp stoves combined. See the dealer nearest you and let him show you the many reasons for this supremacy.

They Found Figs made bran easy to take

Like many people they gagged on straight bran. But they needed bulk to aid nature in disposing of harmful residues. In Fig Bran Flakes, a delicious breakfast cereal, they found a delightful way to take bran.

These crisp, crunchy flakes of luscious California Figs and selected bran tempt any palate. Enriched with Vitamin B and food iron, they are a food par excellence for pale children and invalids.

So nutritious and efficient are Fig Bran Flakes that they are a popular daily cereal at the famous Battle Creek Sanitarium. You will find these appetizing flakes on sale at all authorized stores. Try a package today.

sunstroke. Beware of becoming overheated when the perspiration is diminished. When you are sweating freely, if your head is protected from the direct rays of the sun, there is very little danger from over-heating.

If you become dizzy as the result of light exercise in the sunshine; if you have headaches when you walk forth in the bright sunlight, consult your physician, have your blood pressure taken, have your eyes tested; find out why you should be thus afflicted when taking moderate exercise in the fresh air. If it is purely and simply your nerves, then make up your mind to train yourself gradually to practice these activities until you can go forth and enjoy life without being dizzy and suffering unduly from headaches.

There is no question that a vacation is a great treatment for indigestion. Even an ordinary week-end holiday does wonders for the stomach. I am all the time meeting people who tell me they can't eat this and can't eat that, and then, when I ask them if they can eat those things when they are on a picnic or an outing, they say, "Oh, surely, Doctor. I can eat anything reasonable at such times."

It goes to prove that a great deal of our so-called indigestion is in reality nervous indigestion. There is nothing actually wrong with the stomach. These folks are tired, nervous, and overwrought, and the stomach reflex is upset. The stomach needs only a fair chance to do its work without the presence of nagging nerves or over-stressed minds, and it will respond immediately.

The week-end outing and the annual vacation afford excellent opportunities to keep our lung power up. It is found that the average woman breathes only about one quarter of her capacity, and the average man, only about one half.

We should make an effort to improve our breathing during the vacation. No vacation is a success unless it provides for some real physical activity. We become short-winded, as it were, as a result of being cooped up most of the winter season within doors, and as soon as spring arrives we should get out and try to atone for some of the mischief that has been done by our indoor living for four or five months.

TYPHOID fever is a passing scourge; but this plague still prevails in many of the rural districts in this country. In our larger cities we have most of our typhoid in the autumn, following the return to the city of the vacationists. They contract the disease while out on their holidays, come back home and become sick. We know enough about typhoid at the present time emphatically to state that it is usually due to gross negligence. It is not generally known among the people at the present time that we possess a mode of vaccination against typhoid fever that is almost as sure a preventive as smallpox vaccination is against that scourge.

A small lake in the country is an attractive place for bathing. Cottages built around it run their sewage into the lake. Those on a holiday go in swimming. If anyone about the cottages has typhoid fever, or is a typhoid carrier—that is, a person who carries germs of this disease around with him in the gall-bladder but does not have the disease himself—he will infect the lake, and any number of innocent people may come down with the disease.

In Illinois, a few years back, at a Chautauqua, a well became infected, and two hundred and one persons are known to have contracted typhoid fever in one season. Not long since the New York City Health Department traced ninety-four cases of typhoid fever in boys and girls to a brook from which they had filled their canteens.

Flies dearly love to feed upon filth, and they carry these germs of infection to our dinner tables, and in this way typhoid and other summer bowel complaints are spread.

HERE are a few important things to remember when on a vacation, especially if you have not been vaccinated against typhoid: Drink no water unless you know it is safe. Many states are now putting signs of approval on water supplies along the mainly traveled thoroughfares. Use only pasteurized or boiled milk. Do not swim in lakes or streams unless you know they are safe. Carefully clean and wash all raw fruits and vegetables, making sure that the water used for this purpose is not contaminated. Guard against flies, and be scrupulously careful about the disposal of wastes about the camp. Still more important than all of these things—though they should not be neglected—is that you be vaccinated against typhoid fever. You cannot always control everything connected with the vacation environment, but you can be vaccinated.

Sometimes a vacation is spoiled—if we go out in the woods to rough it or camp out—by flies and mosquitoes. Certainly every tent should be provided with netting to prevent the entrance of these insects, but we cannot always remain in a screened tent, even after sundown, when the mosquitoes come forth to serenade and bite us. Some people are fortunate in that mosquitoes will not bite them; but these individuals are rare.

A very effective mosquito repellent is the following:

Oil of citronella	1 ounce
Spirits of camphor	1 ounce
Oil of cedar	½ ounce

This mosquito repellent can be used on fishing expeditions, and it is also a good plan, when the mosquitoes are very bad, to wear gloves and a head netting, to prevent them from gaining access to the face.

The summer season is the ideal time for reducing. If you are going to enjoy a vacation you must get rid of your excess baggage. But let me warn you against too rapid reduction in weight. This is particularly dangerous if you are over forty years of age. To reduce at the rate of eight or ten pounds a week is all wrong. It is better to reduce at the rate of two or three pounds, and keep it up steadily. Don't do it by spurts, and remember we don't undertake to reduce by depriving ourselves of water or other liquids. There are just two things worthwhile in connection with reducing: the control of the diet, and physical exercise.

Much can be done to prevent undue sunburn or tanning by the use of cold cream before going out in the sun, and the application of the following lotion after exposure:

Zinc oxide.....½ ounce
Starch.....½ ounce
Lime water..... 4 ounces

On a vacation, we sometimes tramp about in the woods and pick up little parasites known as "chiggers." They burrow into the skin and cause a great deal of trouble. The best way to get rid of these little fellows is to anoint the skin thoroughly night and morning with some heavy fat. Good lard ointments will serve the purpose. Greasing the skin suffocates these parasites and brings an end to their mischief-making.

I want to say a parting word to women. I think it would be a fine thing for the American home if more husbands and wives could take their vacations together. I know there are good and sufficient reasons every now and then why this is not practical. Nevertheless, if I were a woman I would think twice before I refused an invitation to go on an outing with my husband.

everyone else did. Just as if she were an invalid. She guessed they did not know how she tended the cow and chickens, and how the neighbors were always saying, "Grandma, you're so spry and young for your age!"

Grandma Jeffers, adding supreme insult to injury, came and stood beside the chair. She was gowned in extremely short turquoise velvet, and waved a gorgeous golden feather fan. She wore pearls with the blue velvet, rings of them, bracelets of them, and a dog-collar. "Well," thought Grandma jealously, "all the strands of pearls in the world could not conceal the wrinkles in that old neck!"

And then Grandma forgot her grievances in the beauty of the service. Almost everyone was looking at the bride; but Grandma looked only at David. And that was Davie, was it, standing there so big and fine and smart? It just couldn't be! Why, it was only yesterday that Davie and Micky Miller had gone down to the creek with willow poles, and she had fried for their supper the three diminutive sunfish of their combined catch. And the day before yesterday, when old Mr. Wing had come over to see her because Davie had drawn his picture on the side of Tucker's store and everybody was laughing at it?

And then, all at once, the service was over. And soon the satin ropes were removed, and the orchestra changed from a throbbingly sweet melody to a crashing dance tune. With that little superior air which Grandma detested, Grandmother Jeffers took her by the arm and piloted her the length of the ballroom floor toward chairs at the edge of the palm-filled alcove, from which vantage point they might watch the dancers.

The journey over the slipperiness of the dark polished floor would have been fraught with as much peril to Grandma as that of Eliza crossing the ice, if Grandmother Jeffers had not guided her. The high-heeled, golden satin pumps of Grand-

Let us remind you!

A YEAR from now — 5 years hence—some apparently trivial business record, stored away at "Transfer Time," may be far more priceless and indispensable than on the day it entered your office. It always happens that way.

And business men are recognizing, more and more, that as a year's correspondence—a year's ebb and flow of records—passes into the limbo of Yesterday, their transfer cases must be worthy of their confidence. They must be sturdy, compact, reasonably dust-proof, and easily accessible, whether in stacks of two or ten. Globe-Wernicke transfer cases are built to render that kind of service.

Solve your transfer problems with Globe-Wernicke equipment. Steel files that last a lifetime. The Safeguard System, using angular tab guides that speed up filing and make play of the tedious transfer burden. Counter-height equipment that gives your valuable office space two efficiency uses—as counters and as files.

Check the chart above and mail this page to us. Or better still—consult the Globe-Wernicke dealer in your city. He can give you expert advice on every filing problem.

mother Jeffers seemed to tow Grandma Burnham's flat and altogether sensible black kids over to the alcove like gay little yachts towing broad barges into the backwater of a harbor.

Grandma Burnham sank heavily into the waiting chair, with a breath of relief.

"My, that makes me feel old, the slippery floor and the bright lights and that awful loud, queer music!"

Grandma Jeffers settled in the other chair with birdlike lightness, and crossed silken ankles. "How odd! It makes me feel young." The voice was superior, condescending. "Young enough to enter into it, and get all there is out of life to get!"

Grandma did not answer. She was uneasy here alone with this woman. Evidently, she was to be with her all evening. It had been arranged, of course; Margie's family had assigned this painted old butterfly to the task of looking after her. For a long time Grandma said nothing. There seemed nothing to say. They had not a single interest in common—sophisticated, modern old Grandmother Jeffers and provincial, out-of-date old Grandmother Burnham. Their lives touched each other's no more than the Poles touch.

Well, Grandma thought to herself, tomorrow it would be over. She would go back home, and leave this silly old woman free to cavort around as she wished. She would tell the neighbors she just got homesick and took the first train for Edgeville. She looked timidly across at the other grandmother, sitting upright, poised on the edge of her chair, waving her feather fan with that little detached air of superiority.

SUDDENLY Grandma grew reckless. She would just be herself and say what she pleased. She wasn't going to be shy, or afraid of that kittenish old woman's opinion any more. And because she could not be long with anyone without expressing herself freely, she began talking, half to herself, half to the unwilling listener:

"This wasn't much like my wedding, I'm telling you. It makes me laugh to think of the difference. John and I were married in my folks' log cabin. We set all the chairs out to make room for the guests. There was two fiddlers for the music. My folks' present to us was two pigs and six chickens. My, my, how things have changed! But I was happy—just as happy as Margie. It was a happy time for us, too, in those days, wa'n't it?" Grandma's eyes were moist with memory.

"Yes . . . oh, yes," the other agreed without enthusiasm.

Shrewd old Grandma detected something. Grandmother Jeffers's wedding time had not been happy. Any woman, no matter how old or sophisticated, would recall it with some show of emotion here to-night in the midst of the flowers and the music.

"We stayed with our folks a while, and then we moved on a farm in Poplar County. My John, David's father, was born there. We hadn't much to do with. Nobody did. Times was awful hard; but such a happy time as we had, too, with all the hard work. I wouldn't change the memory of it for anything." Grandma's pleasant old voice flowed on reminiscently, monotonously: "Oh, of course, there are always some things you'd change. In all those years there's one thing stands out more than any other, that I'd change if I could. I'll tell you what it was!"

Her placid voice swept by uninterested ears, as though water lapped against the stolidity of a rock. "It was a sin of omission I guess you'd call it, instead of commission. We'd just got through living in the old sod house and built the new one. It seemed awful big and fine to me to have three rooms. My mother was coming to visit me for the first time, and I'd washed and scrubbed and cooked all day getting ready for her visit."

Grandmother Jeffers's restless, indifferent eyes were turned toward the gay throng, and she was tapping her foot irritably. But it did not faze Grandma. She was intending to finish the story of her memories more for her own pleasure than the listener's.

"WELL, there come a covered wagon along, and in it was a man and his wife and their two little girls and her young sister. The man was driving some cattle, and he stayed out and asked Pa if he could put them in our corral. But the women and the children come up to the door. The woman had a baby in her arms, and the sister was leading a little girl by the hand. The woman did the talking. She said they wanted to stay all night if they could. She said they had their own bedding and they'd bring it in and make up their beds on the floor. But I said 'No'."

Grandma's plump cheeks crinkled in the effort to keep her tearful emotion from showing. "I guess I've 'most never had a day that I haven't remembered that sinful thing . . . with the weather getting colder and the night coming on . . . and turning them away in their covered wagon. I was tired, and my mother was coming to visit, and I wanted everything spick and span. . . . But there ain't any of those things an excuse. It's been a blot on my life ever since I did it. Some day I believe I'm going to have to answer for that. Some day I'm going to hear, 'Inasmuch as ye did it not unto the least of these, ye did it not unto me.'"

Grandma was preaching a sermon by this time—preaching to a sophisticated, disinterested audience. But she had chosen her text and she was going to see it developed.

"Think of turning folks away like that in an early day when houses were so far apart and everyone had to be hospitable! I heard they stayed at the next house; but that ain't going to excuse me a mite. Seems like that's the worst thing I ever did in all the time we lived between Deer Trail and Edmond, back there in Poplar County."

Grandmother Jeffers suddenly stopped tapping her foot nervously and stared at Grandma.

"Where did you say that was?"

Grandmother repeated it mechanically. "Between Deer Trail and Edmond, out in Poplar County. I've thought of that thing—"

"What year was it?" Grandmother Jeffers leaned toward Grandma. "Do you remember?"

NOW.. We never tire OF BRAN..

.. and we feel so well because we eat it every day

NO matter how essential a food may be to your health, it must tempt your appetite if you are to eat it daily.

Your regular diet should include bran. It supplies natural bulk which, physicians will tell you, is so essential to health. But to eat bran every day, you must like it. You must not tire of the flavor.

Delicious Post's Bran Flakes was created to give you bran in a form you would really like. Eat it every day. The tempting flavor of the crisp, brown flakes is always a fresh delight. And in this pleasant way you help to protect your health and youth.

Everyone Likes the Flavor

Millions of men and women now get their daily bulk because they enjoy the delicious flavor of this health cereal. It is the most popular bran cereal in the world today. You never tire of the flavor.

And in addition to necessary bulk, Post's Bran Flakes supplies such vital health essentials as: phosphorus, iron, protein, carbohydrates and vitamin-B.

Start yourself and your family with the enjoyable health habit of eating Post's Bran Flakes as a daily "Ounce of Prevention." Enjoy it plain, with milk or cream. Also with fresh fruits and berries. Have it served in the form of muffins, cookies and bread.

Make this "Ounce of Prevention" Test

Eat Post's Bran Flakes with milk or cream every morning for two weeks, as an "Ounce of Prevention." Note how the flavor of the crisp, brown flakes grows on you. See how much better you look and feel. Don't put off this important diet correction another day. Keep on the "Road to Wellville" by making Post's Bran Flakes a daily habit.

Free—Send for "Ounce of Prevention" Package: At your request we will send you, free, an "Ounce of Prevention" package of Post's Bran Flakes and a booklet that has important bearing on health.

"Do I remember? I guess I do. It was the night before the Fourth of July, 1888. I know, because that was the year—"

Grandmother Jeffers put a slender, jeweled old hand on one of Grandma Burnham's pudgy red ones. Her young-old eyes were not restless, nor hard, nor uninterested. They had gone soft and shining and concerned. "Don't worry about it any more, Grandma." Her voice was trembling. "I was the sister!"

"You!" Grandma said it incredulously and then definitely, "Oh, no, not you!"

"Between Deer Trail and Edmond, in Poplar County, on the evening before the Fourth of July, 1888." Grandmother Jeffers went over it slowly. "Yes," she said definitely, "I was the sister. We stopped at a house, my sister and my sister's husband and their two little girls and I. A woman said she couldn't keep us because she was going to have company. I remember it as though it were last week. And we went on to the next house.

"It was because of what happened there that I remember it all. There was a young man stopping there at the next house. He had been studying law . . . he had some law books in his saddle bags . . . and he rode on away with us when we went. His name was Benjamin Erwin. Did you ever . . . ?" Grandmother Jeffers's white hand clutched a little at Grandma Burnham's red one. "Did you know anything about him . . . where he is . . . what ever became of him?"

"Benjamin Erwin? Why, he died . . . a long time ago. . . . I guess he never married."

"No, he wouldn't have. He said he wouldn't ever. . . . He was—" old Mrs. Jeffers tugged at her pearl dog-collar as though it choked her—"he was . . . the only man I ever loved!"

GRANDMA'S mind was still on her own part in this astounding coincidence, and she was clucking surprised little exclamations of "Dear, dear! And it was you I turned away!"

"No, no; don't you see?" Grandmother Jeffers was almost impatient. "If you hadn't turned us away we would not have gone on to the next house, and I'd have missed him. It was to be that way. I'll tell you about it. . . . " She pulled her chair close to Grandma's knee, like a child at confession. "I never told anyone . . . not a soul in my life. There isn't a friend I have . . . not one . . . I would tell this to now; but I can tell you. There's something about you that makes me know it is safe with you. We carry dreams around with us, you know . . . and Ben Erwin was my dream. But I never knew he died—I couldn't find out. He was the only man I ever loved. All my life I've thought maybe I'd run across him again. I wanted to stay young for him. He was going on West. He traveled with us several days. We camped on the prairie at night. He was going to start his law office farther West. I can shut my eyes and see it all yet . . . the wide sweep of the prairie . . . and the stars . . . and the wind . . . and Ben Erwin.

"It's nothing but a dream, of course. Anybody with sense knows that. But I've carried it about with me all these years. I was going to wait for him; but something happened. It isn't necessary to go into that. And we parted . . . and I never knew what became of him. I married Henry Jeffers and had a child. But Ben Erwin was the man I loved. I thought we'd meet again some day. I told myself it just had to be. But we never did. And now he's dead!"

Grandma's eyes were moist with sympathy. "Well, well, and if I hadn't turned you away, it would have saved you a lot of sorrow in your life."

"No. Oh, no! I wouldn't have it different, even now. Isn't it queer, Grandma? It was I and it was you! Well, I never could forget him. Forty-eight years ago, and it's still a part of me. You'd think a person would get over a thing like that, wouldn't you? With a thousand interests in life? I've traveled around a good deal. And it seems as though he has been with me. He's stood beside me at times . . . on a Scotch brae . . . and in St. Peter's . . . and once at Naples. At unusual times, you know. Then he's come. Forty-eight years ago, and the dream never left me.

"And I married Mr. Jeffers, many years older than I . . . and I had a child. Sometimes the dream seems wicked, and sometimes it seems beautiful. But, wicked or beautiful . . . it has stayed!"

There were tears in her young-old eyes. They welled over the touched-up lids, hard little tears, as though they came painfully, and slipped down the elaborate make-up. That little air of superiority, of condescension, was gone.

"Life wasn't what I meant it to be—roaming, restless . . . and trying to keep young, so if I should meet him. I suppose I ought to have accepted age sensibly . . . philosophically . . . like you have, Grandma. But I've thought life just couldn't go by without my seeing him again. And I wanted to be young for him. It's been my dream. A dream's a silly thing to carry around with you, isn't it? But there's no age or time limit to it. And even a dream is worth suffering for . . . if it just possesses you!"

A WEEK from Thursday, Mr. Jensen's little feather-weight car drew up in front of Grandma Burnham's, and Mrs. Jensen flew over with the key. Simultaneously, Sue Maybrick came from her yard, rolling down her sleeves over enormous arms. Children, coming home from school, stopped at the yard, and Jennie Wing hurried over from across the street. As they came up, Grandma stepped heavily out of the car.

She had on her best black with the white cuffs and collar. The erstwhile chic hat with the noble pompon was slightly awry. With uniform interest the neighbors all stared at the car. For behind Grandma a trim silken leg in a silver-buckled pump lightly touched the running-board, to be followed by a slender little bob-haired lady in a very gay and very youthful rose-colored coat and hat.

"Hello, everybody!" Grandma was beaming. Then she turned to the supple figure springing nimbly to the ground.

"This," she said, and chuckled wickedly, "is Grandmother Jeffers! I'll admit she ain't just what you'd call feeble; but we've grown to be mighty good friends, and she's come home with me to stay a few weeks!"

Is

your teeth's foe?

Do your teeth have a dingy, yellowish tinge? They should be a pearly white—because that is enamel's natural color.

Then why, you ask, do mine have that yellowish cast despite daily brushing?

Because of a "liquid cement" in your saliva. This is called Calculus. It glues to your teeth—then hardens into a glassy mask. It completely veils the lustrous enamel. And worse, it is an absorbent . . . drinks in coffee, food and tobacco stains like a blotter absorbs ink. These discolor it—give it that yellowish tinge.

Ordinary dentifrices cannot remove it. Only one thing can, safely—a peculiar substance known as "Tri-Calcium Phosphate." Your dentist uses it to clean teeth. It makes a tooth fairly dazzle.

Now, dental science gives you this wonderful "Tri-Calcium Phosphate" in a tasty, pleasant tooth paste. That means a sure and positive way to remove that yellow mask for glorious pearly teeth. Often this occurs in a few applications.

What do dentists say?

The name of this marvelous tooth paste is ORPHOS. Dentists everywhere endorse it—especially for teeth difficult to whiten. Convince yourself of its wonderful powers to beautify. Get a tube now from your druggist—or mail coupon below for generous FREE Tube.

"Every Time I Blunder, Jab Me in the Ribs"

thing that almost cost him his health. In less than seven months' time he completed a two-years course in high school. Also, urged on by his mother, he studied music and voice culture. His mother held a half-expressed, half-suppressed hope that some day her boy would sing.

"How could you afford to study music?" I asked Mr. Sincere. "How did you find time for it?"

"I couldn't afford it," he answered. "I worked for it. An outstanding baritone of the time was George Ellsworth Holmes. He permitted me to clean his studio and care for his correspondence in exchange for singing lessons. As to finding time, you will discover there is a lot of time in twenty-four hours if you will devote it to one thing—work."

Work! Sincere, the boy, knew nothing else. Play was no part of his training. His indefatigable father set him a Spartan example.

"Up until I was thirty-eight years old," Mr. Sincere confessed, "I had never seen a mountain, nor an ocean, nor a summer resort, nor Niagara Falls. Business had taken me to New York, but it hadn't allowed me time to see more than my hotel and a few office buildings.

"I never took a vacation until I had passed thirty-eight; but I say it regretfully, not boastfully. I lost a great deal by giving my whole time to work.

"WORK, it is said, never kills. Maybe not; but it hardens. Too much work may congeal the human kindness in a man. It is likely to make him angular, with a heart of sharp edges, or to leave him as flat and tasteless as oatmeal without salt.

"To-day I revere and honor the memory of my father. His devotion to his profession was marvelous, and I never shall forget his exhaustless energy. But I wish he had played some with us youngsters; I wish he had smiled more, had lost his dead seriousness once in a while. He died an old man, but the world beyond his medicine satchel was a stranger to him.

"He taught me many things to do; but likewise he taught me many things not to do, though I didn't awake to them all at once.

"Thank heaven, I've played with my children! They're my pals. I've hung over a ship's rail, seasick, and I've thrilled at the grandeur of an ocean storm. In my later years I've spent money foolishly for foolish things, and I've spent hours chasing a golf ball, or listening to the voice of a great singer. And I'm a better man for it. I'm a better worker for it!"

Mr. Sincere paused, his eyes sparkling, and presently he continued:

"When I went to college—the University of Chicago—I got away from work for the first time. I tried for the football team and made it. There I came under a new master, Alonzo Stagg, the famous coach. Stagg's watchword was teamwork. He didn't try to submerge the individual in the group, but to emphasize his individuality by making it work in harmony with other individualities for a common end. He never forgot that, while a team must be a unit, it takes eleven men to make a team, and that no two of the eleven are alike. That was my first lesson in organization; and I've never forgotten it.

"I helped organize the college glee club and joined a fraternity. Between times, I sang professionally at various functions, was usher in a theatre, and picked up whatever odd jobs came along, to help pay my way through college. George Ellsworth Holmes died, and my services as studio janitor and secretary were inherited by Frank T. Baird, another singer, who continued to give me free singing lessons.

"Graduation was in 1897, and for a year more I kept in touch with the university, as a football coach and director of the glee club. Then—"

"What?" I prompted, as he hesitated.

"My play days were over. I had to buckle down under a taskmaster, at three dollars a week, to learn law."

THE old lawyer into whose employ Sincere went as a clerk long had been a friend of his father's. They were much alike in philosophy, built along the same stern, unyielding lines. The old lawyer never had married. Childless, homeless, his one love was his law books.

"My son, you are fortunate in such a teacher," declared Doctor Sincere. "Mark my word, you will learn your law well."

And Sincere did. Twelve hours a day, never less, often more, he put in at that law office under the old lawyer's unrelenting eye.

He was thorough, that old barrister. No half-measures went with him. Every case that came to him was tried in his office before it was tried in court. The clients that came to the office, of course, were defendants. Sincere was expected to prepare the details of their defense. The old lawyer, who was to present that defense in court, prepared the prosecution.

In a word, he worked up both sides of the case; and then, with the stenographer sitting as judge, and with all the seriousness of a real court, they staged a mock trial that was far from a mockery. Sincere played the defendant attorney. The old lawyer became the prosecutor of the man who, later, in fact, he was to defend. And in these mock trials Sincere was expected to win; his defense had to be better than the prosecution!

"Know your opponent's case better than he knows it!" was the old lawyer's favorite injunction. "Be prepared, in advance, for more than his worst!"

So those two, student and master, battled away like two tomcats strung over a clothes-line. To the youth who could sing, and who itched for freedom, it was slavery, with the whip of that old lawyer's tongue constantly menacing him. But he did learn law.

Also he learned the law of action and reaction as it is applied to life. He learned to ask himself before he did a thing: "What will be the consequence if I do this?" and, "How can I fore-check that consequence?" His whole life began to be governed by this law.

He was still singing in public as occasion

College Man Wins Big Advancement

—by the Accountancy Route

Ralph J. Daly, college-bred engineer, had made an excellent record at the University of Michigan—so satisfactory, in fact, that for three years he taught engineering at the University of Pennsylvania.

Seeking a greater opportunity, he gave up teaching for business—joined the Detroit Trust Company—but there he found himself doing little more than marking time.

Mr. Daly saw that he needed a grasp of business principles and methods which his college training had not supplied. He enrolled with LaSalle for home-study training in Higher Accountancy.

Today he is Secretary-Treasurer of the Detroit Fidelity and Surety Company—a position which he credits largely to the practical training which he got from LaSalle. "I feel that it was the one great factor," he writes, "which enabled me to find myself in the business world."

Send for Salary-Doubling Plan

Do you appreciate what accountancy means in the business world? Do you realize that it constitutes the indispensable foundation for success in any business undertaking? Would you seriously fit yourself for positions paying $3,000, $5,000, $10,000 a year, and even better?

LaSalle has prepared a 64-page book entitled "Accountancy, the Profession that Pays." The information it contains is of very real and definite value. It will pay you well to read it. And—LaSalle will send it to you free.

Balance the two minutes that it takes to fill out the coupon against the rewards of a successful career—then clip and mail the coupon—NOW.

offered. The little he earned as a law clerk wasn't sufficient upon which to exist. One day the manager of a theatre sent for him.

"I've been told about your voice," he said. "Let me hear it."

Willingly enough, Sincere sang for him.

"You're wasting time and talent down in that law office," declared the manager when he had finished. "You belong on the stage. All you need to make a success is experience. I'll pay you fifty dollars a week, and double it later, if you'll let me start you on a stage career."

SINCERE'S first impulse, of course, was to jump at the chance. It was such an obvious opportunity. Another career was being made for him. But this impulse represented but one side of the case. What about the other?

"I must think it over," he decided. "I'll let you know in two weeks."

Then deliberately he began to arrange in his mind all of the consequences that might result if he accepted the offer. On one side he set the favorable consequences, and they were many. On the other he set the unfavorable.

"If I become a singer," he said, "I'll be dependent upon my voice. The voice is a fragile thing. Should it fail me, I'd have to begin all over again. Moreover, if I become a singer I shall have to drift from place to place. Do I want to be a rover?"

So young Sincere stuck to his underpaid job in the law office, getting his practical experience by day and reading his law at night. He had a wonderful teacher in his father's old friend. With all his severity he liked the young student. And when Sincere won his place as a member of the Illinois Bar without ever having stuck his nose inside the doors of a law school, the old fellow was afire with enthusiasm and pride.

"I've been waiting for this day," he exclaimed. "From now on you shall be my partner. You, not I, will try the cases in court. When I go this office, this practice, will be yours."

Once again a ready-made career was being offered to Sincere. Only those who have fought, unknown and seemingly unwanted, to gain a foothold in a crowded profession know how big that opportunity loomed to the newly fledged lawyer. Not one beginner in ten thousand would have hesitated.

But Sincere did hesitate. The habit of analysis was ingrained deep in him now. "Wait," he said. "I must be sure." And opposite the palpable advantages of the offer he began to set down the disadvantages. One of these he at once saw was insurmountable: he and the old lawyer were of different temperaments, different ideals, of conflicting philosophies. Never in the world, as partners, would they be able to agree.

"I can't take the partnership," he decided. "I must go it alone."

"Have you lost your mind?" his father demanded. "I can't help you. Here's a man who can. Jump at the chance!"

The old lawyer was stunned. He couldn't comprehend such an attitude. He scolded, ranted, then pleaded. Here he was offering success on a golden platter, to have the platter thrust away.

"I want my own office," Sincere repeated. He didn't have the heart to

No salesman will call upon you expose his real reason, to point back to those three years of drudgery that told him a partnership would never do.

From a real estate firm he rented an office, four feet by eight feet, in an unused end of the firm's suite. By the time he had paid for a desk, a patch of carpet, some chairs, and a dozen or two imposing-looking law books, he had left exactly two dollars and fifty cents in cash. He hadn't a client or a fee in prospect. Ethics forbade him to solicit practice. All he could do was to sit down and wait.

Of course, he had to eat. He had to pay rent, and a lawyer was expected to have a stenographer. His singing enabled him to meet these demands. He sang in churches, at public functions of fraternal orders, at banquets. He was becoming known as a singer and was in demand. One big church paid him twenty-five dollars a service. I have already told you what happened when Sincere thought over his future as a singer.

Then Sincere did what was to his friends another preposterous thing. He had specialized in criminal law. His training had been chiefly in criminal actions. At last such a case came to him, that of a man charged with burglary. He put his soul into that case and won it. The alleged burglar went free.

"Thanks, Boss," grinned the acquitted man. "The next time they catch up with me I'll send for you again. I'll tell my friends about you, too."

A word or two more, and Sincere sat in a sickened daze. He had been sure the man was innocent. Now he was more than sure he was guilty. That was his first and last criminal case!

Little by little other work started to come in. The real estate firm whose office suite he shared sent a few minor legal matters his way. Finding the work well handled they gave him more important matters, including some equity proceedings at court. The outlook began to brighten.

A STRIKE threatened suddenly in the cloak and suit industry. Vainly the employers had tried to reach the governor in an effort to get him to call an immediate session of the Arbitration Board, the one hope of checking the strike. They were at their wits' end, when somebody by a freak of chance mentioned the name of Sincere.

"You mean the singer?" another asked. "How can he help us?"

"Not long ago he sang at the Executive Mansion," it was explained. "The governor is friendly to him, and when he isn't singing Sincere is a lawyer!"

Sincere was reached on the telephone. "Will the governor listen to you?" he was asked. "Will he even see you?"

"I think he will," promised Sincere, his heart in his throat. "I'm ready to try."

He set out at once for the state's capital. The governor, lover of music, saw him readily. What was more, he listened. The Arbitration Board was summoned by telegraph. Before the day was out the strike difficulty was in its hands and settled. The delighted manufacturers decided they needed Sincere as a permanent fixture, and made him secretary and attorney of the Chicago Cloak and Suit Manufacturers' Association. Thus, by a single stroke, he made a name.

The law firm of Job and Taylor was then big in the Chicago corporation field. Frederick W. Job, the senior member, summoned young Sincere. "We can use you," he said, "in our office. There's a desk here if you'll take it."

Sincere decided on a bold stroke. "If you mean an employee's desk, Mr. Job," he said, "I don't want it. If you mean a partner's desk, I'll consider it."

Job gasped, scowled, stared. "Young man," he snapped, "most lawyers would be willing to work years for that honor. But I like your nerve."

A month later a new sign went up over the big law firm's entrance door. It read, "Job, Taylor, and Sincere."

NOW a new world opened. One manufacturers' organization after another enlisted Sincere's services. He became a go-between for employer and employee in their labor difficulties. He had that invaluable ability to see both sides of a controversy. His habit of calm analysis made him a born mediator.

One of his clients was the State Street Stores' Association. Twice or thrice a week he met with the big store managers, until he began to be saturated with ideas on store management, retail merchandising, and problems of the department store business. And in his capacity as liaison officer between management and workers, he got close to the workers as well.

Incidentally, he had married a Cleveland girl whose family long had known the Sinceres. His father-in-law, Colonel Louis Black, was president of the Bailey Company, operators of a new department store in Cleveland which wasn't doing very well. It was selling goods, but it was not making money. The profits leaked mysteriously away. Colonel Black blamed the store's failure to pay, on its location and on various other things.

"No, it isn't the location, and it isn't these other things," Sincere kept telling him upon his visits. "Your fault is that you don't place enough importance on the employee—the clerk, the stock-room boy, the elevator man. You haven't got them pulling for you."

He was recalling some of the things Alonzo Stagg had taught him about teamwork while he was in college. He also kept retailing to Colonel Black some of the ideas he had picked up in his contact with merchants in Chicago.

One day Sincere stopped off in Cleveland in connection with a business trip, and dropped in, as usual, to pay his respects to Colonel Black. "I've a message for you," said Black. "It is going to surprise you mightily. Our board of directors wants you to become superintendent of this store."

"What's the joke?" said Sincere. "I'm a lawyer, not a merchant."

"No," Black repeated; "it's no joke. It's a bona fide offer. We can pay you only a third of what you are earning, to start. All we can promise is possibilities. But we want you here."

"But should I accept," Sincere demanded, "what, in the name of common sense, do you expect me to do, a lawyer in a department store?"

Black answered: "We expect you to take those ideas with which you've been filling me and make them workable here."

When Sincere left his father-in-law's office his mind was in a muddle. For a young man—he was twenty-nine—he already had gone far in the law. There wasn't a doubt that he would go higher. He liked the law and the work he was doing. On the other hand, there were possibilities in the store business! Bailey's was a mine of them, he felt. He believed in the ideas he had been expounding.

Once again Sincere was faced with a situation that required sound analysis. He had established himself as a lawyer. His future was certain. He began to weigh that certainty against the possibilities in the store business. Slowly but firmly the balance of favor began to lean toward the department store. He wound up by taking a six months' leave of absence from Job, Taylor, and Sincere.

Without saying a word to any of his intimates, save his wife, he went to one of Chicago's biggest department stores and took a job. That job paid him fifteen dollars a week. It consisted of driving one of the store delivery wagons. Two weeks he drove the wagon; and from this lowly point in the big Chicago store organization he looked up at it, like a man in a well gazing at the stars.

"If there are no possibilities here for the wagon driver," he reasoned, "there will be none for me as superintendent."

From the delivery wagon he went to the inside and got work as a floor-walker. Now, in addition to looking upward through the maze of executive posts to the top, he studied the people who came into the store to buy, and the employees of the store who waited upon them. He sunned himself in that store atmosphere, breathed it, boxed it up in a mental laboratory and analyzed it like a chemist.

"Is it good?" he asked himself. "Is it my atmosphere? Do I really belong here?"

He cornered the stock-room boy at lunch, and talked stocks. He walked home with clerks and drank in their observations. He got to know the boys on the elevators as Joe and Bill and Sam.

And each night in his study at home he made his check, this against that, that against this. Three months he studied, searched, and analyzed. Gradually he formed a picture of the future that was brilliant in its promise. There were possibilities for the store wagon driver, big, live possibilities! Store life was good! Retailing was service! Not service to a few but service to thousands!

YOU know that he took the superintendency at Bailey's, for I let that out of the bag at the outset. But let me tell you of one of the first striking things he did there. With money from his own pocket he hired a noted advertising authority familiar with department stores.

"I don't want you to write advertising," said Sincere. "I want you to write criticisms, and in particular criticisms of me. I'm a novice in this work. I'm going to blunder and look foolish a hundred times a day. Every time I do, I want you to give me a jab in the ribs. You are hired to tell me what is wrong with me!"

One of the things the critic told Sincere was that he couldn't hope to be "the whole show."

"At the rate you're going," he said bluntly, "you'll be dead within five years' time. Give the other fellow a chance to do some work. That's what he's here for. You're not hired to do it all."

Again, the critic said, "Don't try to do so many things at once. Pick a few things and do them well. As it is, you're doing nothing well, at least not as well as you can."

Later on, after he felt he had improved, Sincere hired another critic to pick faults. Then he followed this with the inauguration of regular daily meetings of executives, held not so much to catch mistakes that had been made, as to avoid the making of future mistakes. Just as he had analyzed action for consequences in his own life, he had the store executives analyze it for the store.

He tried to create among the employees a state of mind which made them look up into the store as he had looked up from his job as a wagon driver in the Chicago store.

"You have a chance here," he told them. "We're going to fix this place so that you can't do a good thing in the store's interest without somebody above you hearing of it!"

HE FOUND an electrician's helper who always got things done. Nobody had to speak to him twice. The helper was promoted. After a little he was promoted again. To-day he is an executive.

An assistant floor-walker was found sleeping in the store on a cot one night. The reason, Sincere discovered, was that he had been working, voluntarily, in the store until two o'clock in the morning. Forthwith, another employee was marked for an executive post.

All through the organization workers began to go up. A new spirit got into the store. The leaks stopped. The business began to show profits. Some idea of what Sincere accomplished may be gained from the statement of a single fact: To-day, with one exception, the entire executive staff of Bailey's is made up of men and women who came up from the ranks of the store force!

When Colonel Black died in 1919 there wasn't a question as to who would be his successor. The one logical man for the presidency was Sincere. Four years ago he was also made president of National Department Stores, Inc., which then owned stores in four cities. Under Sincere that corporation swelled to its present size of fifteen big stores—in Portland, Oregon; Minneapolis, St. Paul, St. Louis, Detroit, Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Wheeling, Richmond, and Trenton. Pittsburgh has three of the stores, Philadelphia has two, and Wheeling two. I've already said that they employ fifteen thousand people!

THE easiest man in the world to get along with—that's Lawrence Aloysius Downs, president of the Illinois Central Railroad. Six feet of husky Irishman, "Larry" Downs is the hero of a career which, without dramatics or meteoric flashes, has led steadily toward the top. An average man he calls himself—yet he always manages, with amazing steadiness, to do the right thing at the right time. His personal story and business philosophy are such that any boy or man who reads this article next month, might well say, "The sort of thing he did I, too, can do."

STATEMENT of the ownership, management, circulation, etc., required by the act of Congress of August 24, 1912, of The American Magazine, published monthly at Springfield, Ohio, for April 1st, 1927, State of New York, County of New York—ss.: Before me, a notary public in and for the state and county aforesaid, personally appeared A. Strange Places of Worship

Devon, declaring that the cackling of the chickens and the other rustic noises disturb her so much that she has to flee to her London home in Holland Park when she wants to do serious literary work. When Compton Mackenzie wishes to start a new book, he seeks the quaint seclusion of one of the isolated Channel Islands.

Sheila Kaye-Smith says that she finds a hotel room a most excellent place for work, as the impersonal character of her surroundings enables her to concentrate without any desire to rearrange the furniture or to change the hangings! Du Bose Heyward, the author of "Porgy" and of "Angel," had built for himself a small cabin on a lonely hillside overlooking a peaceful valley in the mountains of western North Carolina. There he does his work, far from the tumult of civilization, hearing only the mountain winds in the hemlocks, the song of the stream in the glen.

All these places are really places of worship, for they are scenes of high thought, toil, and achievement. All life seems to be a struggle for some kind of self-expression, the utterance of aspiration in some form that aims to be permanent; and in this scheme of existence we apparently praise God best, not when we read the longest chapters in the Bible, or say the greatest number of prayers, but when we do our work most honestly, with the highest degree of quiet and loving fervor.

I REMEMBER an experience I had in the hills of southern Pennsylvania a few years ago. I was hunting for a nest of the ruffed grouse, one of the shyest and most romantic of birds, and my quest took me through swarthy thickets of rock-pines, through sunny glades, deep into the heart of the wilds. After a long ramble I decided to climb to the crest of a high hill, where a great cairn of rocks afforded an admirable site from which to view the surrounding country. I wanted to locate myself. But what was my surprise when, after a long climb, I reached the rocks to find that I was not alone. A grizzled mountaineer was sitting on a huge boulder, gazing out over the miles of beautiful wild country. I could not imagine what he could be doing there. He would not be hunting the nest of anything, and the hunting season for big game was far off. Yet, as most men do when they meet in the woods, we greeted each other as friends, and for a long time we sat together on the cliff.

I told him the object of my quest, but he did not tell me his until I was about to leave. After having directed me to where he said he thought I might find the nest of a grouse, he said, with a certain manly shyness, "I reckon you wouldn't know why I come here?"

I told him I did not know, and paused to hear.

"I believe you'll understand," he said. "I like this place because it's here that I come on God."

He waved his hand in a gesture that

How was the air this A.M. when you opened up your store?

FOUL, stagnant and close, wasn't it; actually unfit to breathe? Yes, that's the air your trade is greeted with — the atmosphere that's to invite business and promote good health.

An open door or window never entirely corrects this bad air condition because it's necessary to remove all this foul atmosphere before fresh air can enter — that's the law of scientific air movement — the essential factor in efficient ventilation.

For a few cents a day you can enjoy real ventilation in your store, office or workshop by installing an Ilg Electric Ventilator. Ask your electrical goods dealer for demonstration or send for 48-page, illustrated booklet.

took in the rolling sea of hills, stretching beyond the vision, and, to the east, the far-shining valley.

"I can't get the feeling at home somehow," he said, "nor yet always at the meeting-house; but it never fails me here."

Down through the woods I went, "Here I come on God" making music in my heart. A strange place of worship—that rugged hilltop! But about the memory of it there is something sacred to me.

SHRINES for worship, the world over, testify to the turning of the human spirit to God; but in reverencing these places we ought to remember that in the heart of each one of us God has a secret fane to which He especially loves to repair. He fashioned the place with wistful and tender care and He visits it often, to discover whether the music there is sweet, the prayer unfeigned, the lights shining upon the altar. A cathedral is truly a grand achievement; but I doubt whether God is much impressed by it. He who reared the firmament alone will hardly marvel at man's magnificence. What is the beauty that we build, to Him whose mansion is the dwelling place of light? I mean that we should not imagine that the splendor of an edifice can atone for our sins. If the shrine of the heart is dark and cold, vain are any temple's myriad lights, gorgeous windows, rolling music, and solemn hymns.

It appears that a man can worship most truly in that place in which he comes into harmony with the scheme of things. I have a friend who, when he is disgruntled with the world and all that therein is, goes out and cuts down a tree; then he sits on a log, rests, and peace comes stealing back to his soul. Another friend, when a hard rain is falling, loves to go to his woodshed, open at two ends, and there do his meditating. The rain is all around, and the hale smell of it, and the good odor of the wet earth, but he is dry. And there is for him in that strange setting a mystic spell cast over life. Rain is a living thing; it speaks to us of elemental forces of the world. This friend tells me that there is no other place in which he can think straighter, and meditate and worship more genuinely than in this humble woodshed, with bark and chips littering the floor, and with the streamers of the rain hanging silver curtains at the doors.

And how great is this provision of God! To give us a chance to worship in strange places! He wants us to be happy, and to approach him naturally. Fearfully and wonderfully He has made us; and not least wonderfully in this: that peace can come to us in the oddest places imaginable.

I once knew a very beautiful woman named Rosalie. She was happily married, and one little daughter made the joy of the household complete. I used to pass their little cottage in the pine lands; a vine-covered place it was, with roses rambling on the tiny porch, with the child's toys in the front yard, with everywhere the evidences that the man was a consistent and an intelligent worker.

Then came a sudden boom in Florida. The man decided to go there to investigate conditions, with a view to moving if the outlook was favorable. Drawing most of his savings from the bank, he left home. He never came back. A few days after he left there was a fearful train wreck in Florida, and there were some unidentified dead. Probably he was one. But, at any rate, Rosalie and the little girl never saw him again; and the little home that he had builded with his own hands started almost at once to go to decay. His loss was as a blight upon it.

I used to see the bereaved woman often, and the little girl and I were great friends. Every time I saw her she used to ask me if I knew how soon her Dad would be home.

Not far from the cottage was the river, a lordly stream flowing between high bluffs, from the tops of which one might see for several miles up and down the great watercourse. As the road that I traveled ran near the tallest of these bluffs, I could see the trees that fringed its edge; and I noticed that Rosalie often went with her little girl, or alone, to a fallen oak overlooking the river.

There was no need for her to expect her husband from that direction, for the road from Florida lay in the other direction. But there she would go to drink into her heart the beauty and stillness of the vast delta-country lying below her; to watch the dappled, dusky radiance of the sunlight falling on the mighty pines; to see the little waves scramble laughingly on the glimmering beach far below her. I know that there she came, after her trial, to some degree of peace once more. She told me so one day when I stopped to leave a few little gifts for her child.

"I am going to be all right," she said, "I go down every day to look at the river. For a long time I couldn't say my prayers. My faith seemed gone. But God has given it back to me again. I thought I could not love God any more; but I can adore him, I can worship Him—down there by the river."

OFTEN, indeed, our sorest need is for a change of environment, even though slight and temporary, which will afford us an opportunity for worship, a chance for the souls to search in freedom for the light. Our human joy is pain-surrounded; but beyond the pain is God, I believe. In our worst extremity He never forsakes us. To save us He made our hearts divinely insecure against the entreaties of love, the appeals of innocence and beauty. He makes us feel that something in us was not born, and cannot die. He makes us aware of His love; and we worship Him spontaneously, in many varying ways, because we know how merciful and wistful-tender He is toward us. If Rosalie could worship again, all the rest of us surely can.

Worship, it seems to me, is a natural part of human inclination; it is not an elaborate function conducted under circumstances of pomp and awe. After all, the question of where one worships is paltry compared to the vital question of how one worships; and if not with the whole heart, in an outpouring of joy and reconcilement, then not at all. I know that there must be millions who feel precisely as I do when I see the primitive, inevitable beauty of the rising sun, or the silvery somnambulism of the moon; the emotion to worship is as natural as the appeal of the heroic to a man, or the appeal of compassion to a woman.

I recall going to church one cloudy May morning, when the world was shrouded in fog. The minister preached a rather severe sermon from an Old Testament narrative, a story full of anger and sin and punishment. He had said that he was going to read to us "the Word of God." I confess that the services somewhat depressed me; and when they were over I was glad to reach the open air again. As I left the church, the sun broke through the mists, and set all the jeweled trees glittering; the birds began to sing; the flowers—I could almost hear them open! "The Word of God," I thought; "is it not a much greater and a much more heart-reaching thing than the Bible, great as is that wonderful library of human experience that we call a book? Is not virtuous Beauty everywhere the Word of God? God's writings—are they not the gleaming flowers and the lustral stars? The Universe is a Holy Scripture; there are Psalms of the forest trees, and Isaiahs in the voice of the Sea. And he is a reader of God's Word, who, apprehending the wonder and the loveliness of the world, knows that these things reveal the Maker. And he is the true worshiper whose spirit is joyous because it apprehends God."

I love that ancient word "worshipful." It means, I believe, "worthy of worship." And wherever we turn in the world we find those evidences of God's power and mercy that make Him worshipful to us. No wonder is it that there are many strange places of worship—there is so much to make us reverent and adoring.

There is an especial time when a flood of adoration fills my heart, a strange shrine, where I can worship as naturally and joyfully as a robin can sing above his new nest on an April twilight. It is in the wild pinelands in mid-March, when the long savannas glitter with the rain water through which the grasses are springing; when the air of early spring has a tinge of wood smoke in it; when from the margin of a sunny lagoon the first frogs begin their flutelike pipings; when the wind in the tall pines has in it the songs of hope and love.

TO ME, being in the pinelands at such a time, with azure clouds of bluebirds warbling like aërial rivulets; with everywhere the poignant, nameless promise that precedes the coming of Beauty; with the heart welling with unreflected joy—glad of life, of Creation, adoring the Creator, loving my fellow man, hoping for his happiness—such is true worship.

And such an inclination comes to me, and to all of us, far from creeds and churches. We are God's chi dren, wherever we be; we are in His hands. The world is His sanctuary; and while the superb modern highway of the church will, no doubt, take us home, there are some who know dewy by-paths to the same City; who follow flower-scented lanes of the spirit, pausing to wonder and adore in secret Him who, on the highway, is proclaimed with pomp and ceremony. To love God, we have only to apprehend Him; and we ought always to be very patient and tolerant toward those who find Him in their own way.

I take it that God designedly provided myriads of avenues of approach to Him; and those of us on one road should expect and rejoice in many serene arrivals by other paths, unseen of us, and totally different from the way we travel. If any one thing is right in this life, it is that every heart should be free to take its own

"For FIVE familiar household troubles

Handiest thing in the house"

Said 2000 women

A SPECIAL JAR of "Vaseline" Petroleum Jelly ought to be kept in the kitchen of every home for these common troubles:

To prevent rust—Pots, waffle irons, the iron parts of the kitchen stove, etc., can be kept black and free from rust by coating with "Vaseline" Jelly when not in use.

Screens—Prevent screens from getting rusty by oiling with a cloth in which a bit of "Vaseline" Jelly has been rubbed.

Household Lubrication—Use "Vaseline" Jelly in the grease cup of washing machines, electric fans, phonographs. It won't drip.

For fine furniture—Rub "Vaseline" Jelly on briskly with a soft cloth. Imparts a fine finish and preserves the wood. Old furniture needs this constant oiling.

Shoe cleaning—"Vaseline" Jelly is the best dressing for patent leather shoes. For scuffed black satin shoes, slick down with a tiny bit of "Vaseline" Jelly. For leather shoes rub well with "Vaseline" Jelly. Takes off that scuffed look all children's shoes get so easily. Also restores the softness of leather when shoes have been soaked.

And remember, when you buy, that the trademark "Vaseline" on the package gives you the assurance that you are getting the genuine product of the Chesebrough Manufacturing Company, Cons'd.

way to God. Every soul knows at least one way to heaven. Some hearts reach home by the way of the wild flowers; some are led by the frail, unerring hands of little children; some "meditate on Him in the night-watches," and ascend homeward by the silvery stairway of the stars.

I recall going one pitchy night through a wild wood, so dark that, against so swarthy a background, a black bear would have resembled his polar cousin. Some days before there had been a small fire in the woods near this place, and I noticed now and then a smoldering gleam from a charring stump, and once a strange mild flame burning almost as steadily as a candle. But these lights were stationary, and they were quickly passed, to be seen no more.

As I drove, however, what really guided me was a great star that, though often hid behind towering trees, would emerge blazingly—always in the same relative position. Vanishing and then coming gloriously to view again, it guided me and kept up my heart until I came at last to the end of forest—to open fields and houses. There was my star. I could not follow those other lights, but I could follow this. The one afforded fitful luminance; the other, eternal radiance. The thought made me want to worship: the thought that, despite the paltry, spluttering blazes of this life, stationary and unreliable, we do have great stars of truth and beauty to guide us out of the darkest forest of trouble.

Whatever makes us rejoice, makes us want to worship. We seem to want to tell God all about it, just as a child will take a new-found joy to its father and mother. Sorrow, too, should make us want to worship. If we tell God, we are better for the telling. In all the Bible I know nothing finer or more affecting than the attitude of Job when, as we are told, the full extent of his calamities had been made known to him, he "rent his mantle, . . . fell down upon the ground, and worshiped." In the agony of his sorrow he blessed God, worshiping Him in the dust, and from the ashes of appalling grief. A strange time and place for worship!

AS a boy, I went to a school conducted by a private family; and often at recess, because water has always exercised a certain fascination over me, I used to go down to the river that flowed by the end of the ample old yard, where I could watch flocks of wild ducks deploying over the delta, the sun rays prancing on the river waves, and the romantic far shores stretching dreamily toward the distant sea.

A tiny river tug used often to be anchored near my favorite rendezvous, and through my frequent visits to the river I came to know quite well the negro engineer. He was a most unusual character; and now that, as a man, I remember him, he looms much larger as a significant human being than he did when I, as a barefoot boy, used to listen to stories of his adventures on the great river.

Several things about this man, Hacklus Manigo, impressed me. The one that never failed to fascinate me was the immaculate condition of the crude little engine of which he was the overlord. All the steel parts shone glossily; all the brass parts beamed and glistened and winked. Yet the engine crouched in the most dingy of holds, and the windows of the engine-room were grimed and battered.

The province of Hacklus terminated with the engine itself; and in his miniature kingdom there was always the beauty of order and the order of beauty. Nor did this strange negro like to leave his humble throne. For hours he would perch on the window sill of the engine-room, a little copy of the New Testament in his hands. He never tired of reading this, the most profound book in the world.

There are many people who think of a negro only as a minstrel; but it is only justice for me to testify that I have learned the meaning of religion and of worship even from this humble source. I asked Hacklus one day where he went to church. His answer was remarkable; and it is one of the things I have treasured all these years. As it was given me, it was as free from self-righteousness as the prayer of the Publican.

"I try to live in God's sight," he said simply. "I think that's going to church."

THERE is a shrine at which I can worship most readily. It is the shrine of memory. I think of those who loved me, and are gone. And I can truly worship the remembrance of them, not alone because they loved me, but because I can feel the goodness of God even through bereavement. The human tie may be severed; but only to make a bond that no fate shall ever break. The mortal rose is gathered, only to lend aid to the amaranth to rise. Death divorces, but he unites. He comes at first to steal away, but at last he shall restore forever what he has taken. I count this thought full of joy and wonder and hope: that they who are joined by death are never parted. It is easy to discover that I believe in personal immortality. I do, with all my heart. No human soul that feels that God is Love could reasonably take any other view. Indeed, it is the only view that makes and keeps life sweet and rational.

Strange places of worship! A woodshed in the rain, with a robin's song mingling musically with the drip from the eaves; Job in the dust with his fresh sorrows; Wash Green on his knees before the dying fire, an immortal soul communing, among hounds, with his God; Rosalie—gentle, beautiful, heartbroken Rosalie—coming again to worship because she found peace by the river; Hacklus, keeping in God's sight, and therefore always worshiping. Strange places, true worshipers!

We worship when we love best "all things both great and small," as Coleridge reminds us. We worship best when we spend our heart's best. And it seems that they were given us for such spending.

COAL and oil in the discard! Food from water, wood, and coal tar; and a whole dinner in capsules! Gold made in factories! Heat that travels in only one direction—from the outside in or the inside out! It sounds like a pipe dream; but next month, in Dr. Henry Smith Williams's amazing article, 'Six Ways to Make a Billion Dollars," these seemingly unbelievable and fan-'tastic prophecies are brought into the realm of scientific possibility.

makes them think you can sell books?"

"Best grounds in the world. Proved it to them in the field." And I proceeded to relate how, about a year ago, while I was a graduate student at Columbia, I had gone into this affair to relieve one of my periodic financial panics. "I guess I was a knock-out, too; though you don't seem to appreciate the fact. Cleaned up a round twenty-five dollars the first day out."

"And what brilliant prospect was it that lured you away from so remunerative an enterprise?" asked Janet.

"Nothing lured me away," I said rather coldly. "It was nothing but a stop-gap. I needed some money, that was all. Having got it, I went back to my studies, as I had to. Anyhow, this is a much bigger proposition. It's an offer of a field managership. It's a real—"

"At the end of another three months' soliciting, observe," Janet put in quietly.

"It's a real opening," I finished doggedly, "a job that many a man would give a lot to have thrown at him."

"No doubt," she persisted, "but not a man of your training. You don't need a job, dear. You have one. What is more, you have a future."

"Yes, if the present doesn't play the deuce with it," I grumbled. "This literary game is all very fine," I went on; "I wish I could make a go of it. But it is not everything. I'll be blamed if I make a martyr of myself for it—of myself and of you. It just sickens me to see you scrimp and worry and deny yourself everything."

"Oh, don't upset yourself about me," Janet said laughingly, "I am quite prepared to stick it out." Then her face became serious. "Did you say you cleared twenty-five dollars the first day? I'd like you to tell me what your sales netted the sixth day, or was there a sixth?"

IT WAS an uncomfortable moment. I did not much like being reminded of that tail-end of that job, when the first enthusiasm had evaporated and the returns climbed down toward zero. "Why, the average for the week," I said evasively, "was about fifteen dollars per day. Anyway, the best answer to your question is that the concern wants me back, with a splendid promise of advancement."

"Subscription-book agents are hard to get, and harder to hold," insisted Janet. "It must be rather disagreeable work. And you evidently did make an impression—for a week. I suspect, though, that they are far from convinced. That is why they ask for that three months' tryout in the field before committing themselves. Can you imagine yourself trudging from door to door for three months? Oh, I am not doubting your ability. You could do it all right, that or almost anything else, if you would put your whole will and soul into it. But will you? I'll tell you in advance what is going to happen. After about three days, you'll be hankering for your desk and your typewriter."

"Well," I still held out, "So long as I

DANDRUFF

LIKE many other serious problems—dandruff deserves expert treatment. You can easily find many preparations that claim to "cure" dandruff. One special dandruff treatment has stood the test of years. It is called Wildroot. And it works.

The hardy dandruff germ

Dandruff is, indeed, a stubborn condition. The pernicious germ that causes dandruff is a "hard-to-kill" little fellow. Wildroot is specially designed to fight this germ—to chase him out of your scalp.

Such is the story of Wildroot. Not a "hairgrower." Not a "cure-all". . . but a special remedy. An expert at removing dandruff.

There is no magic about Wildroot. It must be used faithfully. One treatment will not end a stubborn case of dandruff. But, as you use Wildroot day by day, you will see the dandruff loosen up . . . and gradually disappear.

ONE WOMAN WRITES:
"I have used Wildroot Hair Tonic for a number of years, and find that nothing can equal it for dandruff."

"Four Raises in Two Years"

"AND it hasn't been hard to get them, either. Why, it seems only yesterday that I was wondering if I would ever make as much as $45 a week. And now I'm making $75.

"Tom Dawson was speaking about it today. 'Gee,' he said, 'I wish I had started studying with the I. C. S. when you did. Here I am plugging away at the same old job and the same old salary while you've gone 'way up. I bet you're making twice as much as I am. And to think that two years ago we were working side by side.'

"I told him it wasn't too late if he would only make the start and he said he was going to send in one of those I. C. S. coupons right away.

"I hope he does, because an I. C. S. course is the very thing he needs to get out of the rut. I wouldn't be making anywhere near $75 a week if I hadn't started to study just when I did."

Every day, in office, shop and factory, you will find men who are being given better positions and larger salaries because they are studying at home in spare time with the International Correspondence Schools.

An I. C. S. course helped Jesse G. Vincent to rise from tool-maker to Vice-president of the Packard Motor Car Company. It helped George Grieble to rise from a stone-mason to the owner of a business paying $12,000 a year. It helped Bert S. Remaley to increase his salary ten times. And it will help you too, if you will only make the start.

must earn my living at something else for the time being, I might as well take a job that at least would keep the wolf from the door. Teaching doesn't even do that!"

Then Janet added her final argument: "Remember," she said, "that in another six weeks your long vacation from school duties begins. Two months and a half of freedom. Then you will prove to yourself that you can write!"

WELL, thank the lord, Janet was pretty nearly right. By the end of that summer I had a book well under way, parts of which went to make a series of magazine articles. When the following fall the book itself appeared, we were securely launched. Janet sat back and heaved a sigh of relief. She had got me into port safely. The day was saved.

How little she knew! It was only now that her stormy career as the wife of a Wandering Jew began in earnest.

Success and a little prosperity, far from allaying my restlessness, served rather to spread its wings. The vagabond in me, so long held down by necessity, broke out of his confinement, stretched his cramped limbs, and asserted himself.

I tackled our domestic arrangements first. So long as I was teaching and the monthly pay check barely kept our heads above water, it did not much matter where we lived. But now affairs had greatly changed. My writing had brought me many literary friendships, and the acquaintance of a variety of well-to-do and prominent people. We were invited out a good deal. But our remote residence at the far end of New York prevented us from making the most of our social opportunities.

I pleaded with Janet: "See here, we must put on a little more front. Everybody we know lives down-town."

"I know, dear," she agreed. "But we can't afford to live down-town."

"We cannot afford to go on like this," I retorted. "I need the society of stimulating people. If I could have more life and recreation, both the quality and the quantity of my work would be improved, and the higher receipts would more than make up for the increased expenses. Besides, I fail to see why we cannot swing a rent double the present one, anyhow. Things are coming in all along, and there is quite a neat reserve."

"I know," she agreed again. "I also know that there is such a thing as overdoing the stimulation commodity. I've noticed that it's as easy to talk yourself out of a writing mood as it is to talk yourself into one. And I guess our reserve won't blow up the bank. It is not spending money, you know. It is working capital, to keep the pot boiling while this new book is getting written."

Eventually, we compromised by joining one of the art clubs in the heart of town, and entertaining our friends there. As it was too expensive to indulge in often, I was not tempted to stimulate myself more than was good for me. By attending to my job many miles away from the literary Rialto, interruptions were reduced to a minimum. Even at that, it was a year before the second book was ready for the publisher. But for Janet's level-headedness, we would have been strapped in three months. She had saved the day again.

Then came the old craving for jobs. I argued that free-lancing was too insecure, that I needed expansion. This sticking to one narrow line of work was overspecializing me and cramping my powers. A desk in an office brought a fellow out, put him on his mettle, kept him keen, and a lot more of the same kind.

Moreover—though I kept this to myself—I had always dreamed of a newspaper connection. At the university I had gone pretty deeply into plays and the history of the theatre, with an eye on dramatic criticism. With my new friendships, I could easily land something like that now. I was interested in politics, too, and the whirl of Washington fascinated me. I could do specials for any one of three newspapers and a couple of weeklies.

Janet did not counter-argue. She conceded freely all my points. I did know the theatre. An occasional trip to the Capital would be a refreshing experience. And then, one nice evening, she punctured the bubble with her pencil point. She showed me in black and white that these little luxuries would simply bankrupt me. I was a slow and painstaking writer. I had never had the drilling training of the reporter. It took me a month to write what the average newspaper man turned out in a day or two.

I never haunted the newspaper offices with wistful eye after that evening. There's nothing sadder in this life than giving up a dream. But it is a wise man who knows when to let go.

TRAVEL occupied my fancy consistently throughout this period, and became a very keen urge between the first and the second book. I pointed out to Janet that, since we could not afford the rents of mid-town, we could at least get all the life and variety I was hungering for abroad without increasing our budget. Life in Europe was so much more reasonable than over here. Besides, she herself was a Frenchwoman, and she had never ceased hoping to go back some day. There could not be a better time to do it than at that very time.

It was a cruel temptation to set before her. But Janet held on to herself. She went over my figures with filmy eyes, and then put her finger on a little characteristic oversight of mine. It was my plan to go for six months, until the book was completed. I had accurately estimated all the costs, and the net total did leave quite a margin between a comfortable living in Paris and our cautiously modest one in New York. The only item I had forgotten to include was boat fares! I am afraid Janet suspects me to this day of having done it on purpose. When that was added, it not only wiped out the alleged saving, but it turned the balance the other way by about thirty per cent.

Ever since the publication of my first book, requests for lectures from clubs and chambers of commerce had been coming in. The majority of them I was obliged to decline, greatly to my regret. Those that I could squeeze in between one piece of work and the next I accepted. Janet raised no objections. She felt that it was good for me to have a change of air now and then, rub elbows with new people, and exercise my vagabond propensities moderately.

Original from UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

I was in Pittsburgh delivering a talk one day when a telegram was relayed to me from my office in New York. It contained an offer of a lectureship under the joint auspices of the State Bureau of Immigration of California and one of the universities out there. The engagement was to be for three months, and the terms were rather generous.

"My first impulse was to accept without consulting headquarters. It wasn't often such opportunities presented themselves while I was away from the restraints of home. On second thought, I decided it was only fair to let Janet know about it. She wired back: "I leave it to your own good judgment. But come home first."

The joker was in that second sentence. I knew exactly what my own good judgment would look like after Janet was through with it. So, with a heavy heart, and without further ado, I telegraphed my regrets to California.

FROM what I have said up to this point, perhaps you will conclude that Janet's sole concern in life has been to keep me toeing the mark, simply so as to assure my material success. This is a good time to correct such an impression.

For in the last incident which I am going to relate, it was she, not I, who flung prudence and financial consideration to the winds, and at the height of our prosperity took up the knapsack, so to speak, and went awandering. She did it, not because she had suddenly become converted to my point of view. It was nothing but a desperate step in the purpose which she had set herself all along—the task of keeping me from scattering my shot. When I think of the risks and sacrifices she so blithely exposed herself to, I cannot but be amazed at her pluck.

It dawned on Janet, very simply, that she must fight fire with fire. She must give me such a knock-out dose of the gypsy virus as would cure me of the hankering for good and all.

It was now about a year since the publication of my first book. Among other people whose attention had been drawn to the book was a wealthy lady noted for her philanthropic activities. She asked me to come and dine at her home one day. The book, I should mention at this point, was the life story of an immigrant; and this was the time when the Americanization movement was at its height. Before the evening was over, the hostess had made me an offer to head a new organization in that field along particularly novel lines.

I took up the proposal eagerly. The work, to begin with, was very near to my heart. It gave me a respite after the exhausting toil of my last book, and the leisure to collect my thoughts for the next. Then, too, it would bring me in contact, socially and professionally, with all sorts of prominent and interesting people. Not least, my income would be doubled at a jump, and secured for as long as I wished.

My recollection is that Janet was not as delighted as I was. Indeed, I have a vague memory of her commenting gloomily, "So you are to become a reformer! And what becomes of the author I married?"

Of course I light-heartedly assured her that the author would flourish more luxuriantly now than ever.

But he didn't. He languished in obliyion for some eighteen months. And Janet's discontent grew in proportion. And then she started out to fight fire with fire.

I speak of her plan as if I had been in her secret. But I did not know of it until we had been in Europe for many months. She had begun to talk Europe almost as soon as I had started my new venture. She said she was homesick, that she wanted to see her old friends, that I had long ago promised her the trip, and much more. And, naturally, I did not require much tempting.

Unhappily, literature went on languishing, even abroad. There was so much to see and do over there, especially after an absence of twenty years. The oddest thing about it was that now Janet did not seem to mind. Our reserves were melting like the snows in April; we were spending money just as if I still were at the head of my organization in New York. But Janet was beaming with a kind of inner light.

WHEN the bare rock began showing through the snows of our savings, I said: "Janet dear, we'll have to begin thinking about getting some money."

To which she answered—and I still maintain that there was a note of triumph in her tone—"Well, what do you think of doing some real work for it?"

I chewed on that for a while, and concluded that the idea was not a bad one, especially as for the nonce I could think of nothing better.

As to what followed, I feel a little hesitant about details. It is getting rather near home. I will say this: That I would not have related the tale of Janet's bridge-burning pluck unless it had had a happy ending. And also this: That since adopting Janet's good advice, the author has been flourishing gayly.

The question still remains whether Janet has really succeeded in curing me of the gypsy. To be quite truthful, I doubt it. She has driven him underground; that is about all. Moreover—I may whisper to you confidentially—I do not believe she wants him done to death. Having succeeded in taming and domesticating her mate—as every woman must do if she is to go on living with him—and having secured a working arrangement on a fifty-fifty basis, and a little better, she is inclined to let well enough alone and take me mostly as I am.

DO WILD animals think? Observers disagree on the subject. You will be interested, next month, in reading what Wynant Davis Hubbard has to say about it. Not only has he hunted big game extensively in Africa, but he has spent endless hours in watching wild animal mothers instill "Thought" into the empty little heads of their babies. He has seen fleeing elephants return to help a wounded comrade; he has satisfied himself that wart-hogs use reason in learning how to wade. His article is full of remarkable examples of animal perspicacity.

GUARANTEED HEAT ALL OVER THE HOUSE WITH ECONOMY

Gone are the iron stove days

Lazy black smoke floating from the chimney used to signal that Zeke had started the fire for the winter. Inside his Four Corners General Store, the town's choice spirits gathered. A spring-bell announced each opening of the door, while snow-laden air beat and sizzled on the glowing iron of the round stove. Comfortably perched near it, they talked of politics, crops, rabbit-hunts.

Today, Four Corners is the site of a well-planned department store, whose chimney almost never shows smoke. And the old iron stove has given way to a Capitol boiler in the basement with United States radiators scientifically arranged.

Thus cities have grown. And in the thirty-seven years since its founding so too has the United States Radiator Corporation developed. Constantly alert for every advance in the art of heating, the company has surely and steadily expanded, until now its boilers and radiators in all variety of types and sizes are found in large city buildings and in small country homes.

One of its latest contributions to thrifty, uniform warmth is Capitol guaranteed heating. This is a written guarantee * that every Capitol boiler will satisfactorily heat a definite number of radiators, and eliminates all doubt and speculation about correct boiler size.

Whether you are building a group of houses, an apartment building, or a bungalow, consult a good contractor about Capitol guaranteed heating. And write for an interesting book, A Modern House Warming. Free.

To Every Man His Dream—But to Hugh Newsom Two Dreams

"Look here, Hugh," said the doctor, "why don't you write an oratorio for us to sing?"

"That sounded almost like blasphemy to me," confessed Mr. Newsom in relating the incident to me. "Until that moment, I had thought of oratorios in terms of Bach, Handel, and the great masters. For me to try such a thing—well, it just wasn't to be thought of!

"But although the idea struck me as absurd, it stuck. That afternoon, I picked up my Bible and it fell open at this passage: 'And they came to the place called Gethsemane. . . .' Immediately, there flashed into my mind the theme for an Easter oratorio. I snatched up a pencil and a piece of paper and began writing. I did not stop until the next morning, when my mother dragged me down from my room to breakfast. As soon as I had swallowed breakfast, I was at it again. By night, I had finished all the solos for the entire oratorio, and had three of the choruses ready for rehearsal.

"The choir was wildly enthusiastic about 'The Crucifixion.' When the boys asked me the name of the composer, I told them 'Moswen,' which of course was Newsom spelled backward. They did not suspect the trick I was playing on them, because I rewrote, to suit their voices, practically everything they sang.

"I said nobody suspected. There was a quizzical look in Doctor Hal's eye; but he said nothing then.

"WE WORKED like dogs to memorize the piece, and on the Saturday night before Easter we had a marvelous rehearsal. That night, just as the boys finished the last note of the final chorus, Hal came up to me and said, 'Hugh, that's your oratorio.' I admitted that it was. 'Let's tell the boys,' he begged; 'you owe it to them to tell 'em.' I refused. He insisted. 'I can't tell them,' I finally told him, 'because I don't want my parents to know.' And then I explained the situation to him.

"Hal listened quietly. Then, 'You're all wrong,' he said. 'You must tell your father. It's the only way.' And before I knew what he was up to, he was calling the boys back, explaining that we had decided to go over the oratorio once more, to be sure that we had it letter-perfect for the next day.

"There was nothing for me to do but go across the yard to Father's study. I found him at his desk. 'Come on over to the church and hear the Easter music, Father,' I begged. He said that he was busy with his sermon, and could not spare the time. But I insisted, and he yielded.

"We went back to the church. And there, to an audience of one, the choir sang 'The Crucifixion.' I cannot tell you how tense I was. My heart was tight like a drum. As I watched Father's face, I felt that the world was standing still, and that it might never go on again.

"My father is a stern man, and emotion does not often show itself on his features. Now, as I looked at him, I saw him lose himself in the story the music was telling. His face began to work; the tears streamed down his cheeks. He, too, was suffering the more than mortal anguish borne by the Master on His cross. Finally, when the culmination of Christ's passion was reached in the cry, 'My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?' Father's eyes met mine, and I knew that he knew!

"Like a man in a trance, he got up, and started stumbling down the aisle toward me. Hal had seen and understood. I think the men sensed something also. Before Father got halfway to the altar rail, we two were alone in the church. The others had gone quietly out the side door.

"I met Father at the foot of the altar. He reached out and caught my hand. Without a word, he pulled me down on my knees beside him. And there, with his arm across my shoulder, he talked again with that Friend who had held midnight vigil with him many years before in a bare hospital room.

"'O God,' he said, 'I presumed to choose the way in which my boy was to serve Thee. He has found the better way. I thank Thee for opening my eyes!'"

And from that day on, it was definitely understood in the Newsom family that Hugh was to devote his life to music.

THAT fall, Hugh went to Wesleyan College. He planned to finance himself by training a choir something like the one he had at Wapello, and taking it on week-end trips to any nearby points where he could pick up engagements. But for some reason, the Wesleyan authorities didn't take kindly to this project. Hugh was not to be outdone, however. He promptly got a job training such a choir at Parsons College, fifty miles away.

Toward the end of the spring term, he realized that if he were to get the most out of his studies the following year, he would have to earn something during the summer vacation. It was this need for money that suggested to him the commercial possibilities of his old Wapello gang. People in Iowa liked to hear those boys sing. Why wouldn't folks elsewhere enjoy them, if they had a chance?

At that time, Chautauquas were at the height of their popularity in the Mid-West. Hugh immediately began writing to all the managers of independent Chautauquas in his own and adjoining states. The fame of the Wapello choir had already gone abroad in the land, and a good male chorus is always an excellent drawing card on a program. Young Newsom speedily found himself booked up with two summers' engagements!

The Wapello choir, reduced to thirty picked voices, made a big hit on tour, and Hugh and his boys made a good deal of money. Hugh added to his share of the profits by selling pianos, which he demonstrated in towns between Chautauqua stops. In this way, he paid all his expenses at Wesleyan the following year. And the next summer he worked for a big stake to put him through the New

"Sees all—knows all"

England Conservatory of Music, in Boston. At the end of the summer, he had saved up exactly eleven hundred and fifty dollars.

It was the day before he was to leave for Boston that he learned about the notes which his father owed. He had gone into a local bank to say good-by to one of his friends, and found his father paying money to the cashier. Hugh overheard the words principal and interest. Instantly, there flashed into his mind little bits of things that he had heard his parents talk about from time to time.

The cashier was an old family friend. Hugh waited until his father had left the bank. Then he went straight to the cashier and demanded the truth. The result was that he paid off his father's notes to the amount of eleven hundred dollars. He said nothing to his family about what he had done.

The next day he bought his ticket. He dispensed with Pullman and dining-car services, and landed in Boston with enough money to pay his matriculation fee and still leave four dollars in his pocket.

The boy got various odd jobs; but as winter came on he found it increasingly hard to keep body and soul together. He went to the head of the student employment bureau and asked for a regular part-time job. But there were many advanced students asking for work that term, and naturally the preference went to them.

The first week in November, he pawned his overcoat to pay his room rent and buy some books that he needed. Two weeks later, his vest went. This left him with only a thin sack coat between him and the rigors of the Boston climate. His shoes needed resoling, and he had no overshoes.

Thanksgiving found him in the charity ward of a hospital, hovering between life and death with pneumonia. When he came out of the hospital, in the middle of December, he was still weak and a little feverish. But he went straight to the student employment agency.

"Look here," he said desperately to the man in charge, "you've got to give me something to do."

The employment agent looked doubtfully at the thin, emaciated figure before him. "What can you do?" he demanded.

"Anything," declared Newsom recklessly.

"Could you conduct a choir of three hundred voices?" asked the agent sarcastically.

"Conducting a choir of that size would be child's play to me," replied the boy. "Lead me to it!"

AT THIS moment, the door of the office literally burst open, and in popped a man all out of breath. He rushed to the agent's desk and pounded on it excitedly.

"Haven't you found a conductor for that Hyde Park choir yet?" he thundered. "Didn't I tell you this morning that my conductor went to the hospital before breakfast with appendicitis? And me with a rehearsal to-night!"

Without giving the agent a chance to speak, Hugh Newsom stepped forward. "I'm the man you're looking for," he said. "I've conducted choirs for three years. I've toured Iowa, and Illinois, and Nebraska, and—"

The visitor hadn't even stopped pounding the desk. "Where am I going to get a conductor?" he went right on shouting.

"I don't believe it's possible to get a good conductor on such short notice," said the agent; "but I'll try." He picked up the telephone and began calling numbers. As a sort of after-thought, he jerked a thumb at Hugh and mumbled, "This fellow says he can conduct a choir."

"Give me a chance," pleaded Hugh.

But it was only after the man had got the promise of four student conductors for that night that he even looked at Hugh. Thus fortified, he agreed to give the white-faced boy a chance. He even agreed to give him the first fifteen minutes for his tryout.

But that night, the other four conductors went away without even lifting a baton. The first fifteen minutes won the job for Hugh Newsom. The salary was good, so the boy's bread-and-butter problem was solved.

And the way he did put his heart into his job! He made that great choir work as it had never worked before. If a member turned up late for practice two times without an adequate excuse, he was given his walking papers. There were wonderful music programs every Sunday evening. People had to be turned away from the church doors.

THRILLED by his triumph with the Hyde Park choir, Hugh began to plan marvelous things for Easter. How wonderful it would be to hear his "Crucifixion" sung by this great choir which he himself had trained.

The boy resolved upon a bold stroke: He would do what he had done three years ago in Wapello—use scores made without the name of the composer. In this way, he would at least get an honest reaction to the piece. He did this, and the choir was enthusiastic. Nothing would do but that "The Crucifixion" should be sung at the Easter services.

Howard White, the leading basso of the Boston Opera Company, sang the rôle of the Christ. The performance was a glorious one, and it made a profound impression upon Boston. The public demanded the name of the composer. And when it was made known that the eighteen-year-old conductor of the Hyde Park choir had written the oratorio, there were many who refused to believe it. The papers were full of the youthful prodigy and his remarkable exploit.

During the week following Easter Sunday, a well-known music publisher offered the boy what was to him a fabulous price for "The Crucifixion." Hugh's first reaction was to say "Yes," sign the contract, and take the money before the publisher could change his mind. But he didn't want to appear too young and eager, so he said, in what he thought was a businesslike manner, "Give me until to-morrow to think about it."

He went down the stairs walking on air. Now he could study and write, and provide for his parents in their old age. Life was too good, too wonderful!

Of course he would take the manuscript over to the publisher's office the first thing in the morning. But before he took it, he would change certain phrasings in the chorus of the mob scene before Pilate, and he mustn't forget to rewrite that

I sell my firm's advertising to the dealer — I've found it gets the orders

V. J. Thill began as missionary salesman for Life Savers, Inc., in the Middle West in September 1920.
He was promoted to position of crew manager and later placed in charge of a sales division as Division Sales Manager.
Then he became Sales Promotion Manager covering the United States east of the Rockies, and within the past twelve months was promoted to Field Sales Manager.

By V. J. Thill

LIFE SAVERS, INC.

A long time ago I discovered this about selling: There is a lot of competition on almost any product—but effective advertising tends to make competition relatively harmless.

For years I have used reprints of my firm's advertising more than I have used my sample case. In fact dealers and jobbers upon whom I called used to call me the "picture show man."

I have always given them the "pictures" first —then the figures.

I show them how my firm's national advertising is selling LIFE SAVERS for them locally. I show them the advertising and tell them why it is getting business for them. And they are willing to tie-up with it, willing to buy LIFE SAVERS and willing to display LIFE SAVERS right out in front.

In telling retailers about my firm's advertising in The American Magazine I have found The Vest Pocket Sales-Maker a great help. It really clinches my argument about the local value of national advertising, and, of course, it gets the orders.

V J Thill

HERE are a few facts you can use to show any dealer what your firm's advertising in The American Magazine means to him—how it is getting business for him, bringing customers into his store.

1. Tell him about The American Magazine's huge circulation of 2,200,000 families—more than 10 million readers every month.

The dealer knows that the more people pass his store, the more trade he will get. Likewise, the more local people your firm's advertisements reach, the more sales they will make for him. And The American reaches a lot of them.

2. Point out that The American Magazine stays in local homes a whole month. Each of your firm's advertisements is ALIVE a full 30 days.

That makes it practically certain that they will be seen and read. And any dealer will understand that the sales-making value of an advertisement, like a window display, is measured by the number of people it stops.

3. Emphasize the fact that many independent check-ups have shown that The American Magazine is read by ALL MEMBERS OF THE FAMILY.

You won't have to say much about the importance of this. Every dealer knows that nowadays everybody in the family has something to say about most home purchases—from Life Savers to bathroom equipment.

4. Stress the kind of people who read The American Magazine—people with ambition and a desire to live better from year to year. In other words, the sort of people who are every retailer's best customers.

Just talk on this point from your own personal acquaintance with The American Magazine. You know the kind of articles and stories you find in it—the kind that stimulate people to be more, have more—and that means BUY more.

To help you get these points over to dealers we have published The Vest Pocket Sales-Maker. It gives facts and figures to back up the four points above for all towns of 1,000 and over, and for all counties.

Send for the new edition now—and use it to make your firm's advertising write orders for you. Please give your firm's name. Address The Crowell Publishing Company, 250 Park Avenue, New York.

group of unsatisfactory bars in the principal solo of the Christ.

And then, all at once, a disturbing thought burst upon the boy: If he saw half a dozen things that he wanted to improve now, how much would he want to change in two, three, or five years?

He spent the night sitting on the edge of his bed, with his head in his hands and his thoughts traveling around and around like a squirrel in a cage. He recalled the beautiful years his father had spent in the service of Christ, and he determined that he would not offer his small tribute until it was as near perfection as he was able to bring it. In short, he made up his mind never to think of "The Crucifixion" in terms of money. There was no use in trying to explain this to the publishers. He would simply tell them that he had decided not to sell.

All this occurred sixteen years ago. "The Crucifixion" is still unpublished, although a prominent New York publishing house brought out last winter, instead of the usual one or two compositions chosen to introduce a composer, fifteen of his works. About sixty more are to be published in rapid succession. These include cantatas, oratorios, symphonies, and occasional pieces.

But let us go back to Boston for a moment.

At the end of Newsom's first year at the New England Conservatory, Doctor Chadwick, a leading American composer, and the boy's teacher, said to him: "Hugh, I can teach you anything about composition, except counterpoint, and I don't believe anybody can teach you that."

Hugh Newsom made the only reply that occurred to him.

"Who is the best teacher of counterpoint in the world?" he asked.

Doctor Chadwick named a man in Europe.

"Haven't the money to get to him," said Newsom.

But during the following week, Newsom chanced to overhear a group of professors talking enthusiastically about Heacox of Oberlin. They were especially keen about his work in counterpoint.

THE next morning Newsom was on his way to Oberlin. At the end of two months, Heacox advised him to quit. "You're wasting your time," he said. "Better go back to your church music. You don't need counterpoint there."

"If I begin at the beginning, and give all my time to counterpoint for four years, could I hope to get anywhere?" Hugh Newsom asked his teacher.

"There's a chance," Heacox admitted.

Newsom gave up every other branch of music. He even refused to conduct choirs to eke out the Boston savings, on which he was now living. Every waking moment he devoted to the mastery of this thing which had eluded him so long and so stubbornly. And at the end of eighteen months, Heacox declared that the boy was ready to go on alone.

When he finished at Oberlin, the young man knew exactly what he wanted to do next. He had decided that if he was to get very far as a composer, he must meet musicians who already had an audience. The quickest way to do this would be to get into the concert field. All the first-class artists were booked in New York. Solution of the problem: Find a job in a metropolitan booking bureau.

But neither musicians nor booking bureaus would waste any time on a man who had no reputation in the music world. Newsom concluded that the only way to bring himself to the attention of the big booking agencies was to discover a genius who had not yet found recognition. Then he could go to New York, and say, "See what I have done!"

But in the meantime, he had to live. The course at Oberlin had left him penniless.

About this time, the general manager of the piano company for which he had worked during vacations wrote and offered him a job at ten thousand a year if he would come into the business for good. He intimated that there were big things in sight for young Newsom.

Newsom frankly answered that he hated selling pianos; but he added that he needed money and that he might consider a short-term job. The manager wired for him to come to Chicago and talk it over.

He went.

AND now comes a curious turn in the affairs of Hugh Newsom. The first night he was in Chicago, the general manager took him to dinner and to a show afterward. When the three-piece orchestra tuned up, he leaned forward in his seat.

"My heavens," he whispered to his companion, "do you hear that harpist?"

Newsom was on fire with enthusiasm. "That man's a genius, an artist," he kept repeating to himself. And then, suddenly, "He's my artist!"

He waited impatiently for the act to begin, so that he could go back stage and talk to the harpist. But when he located the man, he couldn't talk to him. The harpist did not know one word of English, and Newsom could not speak Italian. Finally, Newsom discovered a stage hand who acted as interpreter.

Through the interpreter, Newsom learned that the harpist had studied under the greatest masters of the Old World. He was playing in this second-rate theatre orchestra for ten dollars a night, because he did not know how to put himself forward. The name of this obscure musician was Salvi. Thanks to Hugh Newsom, it is famous to-day as the name of one of the world's greatest harpists.

This is what happened: Without a dollar in the bank to back up his word, Newsom offered Salvi a seven-year contract for concert work at ten thousand dollars a year and all expenses. Salvi was very grateful and excited. He had nothing to lose, and he agreed to put himself entirely in Newsom's hands.

Newsom went back and told the general manager of the piano company what he had done. The next day he started out to get engagements for Salvi. And then began a heart-breaking fight that was to last three years without any let-up.

"One man couldn't work fast enough at this game to keep Salvi busy," Newsom explained to me. "I had to have helpers. My sister and one of my brothers came to the rescue. Then a school superintendent, the sales manager of a book concern, a dramatic press agent, and two university teachers who believed in Salvi and in me joined forces with us. They were the most tireless, loyal bunch of friends the Lord ever blessed a man with!

"Slowly but surely we succeeded in getting more than a hundred towns signed up. And then, when Salvi was just ready to start out on his tour, an epidemic of influenza swept the Mid-West, and engagement after engagement was canceled. For months on end, I borrowed money to pay Salvi's salary, while my little bunch of helpers went without a cent of pay. Sometimes they even met their expenses out of their own pockets.

"We had started in Iowa and were gradually working eastward. Our objective was New York, of course. But the closer we got the harder it became to get bookings for Salvi. 'Has he played in New York?' managers would ask us, and when we had to answer 'No,' they would promptly say they didn't want him.

"Finally, at the end of two and a half years, I decided that there was nothing to do but lay siege to New York itself. We were already several thousand dollars in debt, but I borrowed another thousand from the same Iowa banker who had trusted my father, and we entered the city of our dreams.

"For six months we battered in vain at the doors of New York booking agents. They wouldn't even listen to Salvi play. They laughed in my face when I offered him as an attraction. 'What,' they said, 'make people listen to a harpist a whole evening? Man, you're crazy. It can't be done this side of heaven!'

"At the end of three months, I begged my little band of workers to go home and let me fight it out alone. They wouldn't even listen to me. Instead, they got jobs that would support them, and during the week-ends they went out into nearby small towns and rustled up engagements for Salvi.

"But I had begun to lose faith in myself and in Salvi. I feared that I had sold those little Mid-Western towns my own enthusiasm, and not the world's greatest harpist. This went on for another three months. And then a night came when I admitted defeat. 'You'll have to go back home, folks,' I told the gang. 'We're licked.'

"THE next night we met in a cheap little Broadway hotel for our farewell dinner. Salvi was all packed up and ready to head back for Chicago, where I had found him. But he had left his harp out, and after dinner he played for us. He was greatly touched by our parting, and he played as I had never heard him play before.

"And as he played, something hot and defiant flared up inside me. 'To think I can't make people listen to a genius like that!' I thought. And then, 'I'll make them listen, if I starve for it!'

"But I said nothing to the others. The next morning they started back home; but I went over to the Metropolitan Booking Bureau, one of the biggest in the city. I sat down on a bench in the waiting-room and I sent in this message to the manager: 'Tell Mr. Coppicus I'm going to sit here until he sees me. And tell him I have a whole year on my hands.'

"This amused Coppicus and he sent for me to come in at once. My enthusiasm ran away with me. I told him that Salvi was the greatest harpist in the world. He was impressed.

"'All right,' he said, 'I'll listen to your genius.' And he named a night for the audience.

"When Coppicus came to hear Salvi play he brought with him half a dozen of the most important music critics in New York. They were unanimous in agreeing that Salvi was a great artist. In short he was a 'find.'

"After the performance, I went in triumph to Coppicus. 'Well,' I said, 'now are you willing to sign up my man, and give him a début in the biggest auditorium in the city?'

"Coppicus grinned. 'On one condition,' he said.

"'Name it,' I came back at him.

"'I'll sign up Salvi if you'll sign a contract to come along and manage him for me.'

"Coppicus looked puzzled when I lauged hysterically. All at once it had come over me that he was handing me the very prize I had set out to win when I left Oberlin three years ago. I had become so absorbed in putting Salvi across that I had simply lost sight of myself and my own ambitions."

BEFORE the end of the year, Hugh Newsom was manager of bookings for the Metropolitan Bureau. He stayed in the work nearly four years, and when he left it, three years ago, he had increased the booking business three hundred per cent.

In this work, he made many interesting contacts and many warm friends. He also made more money than he had ever dreamed of making. Indeed, he made enough to get himself out of debt and leave enough to run him during several years of steady composing.

For two years after he left the booking bureau, he spent almost every waking moment composing or studying. He wrote many new compositions, and revised nearly ninety old ones. And then, one day, he woke up to find that his health was breaking under such steady application. He began to look about for some form of relaxation. It was then that he conceived the notion of building in miniature the great railway system he had once dreamed of seeing as a locomotive engineer. He found an excellent excuse for his idea in the fact that he was teaching a class of lively boys in a nearby Sunday-school, and he needed some vital means of contacting them outside of class hours.

By this time, he was married and had a small daughter. A few doors from the apartment house in which he lived on upper Riverside Drive, there was another building, in which the ground floor was vacant. Hugh Newsom found that he could rent the whole ground floor for a reasonable sum. The rest of that story you already know.

The beautiful part of it is that his years of terribly hard work have not robbed him of his capacity for play. Perhaps that explains why Hugh Newsom has been such a great blessing to his boys and to his friends—Charlie, the policeman; Tony, the janitor; and "Doc," the Columbia professor, who are, after all, "just boys grown tall."

Only One Ring for Two Brides

ONE was a daughter of wealth and position, the other a chorus girl. Both beautiful and as similar in looks as two orchids in a lovely garden. Eleanor, the reigning favorite in the court of "society," married the man she didn't love and while the wedding guests and the groom waited before her door discovered the man she really loved was calling her from the brink of death. Cynthia, chorus lady, took her place and Eleanor went to the man she loved. But how did Cynthia fool the groom and her father? What were the consequences of her mad escapade? You will wonder how these two fascinating ladies will ever be able to straighten out the tangle that love and romance have woven around them. Arthur Somers Roche, in his own intriguing style, tells the story. It is called behind the lids. To hide his own weakness from these children, who took hunger as a matter of course, he crawled under the car. For an hour he stayed there, wrestling with his memory, a screw driver and a wrench, fighting obdurate and inanimate material with sweat and cunning.

"Scotch Valley"

The engine was intact. But someone had stolen the tires and the motor-meter, the cushions, the tail light and the rear bumper. Unless, perhaps, Manuel had sold them.

The car had been a good car in its day. Gladden pictured Fred Smith, alert, light-hearted, bumping over the dusty roads, admiring the flash of sunlight on the shiny black hood. The thought sent him scrambling out from under the machine, to face his audience.

"I'm going to walk to town. You stay here and be good until I come back."

He had not counted on his popularity. "I'm coming, too!" . . . "So'm I!" . . . "So'm I!" . . . "I!" . . . "Me!" They swarmed at his heels. Lily, stumbling, caught at his hand with sticky hot fingers that clung fast. Peter shuffled ahead, looking indifferent and important.

"I wonder if they accept me," Gladden thought. "Or are they afraid to be left alone?"

He wanted to keep his heart shut against them until he was certain that they had need of him, that they wanted him, that they liked him, not for what he might be able to do for them but for himself.

He was embarrassed, now, to find sticky Nancy Smith hanging on to one hand while stickier Lily Smith dragged on the other. They were not ingratiating children. They took him for granted. Manuel was dead. Here was another. They followed him, as chicks, orphaned, will follow a duck or a goose, or any gander with the maternal instinct. He was an engineer, not a nurse; but these children didn't know the difference.

"You'd better stay here. Ten miles is a long way. Bertha, you stay."

She danced ahead. "Lookit me! I'm an airplane! I'm flying! I ain't touching the ground!"

"You are, too," Peter said. He could be gruff, and, like most boys of his age, he was contemptuous of feminine ecstasies. "You're on the ground. Ain't she, Mr. Gladden?"

"Call me Jim," Gladden said.

"Jim! Jim!" shrieked Nancy.

THEY crossed the ford and started along the road. Another dusty, yellow-white day. Another burning-hot day. Bertha frolicked with the dog. She paid no attention to Nancy and Lily.

"I don't like babies," she told Gladden. "Mother had too many. I'm not going to have any! I'm going to be an actress."

He told her she was a heartless little hussy. "Babies are wonderful. You ought to love them. You're a woman. It's your business to love babies."

Bertha paused long enough to give Nancy and Lily the benefit of a doubtful look. "I think they're disgusting," she said. "They don't know anything."

"What do you know?"

"Heaps."

"For instance?"

She shook her head. "You wouldn't understand."

"Don't be too sure."

Lily began to cry. Gladden lifted her and carried her, but she went right on; there was a new and genuine note in the noise she made. Gladden was alarmed. "Bertha," he said, "come here. Something's the matter with Lily."

"Bounce her," Bertha advised. "Mother used to. She's got a stomach ache."

Lily was hungry. She tried to suck her own fingers. She tried to bite Gladden's neck. She cried until her head grew heavy, until, at last, surrendering to wretchedness, she went to sleep.

THIS might have been a new and empty world, or a very old, hot world from which all men had disappeared, leaving only the drowsy cattle, the swift black meadow birds, the motionless horses, and the stationary buzzards.

Gladden began to feel like the First Man, the Hunter, the Protector, the Father. He imagined himself hairy and long-armed, with a thrusting jaw, little pig's eyes, and the loping gait of an animal. The picture delighted him.

"I've been too civilized," he thought. This, at any rate, was real. More than war—an artificial, stimulated thirst for destruction—this was experience. He might not like poverty and babies and heat and hunger; but he'd have to deal with them. Deal with life itself.

Suddenly, Bertha came back to his side. With an air of detachment, she said, "I'll call you Jim!"

She had picked a few stalks of some weed that resembled the cornflower. Vivid blue blossoms sprang sparsely from a coarse stem. "In winter," she said politely, "it's different in the valley. Grass up to your neck, and poppies to make crowns of. It rains. Things grow. It's nice." She came close to him. "There are larks," she said.

Now that he looked at her, Gladden discovered a certain beauty, a delicacy, a fineness he had not noticed before. "Poor kid," he thought. "Heavens! It's hot. I'll get to town somehow, and turn them over to the authorities. Then I'll beat it."

Henry was lagging.

"Come on," Gladden said. "Let's sing. Let's march to music."

"We don't know any tunes," Pete objected, "except 'It's a Hot Time in the Old Town To-night.'"

Gladden thought of Rachmaninoff playing the Glazunov Étude to a breathless audience. Only a few thousand people in every city who could understand, who cared. Only a million, perhaps, in the world. Outside the cities, children like these, growing up in ignorance of emotions, of pleasures that to him were already turning a little stale from repetition. Children like these had to go through life head down, bucking facts.

To them, to millions of people, everywhere, the exclusive sensations—music, thought, form—were nonexistent. Are we, the aware, a little better or a little worse? Privileged, or cursed?

"Fine!" said Gladden. "That's a good tune."

He began to sing, and the procession, forming behind him, marched all the way to music. Only he switched from, "It's a Hot Time," to the Yale hymn, and then to "Madelon," and when they tramped into town he was giving a very creditable performance of the "Pilgrims' Chorus."

Vaccatown was eight miles away from the Smith ranch—eight or ten. Inland, it existed at all only because of its happy situation at the crossing of two state roads. A bank, a drug store, a tamale parlor and a dry-goods emporium faced a long 'dobe building called the Mission.

There was a dusty square containing a band-stand, a statue of Father Serra, a few brittle palms, and a bed of marigolds gone to seed. And on both sides of the street, parked at right angles to the curb, motors stood wheel to wheel, thick as flies on the rim of a dish.

It seemed good to Gladden to be in a town again, to tread a pavement. There was something fascinating about the cool darkness of the drug store, the odor of sachet and carbolic, and the elaborate trumpery of the soda fountain.

Lily was asleep in Pete's arms; Gladden carried Nancy, unconscious and relaxed as a dummy. They had to be shaken into a slow, dawning ecstasy: "Ice Cream! Soda! Want a cone?"

A boy in a pink and blue shirt, with sleek hair and romantic eyes leaned over the fountain to inquire, "Your kids?"

"All five," Gladden said. "Give them everything they ask for, and tell me where I can find a lawyer."

"A good one?"

"An honest one."

"There's Mr. Hansen, over in the Bank Building. Fat fellow. On the second floor."

"Pete," Gladden said, "you stay here. I'll be right back. You're boss, now."

HE FOUND Mr. Hansen in his office. A fat man indeed. Considerably more than two hundred pounds of all too solid flesh bulked largely in a revolving desk chair before a table on which were stacked great volumes of the Law, an imposing array of knowledge between covers. The lawyer's face was scarlet; his sluggish blood gave him a look of ruddy health. He had the confused and searching expression of the very plethoric. His waistcoat glittered with the insignia of secret orders worn on a thick watch chain.

He struggled up to shake Gladden's hand, and subsided again into the dubious comfort of his soft flesh. "Glad to meet you. Glad to welcome you to Vaccatown. Great little town. Growing fast. Have a cigar?"

Gladden wouldn't. He preferred cigarettes, and produced one from a limp package, warm from the pressure of

*D*on't trifle with A CORN RAZOR if you would avoid THE GRAY SPECTER OF INFECTION

One of the best known foot specialists in the middle west writes as follows:

"Here is one good reason why no layman should ever pare a corn: Many people, unskilled in using a razor, misgauge the depth of a corn. This results in cutting into the flesh. Then foreign bodies enter . . . and there is havoc to pay, with consequences sometimes most serious."

DR. CARL ISRAEL,
17 N. State St., Chicago.

If you prefer to treat your corns by the paring method, let a chiropodist do it. That is the advice which Blue-jay advertising always has given.

But if you would end your corns at home . . . use Blue-jay. Because it is the safe and the gentle way.

Safe . . . because you cannot "overtreat" the corn with medication. Each Blue-jay plaster contains just the right amount of the medication to end the corn. Never too much nor too little.

FAMOUS FEET

Dainty MAE MURRAY says: "I regard a corn as excess baggage . . . as silly as the troubles carried by the Old Man of the Sea. With Blue-jay at the corner drug store, there is no alibi for a corn."

EVELYN LAW says: "A corn is hardly a luxury for anybody . . . But for a dancer it is agony . . . When I notice any suggestion of callus on the toe, I immediately apply a Blue-jay plaster."

Gentle . . . because the cool and velvety Blue-jay pad instantly relieves the pressure and pain . . . while the magic wax gently proceeds to loosen the corn.

The new 1927 Blue-jay offers you several new refinements. A dainty white pad, instead of a blue one. A more flexible disc to fit even the odd-shaped corn. And a sprightly new package, to charm the fastidious. Your druggist has the new and better Blue-jay now at no increase in price over the old.

Nancy's body. He explained as well as he could the curious outcome of his promise.

"Oh, you mean the Smith kids, up the Valley! Of course. I know all about them. There was some sort of rumpus with the Pelgrams before the mother died. It seems that Pelgram cut off the water; dammed the creek. Mrs. Smith died—of worry, I guess, although the Mexican said the well was poisoned. I didn't handle the case myself. Fellow at the other end of town, in the Fish-Heyward Block. Only if I were you, I wouldn't consult him. No, Mr. Gladden, I wouldn't."

The fat man leaned forward as far as he could, and whispered, "The fact is, he's a shyster. He played a double game, and Mrs. Smith lost her case. She was a mighty fine woman, but she didn't know much about legal matters."

"You mean the business came to a trial?"

"Not exactly. A case was prepared. Pelgram knew that Smith hadn't a clear title to his water. The creek comes down through a cut in the mountains. In winter, of course, there is always an overflow. I have seen that river spill its banks and flood the meadows. The creek is fed by springs, and there is a trickle of water all summer, enough for irrigation. Pelgram has magnificent orchards. Smith used to have, before Pelgram moved in. The arrangement was quite different with the original settlers; they called it 'water courtesy' in the deeds. And it held. It held for fifty years. The upper ranch controlled the creek, geographically. The lower ranch relied on 'courtesy'."

"Smith must have known—"

"He knew, all right. But perhaps he had too much faith in human nature. There is enough water for both ranches, except in years of exceptional drought. Only a scoundrel would cut it off."

"You mean, Pelgram is a scoundrel?"

"Well, he cut off the water. Smith was no sooner in France than his trees withered on their stalks."

"Why did he go to France? He didn't have to."

"He was an old army man. He smelled blood, I guess. He wanted to get over, and he got over. It was like that with a lot of them in California. They didn't wait for a draft. They didn't like the idea."

"I didn't like the idea, myself. But in Smith's case—with five children!"

The lawyer reached for the telephone. "Tell you what I'll do. I'll call the coroner. You'd better talk to the sheriff yourself. You got any proof that Fred Smith appointed you guardian of these children?"

"Only this:"

A DOCTOR and a nurse who had overheard Smith's request and Gladden's promise had so attested in a short typewritten statement.

"All very correct. I guess you're fit, all right. A man with your record! What are you going to do?"

Gladden hesitated. He didn't really know. He surprised himself by saying, "I'm going to put the Smith ranch on its feet. And then I'm going back to New York and attend to my own future."

The lawyer laughed. "If you're planning to put the Smith ranch on its feet, Mr. Gladden, your future's right here in Scotch Valley."

Scotch Valley might be a beginning, but not an end, Gladden said in his heart: "I've got plans of my own. All the things I'm going to do: cruise to Java; dig at Carthage; see India; learn German. . . . Conrad, a talk with him . . . how about studying with de Pachmann . . . and a bridge . . . something vital and rooted, signed with my name. . . . Good lord, why was I educated? I've never heard Mary sing 'Le Jongleur' . . . or seen 'Carcassonne'. . . ."

"The coroner'll be right over," the fat man said. He quenched his cigar with a circular grinding motion. "I take it you're going to let me advise you?"

"I'll need a lot of advice," Gladden admitted. They solemnly and appropriately clasped hands.

GLADDEN had never been a father in his life; neither had he been a policeman. Now, he saw, he would have to be both.

The children had turned Grove's drug store into a circus. They were revolving at top speed on the soda-counter stools. "Take those brats out of here! They've wrecked the place!"

The ice-cream bill was two dollars and a half; but Gladden paid it without protest. Bertha confessed to three chocolate sodas.

When Gladden finally got them all out on the sidewalk, where Mr. Hansen and the coroner waited in a big open car, he suffered for the first time an attack of embarrassment. A young girl driving a roadster had parked next to the coroner's car, and when Gladden appeared with the chocolate-smeared Smiths, she laughed out loud.

"Look who's here!" she said. "Hello, Pete! Hello, Bertha!"

Pete grinned, but Bertha said nothing. It may have been too many chocolate sodas, but Gladden thought it might be the first cosmic female urge, the first twinge of jealousy. For this was the prettiest girl Gladden had ever seen. Not easily affected by sheer beauty in a woman, yet this beauty embarrassed him. The girl was utterly feminine, but not in the manner of women like Mrs. Pelgram; she belonged in sunlight.

Gladden spoke to Mr. Hansen: "I'll have to get some supplies. Will you wait?"

"Sure! Hoist the babies in. Up-si-daisy!" He took Lily on his brief knees. "She's all over candy. Here, somebody. Give me a handkerchief!"

Gladden turned to Bertha. "Can't you wipe the baby's face? Haven't you got any pride? Don't you care?"

Bertha stared straight into his angry eyes. She quivered; a sensitive and delicate play of emotion tightened her lips, and a sudden pallor—something of the spirit, something profound and terrible to her—drained her cheeks and left her, a little white scarecrow.

"I hate you!" she said. "I can't wipe her face. I haven't got a handkerchief!"

The girl in the roadster jumped down. She was a long-legged, fleet young thing, slim, straight, clean-lined. She had what Gladden had heard his grandmother call a "strawberry skin." The color stained her cheeks, her lips, as if crushed out of ripe fruit.

She put her arms around Bertha. "Take my handkerchief, kid. See. It's a pretty one. And I've got more than I need."

"I hate you, too!" Bertha said. "I don't want your handkerchief."

"Then I'll wipe the baby's face myself. . . . Hello, Mr. Hansen! Heave her over. She's dirty, isn't she? She needs a bath, not a handkerchief. Here, Lily! Poor kid. Poor little kid!"

"Mr. Gladden, this is Olive Smith. Her folks live the other end of the Valley."

Gladden bowed formally. He thought he detected a gleam of amusement in the lawyer's eyes. And he thought, "There always has to be a girl. Just when you think you're clear of girls."

Hansen was anxious to please his new client. With a benevolent unctuousness, a broad grin tempered by a wink, he said, "Tell you what, Mr. Gladden. The coroner and I will take the kids out to the ranch. He's in quite a hurry—aren't you, Putnam? You do your shopping, and Olive'll bring you back, won't you, Olive?"

"Glad to! No trouble at all!"

She was that sort of a girl. Trouble rolled off her consciousness as drops of rain slip across nasturtium leaves and disappear. She was alive. Granted that you could look at her without emotion, you saw that her mouth was too large, her chin too delicate for perfect loveliness. Presently, acquiring a vague emotion, you forgot.

She walked with a sort of strut, a very individual and provocative and unconscious mannerism. Her throat was round and quite long; or it may have been that she held her head so high. Her brows, in contrast to the ardor of her hair, were black and straight; they gave her eyes a curious lift, a look both fascinating and dangerous.

Gladden wondered how many men had already fallen in love with her. "I think I won't," he thought. "I've got my hands full!" Nevertheless, the idea was stimulating.

With relief, he saw the coroner drive away, four ecstatic towheads and a dog on the rear seat. Bertha did not so much as glance back. She was finding out what it is to be born a woman with too great an awareness, too inclusive a consciousness. She was one of those feminine beings destined for willful suffering, in exact proportion to her extraordinary capacity for happiness.

Gladden could not refrain from a sense of triumph, a human if reprehensible inward chortle: "Serves her right. She hates me."

He turned away with Olive Smith, wishing he had worn a decent shirt. A suit case full of clean clothes—and here he was . . .

HE DID not want to count his money before this girl; but he knew that he had only about three hundred dollars. When that was gone, he would have to find more. But he liked good things, and betrayed by his own hunger, he bought cereals and fruits, coffee, milk, the best meat, and ten dollars' worth of canned soups and vegetables. He added, by way of contrast, jellies and candies, chutney, pickles, and a great Tillamook cheese, the color of golden oranges.

His stomach gnawed at the sight of these things. He was glad when they were packed away out of sight in the back of Olive Smith's car.

"I guess you'd better explain yourself to me," she said, "over an ice-cream soda."

"What do you know already?"

The Economical Pavement

FOR TOWN OR CITY

YOUR streets today must carry a traffic which in weight and volume was undreamed of twenty years ago. Vehicles have undergone a mighty change which must be reflected in the pavements on which they travel. Your modern fire engine for example (unneeded if your homes were of fireproof concrete) weighs five times as much as its horse-drawn predecessor—and travels three times as fast.

The concrete street is the engineer's answer to the challenge of modern motor traffic. Surprisingly moderate in first cost, it requires almost no maintenance—is open and in service at all seasons. Yet necessary cuts can be neatly and quickly patched. Rigid, unyielding, concrete streets retain their safe, even, attractive surface year after year.

Economy, safety and beauty combine to make the concrete street the most popular of modern pavements—both in residential and business sections. Our booklet telling of the experiences of communities which are paving with concrete, will interest you. Write Portland Cement Association, Chicago.

"Only what the Pelgrams told up and down the Valley this morning. That you attacked Pelgram, got food from Mrs. Pelgram by force, and shot at the Warner bunch from across the ford." She shrugged her shoulders. "A desperate character, trying to father a bunch of dirty little kids! There must be a mistake somewhere. Even if I liked the Pelgrams, I'd say they were prejudiced!"

Again Gladden explained. He was getting very good at this particular explanation.

"My dad died over there too," Olive Smith said. "It might have been him."

"He left you—"

"We struck oil. First, a gusher came in, and then well after well. We're rich. I don't know how rich."

"Why do you stay here?"

Her eyes lifted and widened. "Why? It's our home, isn't it? My mother has always lived here. She was born here. Her mother came out from Connecticut in a covered wagon. She married a Spaniard. Del Valle, his name. There are lots of them in the state. Gran'pa Del Valle. He was like a rock. You couldn't dent him. He drove a little buggy with two big mules. And he was so tall and so fat that no one else could ride with him.

"All alone, when he was eighty years old, he drove to his quarries and set off a charge of dynamite. But he was too old and too fat. He couldn't run fast enough. Anyhow, he was shot full of gravel—all over his body—deep wounds and little wounds. His face. His hands. Peppered. Any other man would have bled to death."

She slowly and thoughtfully stirred with a long spoon into the foaming depths of the tall glass of soda.

"BUT my grandfather got up, and climbed into the little buggy, and lifted the reins and told the mules to go home. It was Sunday, and there were no workmen at the quarry. No one saw what had happened. He drove up to the ranchhouse and sat there until someone came and lifted him out and put him to bed.

"They sent for all of us: all the children and all the grandchildren. He had ten children and twenty-six grandchildren. My father saddled a horse and galloped all the way, holding me in front of him. I can remember, and I was only six years old."

"What happened? Did your grandfather die?" Gladden asked.

She nodded. "Of course. The stones were imbedded in his skin: too deep to dig out. They didn't even try. I remember how he looked. Lying in a big black bed with carved posts. All the people stood around, afraid to speak. He looked up at my father—he liked my father—and said, 'Adios!' And he was dead."

"He was brave," Gladden said.

"He left us our land. He told my father that there was oil in the hills. He knew, because in one place, in a sort of marsh, you could see the oil lying on the surface. He was right."

Gladden said: "It's a pity there isn't oil on my Fred Smith's place."

"Pelgram thinks there is."

"Is that why he's trying to starve the children out?"

"If you hadn't come," she said, "Pelgram would have had that property today. He couldn't bribe the Mexican. But he could fool the kids. He could buy their land—don't you see—for the price of a meal? And send them to the County Home."

"There aren't men like that!"

"Aren't there?"

She drained the glass. "Aren't there? People out here are money-crazy. They don't stop to think about right or wrong." She met Gladden's eyes squarely. "It's funny. Money doesn't mean a thing—when you've got it! If my father were only back—"

She caught the serious moment up, and turned it into a laugh: "Aren't you glad you didn't inherit us, too?"

She drove the little car forward, out of town, sharp to the right and into the Valley. The return was not like the long travail of the morning. Gladden felt the wind in his hair. He had an audience. He was no longer a father, but a young man beginning to fall in love.

Trailing the roadster at a respectful distance, a tow-car hurried to the scene of the patient wreck in the Smith's barn. And this seemed a fantastic conclusion to a fantastic day: the tow-car was bringing tires, gas, oil, and tubes. To-morrow, he would ride out with his brood.

"I liked the story about your grandfather," Gladden said. "It was real. It made this country real. I begin to understand."

She stopped at the ford, and Gladden unloaded the packages.

"I'll send Mother down to help you," she said. "She raised five of us."

But Gladden shook his head. "It's my job. I'll feel better if I go the whole way. I don't want any help."

Before he could explain, the roadster leaped forward. He saw her hand upraised; the bright, flung gold of her hair, and she was gone. Dust drifted and settled on the gray banks. Gladden felt dizzy and let-down. He tried to think of a good reason why this girl might like him. At the moment, he seemed to himself to be singularly lacking, singularly burdened.

"The father of a family has no right to think of women," he said, and decided not to think about Olive Smith. "I'm insane enough as it is. Steady! Steady!"

THE coroner and Mr. Hansen were waiting for him on the porch. It seemed that Manuel had to be buried. "We can't bury him here. It wouldn't seem right, or proper."

"No," Gladden said, "I suppose not."

"You understand—just a Mexican. There is a public burying ground, a Potter's Field, outside of Vaccatown. If you say, we'll take him there now."

Gladden had not noticed Bertha. She was standing in the doorway. Now she came forward, her eyes on fire with anger.

"No. You sha'n't take him! You sha'n't. Manuel belongs to us."

"But, my dear child," said Hansen, "the man is dead."

She turned to Gladden. "They can't have him! Tell them they can't have him. They sha'n't take him away from us!"

"We've got to bury him, Bertha!"

Suddenly he realized that she had not at all grasped the real significance of death.

"I'll talk to her," he said to Hansen.

He made her walk with him across the dusty yard to the arbor. The other children, even Pete and the dog, had to stay on the porch, beyond earshot, beyond knowledge of this cruel inevitability.

How to explain death to a child? It would be easier to explain life, with its vital promise. Gladden remembered his first full comprehension of death, his grotesque rebellion. "No! No!" he had cried. "It isn't so!" It could not be so—for him.

"How old are you?" he asked Bertha.

"I'm sixteen. I'll be seventeen in October."

"You are old enough, then, to know the truth about everything. It can't hurt you."

She put her fingers in her ears. The look in her eyes hurt Gladden physically; he felt against his heart the impact of that childish protest. Very gently, he took her hands away.

"Death is nothing to be afraid of. While you live, it can't touch you. When you die, you know nothing about it. And so it can't hurt you."

"You lie! He knows! He will know if they bury him in that field." She twisted away from him. "Please don't let them! Please. Please!" She began for the first time to cry.

GLADDEN was like most men: he hated tears. They seemed always to be a cowardly bid for sympathy. He could not believe that women ever cried without an audience. But this was different. A child, alone with death, cried out of pity.

He put his arm around the thin shoulders, and, employing a method which is hereditary, inherent, unalterable, patted Bertha's back. "There! There!"

"You said Manuel was with God. You said you knew about God. Even if you can't tell the kids, can you tell me?"

"No," Gladden said. "I can't. I was bluffing when I said I knew. I don't know a thing about Him."

"Then it's another lie!"

"No. At least, I know this much: Manuel is safe. He is where nothing can hurt him. He can't have stomach aches or bad dreams. And he'll never be hungry."

Bertha stopped crying abruptly. She leaned against Gladden, holding her breath. After a moment she said, "I guess nothing's true!"

This was a poser. Already, she stood upon the shadow line between dreams and reality. The bitter, tragic crossing from childhood to maturity. "Nothing's true!"

"You're wrong!" He tried to speak with conviction. "O God!" he said in his heart, "if I were a man of wisdom! But I have really learned nothing. I've only jumped at conclusions, to ease my own bitterness. I've been walking blindfolded into experience, trusting to luck, believing that no one would ever question me. What I tell her, now, will either clear the way for her, or clutter up the path forever."

"You're wrong, Bertha," he began, fumbling.

Then the idea came: crude, unformed, inadequate. "You can keep Manuel by remembering him, loving him. We'll bury him here in the orchard. And so long as you remember him, he will live. Tell the children this. It's true. I promise!"

THE FAMILY'S PROBLEMS

We Started a Baby Farm to Keep the Wolf From the Door

WHEN my father was killed in an accident, he left us with little more than the home in which we lived. "Us" consisted of my mother, my sister, and myself. Our home was a good-sized country place with a very large yard and garden, situated on a hill, with a charming and extensive view. The house was attractive and convenient, but it could not furnish us with food and clothing. When we had partially recovered from the shock of our great loss, we spent many hours in talking over various ways of earning money. Then, one day, I received the following letter:

DEAR RUTH: Would you be a mother to my two babies for six months? You see, Dick has to go to South America on a business trip. He wants me to go with him but we can't possibly take the children. This morning at breakfast Dick said, "I believe Ruth would take them." Now, do say you'll do it! Of course, we shall expect to pay.

I didn't stop to consider. I saw a chance to earn some much-needed cash, and I wired: "Bring them along." In less than a week we had begun what seems likely to be our life work. I have always loved children, and am a born story-teller. My sister had taken the short nurse's course during the war, and she has a real genius for acting in an emergency, while mother's housekeeping is a delight.

The children came, and they were so happy and so well that it wasn't long before an acquaintance asked if we couldn't keep her babies while she went off for a two-weeks rest. So we added her two to our little family. Now we have the house full of children all summer, and we always have some all the year 'round.

So here we are, three busy, happy women, enjoying the knowledge that we have found our work and can earn a good living.

We have turned our yard into a playground, with swings, see-saws, and a sand pile, and the attic into a nursery. In this way, the children never lack for occupation, and only need a little oversight. We call our place "Holiday Home," for it is a place where tired mothers can leave their children and enjoy a real holiday. M. C. R.

This Domestic Oil is Guaranteed to Keep Things Running Smoothly

I RECENTLY visited in a home where my hostess had achieved the art of gracious living, in spite of the little inconveniences so inevitable in a maidless household of four or five members.

This household consisted of father, mother, a school-girl daughter, and a visiting daughter who was a business woman. A mother-in-law spent the winters with them.

A cleaning woman came twice a week from nine o'clock to twelve. The six hours a week kept the house reasonably clean, but not, of course, absolutely spick-and-span.

With insufficient help, there are bound to be a few creaks here and there in the household wheels, and it was for these creaks that my hostess invented her domestic oil.

When her husband remarked that the front porch was getting tracked up, she replied innocently, "Is it? Our house-worker cleans it twice a week. If anyone thinks it needs cleaning in between times—he owns his own suggestion."

After two or three experiences of this kind, the man of the house never saw a tracked porch again. The same wisdom was gradually acquired by other members of the family.

One day the business-daughter said, "Mother, the bathroom basin is dirty."

"Is it?" answered her mother sweetly. "You know, in this house, if anyone sees anything that needs doing, she automatically owns the little job."

The daughter returned to the bathroom, cleaned the basin, and never mentioned the matter again.

The mother-in-law was particularly fond of bran bread, and brought her recipe along with her. My hostess bought the materials, showed her visitor where everything was kept, and how to use the oven. Then she said:

"Now I'm going to let you make your own bran bread whenever you want to."

The mother-in-law was surprised to find herself carrying the burden of her own suggestion. She soon decided that she wouldn't bother about it, and there was no more complaining about the lack of bran bread on the table.

Once the husband inquired rather sarcastically why artificial flowers stood in the center of the table, when the garden was full of real ones.

"Because it is a spot of beauty without any trouble," answered the home-maker. "I should love to see fresh flowers all over the house; but when I have to own the care of them, I compromise, and choose beauty without the care. But if you will cut the flowers and fill the vases, I'll bless you and your suggestion."

Her husband never referred to the matter again. Automatic ownership of his little suggestion cured him. The subject was dropped when he knew he would have to carry out his own idea.

It is the easiest thing in the world to think up ideas for the other fellow to own. But how easy it is to cure people of giving unsolicited advice, by making their brilliant ideas retroactive. "Advisers, doers!" is the slogan of my hostess, who said she felt like taking a patent out on her idea, because it worked so beautifully. Now, unless a member of her family is prepared to do the work he sees undone, he maintains a discreet silence, thereby eliminating all unpleasant friction. H. D. B.

The transmission of the Ford car is the mechanism which controls its speed and motion. The action of the pedals is conveyed through appropriate bands with fabric linings to the slow-speed, brake or reverse drums of the transmission. These linings must be kept thoroughly lubricated, pliable and free from glaze to insure smooth action without grabbing or vibration. This is one important duty of Texaco Motor Oil F.

Why your Ford must have a double-duty oil

The Ford car, in one important respect, is fundamentally different from any other automobile. In the Ford, the engine and transmission are combined in one housing and must be lubricated by one and the same oil.

This feature of the Ford car demands a special type of lubricant which will do two things. The oil must—

First—have the body and purity to keep down engine wear and stand high temperatures without forming carbon or gummy residues in the cylinders.

And second—it must lubricate and freely penetrate the transmission linings. It must keep them pliable, and prevent the glazing and wearing of the surfaces, which cause chattering and vibration.

Texaco Motor Oil F has these two qualities. Use it and you will notice an immediate improvement in the smoothness of your car as you start, stop or reverse, and, later, in new freedom from wear and carbon. Start fresh with a filling of golden Texaco Motor Oil F. You will be agreeably surprised by the results.
